CALIFORNIA REPORTER

141 PACIFIC REPORTER

29, 1903, being engaged as an engineer to operate a donkey engine, as a member of what was known as the donkey crew, along the line of the proposed chute, and under a crew foreman named Than Riggan. The donkey engine was being operated about a mile and a quarter from the mill, to which a trail ran along the line of the proposed chute, which the workmen used in going to and fro. On the afternoon of April 30th another crew, known as the blasting crew, under a foreman named Barney Lynch, moved over from some other point on the defendant's property some distance away to the line of the proposed chute, at a point in proximity to said trail and about 225 yards away from the station of the donkey engine but invisible from its location. This blasting crew made preparations to set off several blasts at this point during that afternoon, and were ready to do so between 5 and 6 o'clock after the men of other crews had quit their places of work for the day. The foreman of the blasting crew saw several men, including the foreman of the donkey crew, pass along the trail shortly after 5:30 o'clock that evening, and supposed that all of the men of that crew had gone by. He then set off the blasts. There is some dispute in the evidence as to whether the blasting crew called out "fire" loudly or at all just before the blasts went off; but there is no evidence that any member of that crew, or any one else in fact, went back along and up the trail to warn possible comers of the impending blasts. The evidence shows that the deceased had lingered at his engine for a few moments after the other men had left in order to make some slight repairs, and that this fact was known to his foreman, who did not, however, have time to impart this knowledge to the blasting crew when he reached the place where the blasts were about to be exploded, but had to run down the trail to save his own life. The evidence further shows that the deceased came along the trail at the moment of the explosion, and was evidently struck and fatally wounded by the flying rocks. He was found the next morning lying a few feet from the place of one of the blasts in an unconscious and dying condition, and he died that day without regaining consciousness. There was no evidence before the court at the trial tending in any degree to show that the deceased knew or should have known of the presence of the blasting crew at the place where he met his death, or that he had any warning of the impending explosion.

[1] The first contention of the appellant is that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, for the reason that there is no allegation showing wherein the plaintiff was damaged by reason of the death of her minor son. No authority is cited in support of this contention. It has long been the settled law of this state that a parent is entitled, under a general allegation of damages, to recover, for the loss of service and the deprivation of the comfort, protection, and society of the child caused by its death, such damages as under all the circumstances of the case may be just. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 376, 377; Nehrbas v. C. P. R. R. Co., 62 Cal. 320; Bond v. United Railroads, 159 Cal. 270, 286, 113 Pac. 366, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 50; Peters v. S. P. Co., 160 Cal. 48, 70, 116 Pac. 400.

[2] The complaint in this action contains three counts. The first count alleges in substance that the deceased came to his death from the careless and negligent acts of the defendant in discharging certain powerful and dangerous dynamite placed without notice or warning to the decedent, and while he was passing the point of location of such blasts while going from his work along the trail which the defendant had provided for its employés. The second count avers that the accident complained of was caused through the negligence of the defendant in failing to adopt, promulgate, and use reasonable diligence to enforce proper and sufficient rules for the protection of the employés of the defendant from the dangers due to the use of dynamite and to blasting in the conduct of its business. The third count of the complaint alleges that the accident was caused by the negligence of the foreman of the blasting crew, and to the fact that the defendant, in addition to being responsible for his alleged direct acts of negligence, was itself guilty of negligence in retaining in its employ the said foreman of the blasting crew when it knew, or in the exercise of reasonable diligence should have known, that he was habitually careless, negligent, incompetent, and unfit to perform the dangerous and delicate work and duty of his position.

The cause was tried upon all of the issues tendered by these three counts in the complaint. Counsel for the appellant urges that, as to the second count of the complaint, there could be no recovery, for the reason that the evidence offered by the plaintiff affirmatively shows that a reasonable rule respecting the warning to be given before setting off blasts had been adopted and promulgated by the defendant. Apart from the question, determinable only by the jury, as to whether the orders given by the general foreman, William McLeod, to Barney Lynch, the foreman of the blasting crew, "to send one man down the chute to holler 'fire' before spitting the fuse, so that everybody could get out of the way," was a reasonable or sufficient precaution when setting off dangerous blasts, it is sufficient to note that no mention for a nonsuit was directed to the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain this particular count; and that since the case was submitted to the jury upon all three counts, if its verdict is sustainable upon both or either of the other counts, it would not be reversed because of any failure of proof to sustain the second count.

The main contentions of the appellant turn upon the issues presented by the first and third counts of the complaint, and raise the following questions for solution upon this appeal: First. Was Barney Lynch, the foreman of the blasting crew, negligent in failing to give proper, timely, and adequate warning of the impending blasts, by the discharge of which the deceased came to his death? Second. Was the said Barney Lynch, if so negligent, the fellow servant of the deceased, for whose negligence the plaintiff cannot recover in this action? Third. Was the defendant shown to have been negligent in employing, or retaining in its employment, the said Barney Lynch when he was habitually careless with respect to the use of proper precautions before discharging blasts, and when that fact was or should have been known to it prior to the fatality involved in this case?

[3] To the first of these questions it will be sufficient to say that without serious conflict the evidence quite sufficiently shows that Barney Lynch, the foreman of the defendant's blasting crew, was guilty of gross carelessness at the time of discharging the blasts by which the decedent was fatally injured. Even assuming that the foregoing rule, with respect to the warning to be given before a blast, was reasonably adequate for safety to the other employés of the defendant or to passers-by, it was a rule which was not complied with in the case under review. No man was sent either up or down the trail to warn comers of impending danger; and the cry of "fire," just before the blast, was palpably insufficient to notify any but those already aware of the impending explosion. Nor can it be urged in this connection that Than Riggan, the immediate foreman of the deceased as a member of the donkey crew, was negligent, for the proofs show that he only learned of the presence and impendency of these blasts a moment before their explosion, and when to notify the blasting crew would be futile, and to retrace his steps and warn the deceased impossible, because the fuses were smoking, and he was obliged to immediately flee down the trail to save his own life.

[4] The next and legal question presented is whether Barney Lynch, the foreman of the blasting crew, was a fellow servant of the deceased in a sense which would forestall a recovery for damages for his death. The fatality in question occurred prior to the passage of recent statutes changing the former rule with reference to responsibility for the acts of fellow servants. The defendant, in connection with its other activities, was at the time of the accident engaged in constructing a chute for the movement of logs from the woods to the mill. In the prosecution of this work three crews of men were engaged, the donkey crew, the jerry crew, and the blasting crew; each working under its own foreman, and each independently of the other, but each doing its allotted part of the general work of chute construction. It would seem to be settled beyond question, by the decisions of this state construing the law as it stood prior to the passage of the statute of 1907 (St. 1907, c. 97, p. 119), that the foreman and members of these several crews were fellow servants employed by the same employer in the same general business. Civ. Code, § 1970; Hogan v. C. P. R. R. Co., 49 Cal. 128; McLean v. Blue Point G. M. Co., 51 Cal. 255; Fagundes v. C. P. R. R. Co., 79 Cal. 97, 21 Pac. 437, 3 L. R. A. 824; Schwind v. Floristan P. & P. Co., 5 Cal. App. 197, 89 Pac. 1066; Vestner v. Northern Cal. P. Co., 158 Cal. 284, 110 Pac. 918. The cases from other jurisdictions cited by counsel for the respondent have no persuasive force against the foregoing authorities from our own state on this subject.

[5] It follows that, since Barney Lynch must be held to have been the fellow servant of the deceased, the plaintiff would not be entitled to recover for the detriment caused by his negligence, unless it should also appear that the defendant was negligent in the employment or retention of Barney Lynch as foreman of the blasting crew. It is in relation to this feature of the case that the main difficulties arise, or rather arose, at the trial.

[6, 7] Early in its course the plaintiff produced the witness Than Riggan, of whom this question was asked: "Do you know what Barney Lynch's general reputation as to carelessness or carefulness in the discharge of his duties on the blasting crew was prior to the accident?" This question, over the objection of the defendant, the court permitted the witness to answer, and he testified: "It was bad in camp." Substantially the same question was at intervals during the trial repeated to several other witnesses, and allowed to be answered similarly over the objection of the defendant. The specific objection which the defendant urged and repeated to these several questions and answers was that evidence of the general reputation of Barney Lynch about the camp for negligence in giving warning of the explosion of blasts was incompetent and inadmissible to bind the defendant until the foundation therefor had been laid by proof of actual carelessness upon former occasions in exploding blasts. The evidence as to reputation was admitted by the court unconditionally and without requiring such proof, though later in the case some slight evidence was introduced tending to show that Lynch had been careless upon one former occasion. The testimony of the former foreman, William McLeod, when analyzed in the light of his evident hostility to the defendant, goes no further than this, while the evidence of the former fellow workmen with Barney Lynch giving him a bad reputation is supported by no basis of fact or detail as to prior negligent acts. This evidence was not in itself sufficient to base opinions as to Barney Lynch's bad reputation for habitual carelessness upon, and we are thus brought face to face with the question of the admissibility of evidence of the reputation of Barney Lynch for carelessness in blasting, in the absence of a sufficient showing as to his past carelessness in fact. The leading California case upon this point is the case of Gier v. Los Angeles C. E. Ry. Co., 108 Cal. 129, 41 Pac. 22, wherein it is very clearly pointed out that, in cases involving the precise question in issue here, it is the character and not the reputation of the employé which is the primary subject of consideration, and that in the absence of proof of specific acts of carelessness, sufficient to establish the character of the servant in respect to negligence, evidence of his reputation in that respect is inadmissible. The reason for this rule is that, the employé causing the injury and the person injured being fellow servants, the employer would not, under the law as it was at the time of the injury in question, be liable, unless it should be shown that the employer was negligent in retaining the careless and culpable employé in its service after it knew or should have known of his incompetency. In order to make this proof, two things were necessary to be shown: First, that the culpable employé was in fact incompetent by reason of his habitual carelessness; and, second, that the defendant knew or should have known of such incompetency prior to the injury complained of, and with this actual or imputed knowledge negligently retained the careless servant in its employ. The proof as to reputation could only be admissible for the purpose of imputing to the defendant knowledge of a fact which had become a matter of general repute, and hence could not be legally admitted until the foundation had been laid in proof of past acts of carelessness, which would in itself be sufficient to predicate a finding of the fact of incompetency upon; nor could the evidence of his reputation be admissible to prove the fact of incompetency; otherwise a defendant might be held responsible for its failure or refusal to discharge a perfectly competent but otherwise unpopular servant. It would thus seem to be clear, both by reason and precedent, that the court committed error in the admission of the testimony as to the previous reputation of Barney Lynch for carelessness, in the absence of a sufficient showing of the fact of his prior incompetency. Gier v. Los Angeles C. E. Ry. Co., 108 Cal. 129, 41 Pac. 22; Consolidated Coal Co. v. Seniger, 179 Ill. 370, 53 N. E. 733; Park v. N. Y. C. & C. Co., 155 N. Y. 215, 49 N. E. 674, 63 Am. St. Rep. 663; Youngs v. New York O. & W. Co., 154 N. Y. 764, 49 N. E. 1106.

[8] The appellant further contends that the court erred in the admission of testimony as to the discharge of Barney Lynch after the explosion in which the decedent lost his life. The respondent justifies the offer and admissibility of this evidence upon the ground that it tended to prove that William McLeod, the general foreman of the several crews engaged in building the chute along the line in which the accident occurred, stood in relation of vice principal of the defendant. It has been held that the power to employ and discharge the employés of a corporation may be shown in evidence as tending to mark the line of distinction between a vice principal, for whose negligence a corporation is responsible, and an ordinary employé and fellow servant of another, for whose negligence the principal is not to be held liable; and it has also been held that evidence of the exercise of the power of hiring and discharging employés furnishes some evidence of its delegation by the principal to the foreman or official actually exercising it. The particular vice of the ruling of the trial court in this respect did not so much consist in admitting the evidence of the discharge of Barney Lynch by the foreman, William McLeod, on the morning after the explosion, as it did in also allowing to be introduced in proof, over the defendant's objection, the conversation which accompanied the discharge. The record discloses that on the morning following the explosion, and shortly after the body of the dying youth had been borne into camp, the foreman, William McLeod, said to Barney Lynch: "This is some of your work. Get your things together and get out of here." Tr. fol. 212. The unmistakable implication of these words is that the injury to the decedent had been caused by the negligence of Lynch, and that for that reason he was being discharged. That this conclusion of the general foreman of the defendant, even assuming that he stood in the relation of vice principal to it, is one by which the defendant could not be bound, and was therefore improperly admitted in evidence, is well settled in this state. Beasley v. S. J. F. P. Co., 92 Cal. 388, 28 Pac. 485; Borland v. Nevada Bank, 99 Cal. 89, 33 Pac. 737, 37 Am. St. Rep. 32; Lissak v. Crocker Est. Co., 119 Cal. 442, 51 Pac. 688; Crawford v. Transatlantic Co., 125 Cal. 609, 58 Pac. 177; Peterson v. Mineral K. F. Co., 140 Cal. 624, 74 Pac. 162; Waldeck v. Pacific Coast S. S. Co., 2 Cal. App. 167, 83 Pac. 158.

There are a number of other errors alleged to have been committed during the trial and which are discussed in the briefs of counsel, but they are all practically covered by the review of the trial thus far undertaken, and hence need not be considered in detail.

We think that, for the reasons heretofore given, the judgment must be reversed; and it is so ordered.

We concur: LENNON, P. J.; KERRIGAN, J.

HAGEMAN v. O'BRIEN et al. (Civ. 1480.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. April 3, 1914. Rehearing Denied April 30, 1914. Denied by Supreme Court June 2, 1914.)

1. BROKERS (§ 43*)—COMMISSIONS—AGREEMENT TO DIVIDE—CONTRACT—REQUISITES—STATUTE.

Civ. Code, § 1624, subd. 6, providing that an agreement employing an agent or broker to purchase or sell real estate for a commission, is invalid, unless the same or some note or memorandum thereof is in writing and subscribed by the party to be charged or by his agent. Held, that such section was only designed to protect owners against unfounded claims of brokers, and did not apply to a contract between brokers by which the principal broker contracted to pay his assistant a specified sum for services rendered in making sales.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Brokers, Cent. Dig. § 44; Dec. Dig. § 43.*]

2. BROKERS (§ 66*)—CONTRACTS INTER SE—CONSTRUCTION.

Defendants, being authorized agents for the sale of certain lands, wrote plaintiff agreeing to pay him "a commission of 5% on all the land," the writers sold through plaintiff's assistance, whether closed directly or indirectly by plaintiff, and later wrote another letter that, if plaintiff desired to operate in specified counties in the sale of certain lands controlled by the writers, they would pay a commission of $6 per hectare on all lands sold by plaintiff, commission payable to plaintiff when received by defendants. Held that, while the form of the letters were agreements to pay commissions, in substance, they were to share commissions received by paying the specified sums to plaintiff as and when the commissions were received by defendants from the owner of the land.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Brokers, Cent. Dig. § 51; Dec. Dig. § 66.*]

3. BROKERS (§ 53*)—COMMISSIONS—DIVISION.

Where defendants employed plaintiff to assist them in selling certain lands, agreeing to pay him specified prices on sales made through defendants' office, whether closed directly or indirectly by plaintiff, it was not necessary, in order to entitle plaintiff to compensation under such agreement, to show that he alone was the procuring cause of the sales, but only that plaintiff should show that he rendered substantial services in connection with the sales made, though the actual transaction with the purchasers was concluded by or through the defendants.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Brokers, Cent. Dig. § 74; Dec. Dig. § 53.*]

4. BROKERS (§ 86*)—SALES—DIVISION OF COMMISSIONS—RENDITION OF SERVICES—EVIDENCE.

In an action for division of brokers' commissions, evidence held to support a finding that plaintiff procured purchasers for the lands in question, or rendered such services in connection with the sales as would entitle him to compensation under the contracts of employment.

5. NEW TRIAL (§ 92*)—GROUNDS—SURPRISE.

That the presiding judge directing the trial expressed an opinion for the guidance of counsel in the admission of testimony pursuant to which defendants' counsel omitted testimony they would otherwise have offered did not entitle them to a new trial for surprise; there being no showing that the court would have denied the right to introduce the evidence, so far as material, had it been offered.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Cent. Dig. § 187; Dec. Dig. § 92.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; W. M. Conley, Judge.

Action by Carl Hageman against Charles F. O'Brien and another doing business as O'Brien & Garrett. Judgment for plaintiff. From an order denying defendants' motion for new trial, they appeal. Affirmed.

Frank James, of Los Angeles, for appellants. S. G. Tompkins, of San Jose, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. This action is prosecuted by the plaintiff, a real estate agent, to recover commissions from the defendants, who also are real estate agents. The claim is based upon an alleged contract for services rendered by the plaintiff in connection with sales of land belonging to a certain corporation. Judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff, and defendants appeal from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

The lands that were sold are in Mexico. The defendants had their principal place of business in San Francisco, and the plaintiff was located in the county of Santa Clara. The defendants, being the authorized agents for the sale of said lands, delivered to plaintiff a letter dated October 22, 1908, in which they agreed to pay plaintiff "a commission of 5% on all the land we sell through your assistance, whether they are closed directly or indirectly by you." Defendants also delivered to plaintiff a letter, dated November 5, 1908, in which they said:

> "If you desire to operate in San Luis Obispo and Monterey counties, in the sale of the Yaqui Valley lands controlled by us, we will pay you a commission of $6 per hectare on all land sold by you, commission payable to you as and when received by us. All sales to be made through this office and subject to our approval. We will furnish you printed matter, such as we have, and will assist you in every way possible. It is understood, however, that you are to pay your own expenses such as office, advertising, commission to subagents," etc.

Of the sums included in the judgment in this action, $160 was allowed as a commission to plaintiff under the 5 per cent. agreement for land sold to G. B. Seely of Santa Clara county. The remainder of the judgment is on account of lands sold to James Martin, D. McFadden, W. H. Martin, and H. Bardin severally, who were residents of Monterey county.

[1] Among the grounds asserted in support of the motion for a new trial, appellants specify that the evidence is insufficient to support the court's findings wherein it was determined that the defendants employed plaintiff and agreed with him for commissions as alleged in the complaint, and was further determined that, pursuant to said agreement, plaintiff procured purchasers for portions of said lands, as alleged in the complaint and set forth in the findings of fact. Appellants' first point in the argument is that the writings offered in evidence are insufficient to constitute a contract within the meaning of subdivision 6 of section 1624, Civil Code, which appellants claim is applicable to this case. The transactions between plaintiff and defendants here, and their relations to each other and to the property, were not such as to bring the case within the terms of that statute. The defendants were not owners employing plaintiff to sell their land. They were merely agents arranging with another agent to assist in the business of their agency. An agreement to pay for such services does not require a writing to establish its validity. The above-mentioned provision of the Civil Code is to the effect that an agreement authorizing or employing an agent or broker to purchase or sell real estate for compensation or a commission is invalid, unless the same or some note or memorandum thereof is in writing and subscribed by the party to be charged, or by his agent. "That provision was only designed to protect owners of real estate against unfounded claims of brokers. It does not extend to agreements between brokers to co-operate in making sales for a share of the commissions." Gorham v. Heiman, 90 Cal. 346, 358, 27 Pac. 289, 292; Baker v. Thompson, 14 Cal. App. 175, 111 Pac. 373.

[2] While, in form, the letters of defendants to plaintiff were agreements to pay a commission, yet, in substance, they were to share the commissions received by paying the specified sums to plaintiff as and when the commissions were received by the defendants from the owner of the land.

[3] It is next contended that plaintiff did not render the services necessary to entitle him to commissions under the agreement as made. Various decisions are cited to show that, before plaintiff could recover herein, he must prove that he alone was the efficient or procuring cause of the sales. Appellants rely upon Armstrong v. Wann, 29 Minn. 126, 12 N. W. 345; Waterman v. Boltinghouse, 82 Cal. 659, 23 Pac. 195; Dolan v. Scanlan, 57 Cal. 261. It is further contended that, where several brokers contribute something toward the consummation of a sale under brokerage agreements which are not exclusive the owner is not liable to all of the brokers, but only to that one who is the predominating efficient cause of the sale, citing Glascock v. Van Fleet, 100 Tenn. 603, 46 S. W. 449. Under this and other decisions it is claimed that, under the circumstances of this case, the defendants had the right to make the sales themselves without becoming liable to plaintiff for commissions. Assuming that the decisions above noted and others referred to in the brief of appellants' counsel are sufficient authority for the rule as stated, and that such rule is enforceable as between a real estate agent or broker and a landowner who has employed him to make sales, it does not necessarily follow that this rule is applicable as between brokers acting together for the sale of land, and where the agreement between the brokers is in terms like those between the parties to this action. The first agreement applies specifically to lands sold by the defendants through the assistance of the plaintiff. The second agreement also provides that the sales shall be made through the office of the defendants and that the defendants would assist the plaintiff in every way possible in the efforts made by him to sell those lands. It is only necessary for the plaintiff to show that he rendered services in connection with the sales made, and that those services were substantial in character, even though the actual transaction with the purchasers was concluded by or through the defendants.

[4] There is in this record evidence which substantially supports the findings of the court in favor of the plaintiff with respect to the rendering of these services. This being so, the findings must be sustained. As to the sale to Seely, a resident of Santa Clara county, it is shown that the plaintiff called upon Seely and talked about those lands to him, and that subsequently the sale to Seely was closed up through the defendants. With respect to the other purchasers, residing in Monterey county, the facts in general outline are as follows: The plaintiff had advertised these Yaqui Valley lands in Monterey county and had directly interested Henry Bardin as a prospective purchaser. William Martin had become interested in the subject of these Yaqui Valley lands, and had talked with several people about them. He was acquainted with the plaintiff before he went to Mexico, having been introduced to plaintiff by a subagent of plaintiff, and he received from them some of plaintiff's pamphlets. His testimony is that plaintiff did not influence him to go to Mexico, and that one Wellbank, with whom he had business in San Francisco, suggested to him that, if he would go directly to the owners and buy from them, he might be able to make a better bargain than by dealing with the agents. With this idea in mind, William Martin procured James Martin and McFadden to go with him on the trip to Mexico, which resulted in their purchasing the lands. Plaintiff, having learned that William Martin and his party had started for Mexico, took with him Henry Bardin and followed the other party on the next train, overtaking them in Arizona, and the entire party traveled south on the same train to a point near the location of the Yaqui Valley lands. There the defendant Garrett was on the ground ready to meet purchasers. Garrett and Hageman were both active in showing the lands to these visitors, and sales resulted which were closed by Garrett before the parties returned to California. Immediately before the plaintiff returned home, Mr. Garrett gave him a memorandum in Garrett's handwriting containing the names of James Martin, W. H. Martin, D. McFadden, and Henry Bardin, with figures showing the number of hectares purchased by each one, together with the figures "1030" (being the total number of hectares) multiplied by 6, making a total of $6,180. After arriving at his home in California the plaintiff reported these sales by letter to the office of defendants in San Francisco, and upon the faith of that report the bookkeeper of defendants gave him credit for the claimed commissions. After Garrett's return to San Francisco, the defendants repudiated the credit thus given, and took the position that the plaintiff had not earned those commissions, except with respect to 300 hectares sold to Henry Bardin. They paid him $1,800 on account of the Bardin sale. Some weeks later they sold to Henry Bardin an additional 100 hectares of adjoining land to that which he first purchased, and the judgment here includes $600 allowed to plaintiff as a commission arising out of that additional sale. The witnesses McFadden and James Martin, like the witness W. H. Martin, testified, in substance, that they were not influenced by the plaintiff to go to Mexico or to purchase said lands. Without repeating details of testimony any further, it is sufficient to say that, in our opinion, the evidence is ample to support the findings that the plaintiff procured purchasers for these lands as stated, at least to the extent that he rendered such services in connection with those sales as would be sufficient to entitle him to compensation under the contracts the substance of which we have stated.

[6] Finally, it is claimed on behalf of appellants that they should have a new trial on account of surprise which ordinary prudence could not have guarded against, and on account of irregularities in the orders of the court by which defendants were prevented from having a fair trial. With respect to these grounds of the motion, an affidavit was filed setting forth a part of the record, and it is claimed that by reason of the facts therein stated the defendants were prevented from presenting evidence material to their case. The defendant Garrett was on the witness stand, and was giving testimony as to what happened while the parties were in Mexico, and it is claimed that defendants were proceeding to show by him that the sales were made by him, and not by plaintiff, and that plaintiff was not the inducing cause thereof. The judge presiding at the trial suggested that his opinion at that time was that, unless the influence which induced the purchasers to go down to the Yaqui Valley originated in Monterey county, then he must take the testimony of the purchasers, whose depositions were on file, rather than that of the real estate men:

> "Unless plaintiff was instrumental in causing those people to leave Monterey county and go there, why he stands on very dangerous grounds, so far as his operations were concerned. I will give that very little consideration in the final judgment in the case. * * * I think we can shorten it up. I don't think there is any material dispute as to the transactions down there. If there was it would amount to nothing. Whether the plaintiff was there or Mr. Garrett was there at the time that the agreement or bargain was struck, that don't make any difference, as long as they were acting in concert."

After some further discussion, counsel for defendants desisted from offering further testimony of the witness with regard to the transactions in Mexico. No definite offer of testimony was made, or ruling thereon demanded of the court, more than the explanation of counsel that he was endeavoring to discover to the court what was the inducement or incentive to the parties to purchase this property, and that, in offering the testimony, he was dealing with motive or producing cause with respect to those sales, and proposing to show that nothing was done down there by Mr. Hageman to produce a new incentive or inducing cause to the making of those sales. It is now claimed that the defendants were misled by these interruptions and suggestions of the court, and that this is shown by the fact that the judge stated that he gave judgment in favor of the plaintiff upon the ground, among others, that:

> "Defendant Garrett's conduct and acts alone from the time he met the parties in Mexico until the last sale was made to W. H. Bardin in Salinas would justify the court in rendering judgment in favor of plaintiff."

This statement by the judge is not found in the findings of fact, and must have been merely a part of the opinion or statement by the judge in announcing what his decision would be. Even if, in passing upon the question of error in denying the motion for a new trial, we could consider the opinion or statement thus made by the judge, it would not alone be sufficient to show that defendants were prevented from having a fair trial. This question must be determined from the record of proceedings at the trial taken in connection with the findings of fact. This record, the essential part of which we have stated, does not support the claim of appellants respecting this matter. The mere fact that the judge presiding at a trial gives out some expression of opinion for the guidance of counsel during the progress of the case and suggests the shortening or condensing of the testimony to be given does not constitute a denial of the right to offer evidence, and is not error. In the absence of a contrary showing, it must be presumed that the court would not have denied the right of the party to produce in evidence any fact material to the case. Furthermore, we are not convinced that the suggestions made by the judge were out of place under the circumstances then appearing.

The order denying the motion of defendants for a new trial is affirmed.

We concur: JAMES, J.; SHAW, J.

PACIFIC GAS & ELECTRIC CO. v. CHUBB.
(Civ. 1193.)

1. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 265*)—COMPENSATION—ATTORNEY'S FEES—JUST COMPENSATION.

Const. art. 1, § 14, provides property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation, is for the property, and not to the owner, and does not include attorney's fees; the actual value of the land being declared by Code Civ. Proc. § 1249, the measure of compensation for property taken, and the basis of damages to property not taken, but injuriously affected.

2. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 265*)—"COSTS"—ATTORNEY'S FEES.

"Costs," which Code Civ. Proc. § 1255, provides may be allowed in condemnation proceedings, do not include attorney's fees; section 1021 expressly providing that attorney's fees are not included in the term "costs."

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 2, pp. 1633–1640; vol. 8, p. 7620.]

3. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 265*) — DISBURSEMENTS—ATTORNEYS.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1255a, providing that on the abandonment of a condemnation suit defendant may be awarded costs and disbursements, which shall include all necessary expenses incurred in preparing for trial, and reasonable attorney's fees, provided that "said costs and disbursements shall not include expenses incurred in preparing for trial, when the action is dismissed 40 days prior to the time set for the trial," attorney's fees are not allowable where there is not an abandonment of the action.

Appeal from Superior Court, Placer County; N. D. Arnot, Judge.

Condemnation proceeding by the Pacific Gas & Electric Company against M. M. Chubb. From the part of an order on taxation of costs denying him attorney's fees, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Robinson & Robinson, of Oakland, for appellant. John M. Fulweiler, of Auburn, and Wm. B. Bosley and Thos. J. Straub, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. This was a proceeding in eminent domain in which the jury awarded the sum of $1,200 as damages. It is stated in the transcript:

> "There was not submitted to the jury, and the jury did not take into consideration any element of attorney's fees of the defendant in the case in its verdict."

In defendant's cost bill were included two items of costs for attorney's fees. A motion to tax the costs was made by plaintiff. At the hearing the items of attorney's fees were stricken out of the cost bill, and as to all other items it was allowed. Defendant appeals from so much of the order as denied attorney's fees.

[1] Appellant claims: First, that the "just compensation" to which the owner of the property is entitled, under section 14, art. 1, of the Constitution, includes reasonable disbursements made by him for attorneys at the trial; second, that section 1255a of the Code of Civil Procedure authorizes the recovery of such disbursements.

1. The constitutional provision is as follows:

> "Private property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation having been first made to, or paid into court for, the owner, * * * which compensation shall be ascertained by a jury, unless a jury be waived."

Section 1249, Code of Civil Procedure, provides that:

> "For the purpose of assessing compensation and damages, the right thereto shall be deemed to have accrued at the date of the summons, and its actual value, at that date shall be the measure of compensation for all property to be actually taken and the basis of damages to property not actually taken but injuriously affected."

Obviously the jury could not take into account attorney's fees as an element of property value or of damage to property not taken, and it has been so held. Mitchell v. Hawley, 79 Cal. 301, 21 Pac. 833; San Jose R. Co. v. Mayne, 83 Cal. 566, 23 Pac. 522; Coburn v. Townsend, 103 Cal. 233, 37 Pac. 202. If the measure of compensation is to be the actual value of the land at the date the summons issues or at the date of the trial, and if this compensation is to be ascertained by a jury or a court sitting as a jury, and if the jury or court cannot take into account attorney's fees as an element of damage, it would seem to follow that the "just compensation" contemplated by the Constitution is the value of the land taken, and the damage to land not taken and nothing more. "Just compensation consists in making the owner good by an equivalent in money for the loss he actually sustains in the value of his property by being deprived of a portion of it." Laflin v. Chicago, etc., Co. (C. C.) 33 Fed. 415; Lewis, Em. Dom. (2d Ed.) § 462. The adjective "just" only emphasizes what would be true if omitted; namely, that the compensation should be equivalent of the property, and this compensation is "for the property, and not to the owner." Monongahela Navigation Co. v. United States, 148 U. S. 312, 13 Sup. Ct. 622, 37 L. Ed. 463.

The procedure by which this just compensation is to be ascertained is as much the subject of statutory law as is the procedure by which the property is to be taken. There is no way to exercise the right of eminent domain except as prescribed by statute, and there is no way for the property owner to secure just compensation for his property except by statute law. A statute which would undertake to make the compensation in money less than its fair market value would violate the Constitution, which forbids the taking of private property without just compensation has been made, and less than the market value would not be just compensation.

[2] But there is nothing in the Constitution which prohibits the Legislature from providing that the owner of the property taken may be allowed his necessary costs or expenses in resisting the taking of his property or in ascertaining its value. Hence in the procedure prescribed by the Code of Civil Procedure we find, in section 1255, the following provision:

> "Costs may be allowed or not, and if allowed, may be apportioned between the parties on the same or adverse sides, in the discretion of the court."

The costs here referred to are the ordinary and usual costs attending trials and allowed under statutory provisions and it is expressly provided, by section 1021 of the same Code, that attorney's fees are not included in the term "costs." It has frequently been held that costs are recoverable only by virtue of some statute. If, then, attorney's fees are not allowed by statute as costs, and if they form no part of the "just compensation" which is to be ascertained by a jury or the court sitting as a jury, it is not possible to discover whence comes the power of the court to allow attorney's fees at all. That costs are allowable only by virtue of some statute, see Bond v. United Railroads, 20 Cal. App. 124, 128 Pac. 786, and cases there cited. That the term "costs," as used in the statute, does not include attorney's fees we have not only section 1021 as answer, but the courts have so held. Id.; Miller v. Kehoe, 107 Cal. 340, 40 Pac. 485. Whenever it is held otherwise by our courts it has been by virtue of express statutory authority. Section 1251, Code of Civil Procedure, allows attorney's fees in suit on bond given to recover payment of final judgment in condemnation proceedings; also in escheat proceedings; in a foreclosure suit, section 726; in partition, sections 796, 798; in suit by an executor on claim against the estate, section 1510; in injunctions vacated or dissolved in cases involving water, section 532. Attorney's fees as costs were allowed in mechanic's lien cases, section 1195, but have since been held an unwarranted exercise of power by the Legislature. These are all exceptions to, and confirmatory of, the rule laid down in section 1021, as to the compensation of attorneys.

Appellant's contention is that:

> "The jury in awarding damages not being in a position to make defendant whole, the courts have wisely held that this result must be obtained through a cost bill; that all defendant's necessary costs and disbursements must be placed therein; and that plaintiff corporation must pay the same."

Reliance is placed upon the decision in San Francisco v. Collins, 98 Cal. 259, 33 Pac. 56, where, among other things, it was said:

> "To require the defendants in this case to pay any portion of their costs necessarily incidental to the trial of the issues on their part, or any part of the costs of plaintiff, would reduce the just compensation awarded by the jury, by a sum equal to that paid by them for such costs."

In that case the discussion arose on a cost bill in an eminent domain case which included the usual and ordinary costs at the trial, such as witness' fees, mileage, clerk's fees, and the like, but did not include attorneys' fees. The question here was not presented, nor is the decision authority for holding that in such cases any costs are allowable except as authorized by statute.

It may not be questioned that it is within the legislative power to require the condemning party to pay to the landowner reasonable attorney's fees as part of his costs, but the Legislature has not done so in this state with the exception shortly to be noticed. It was said by the Supreme Court, in Coburn v. Townsend, 103 Cal. 233, 236, 37 Pac. 202, 203:

> "We do not know of any law that allows counsel fees in a general judgment for a defendant in a proceeding for condemnation."

We know of no decision in the appellate courts of this state since that case was decided which has changed or modified the rule.

We do not deem it necessary to comment upon the cases cited by appellant from other jurisdictions. It will be found, we think, in these cases that, where attorneys' fees have been allowed as costs, there was some provision of the statute authorizing it either expressly or impliedly. But, if we are mistaken in this, we must still adhere to what seems to be the settled rule in this state. Of the hundreds of cases which have been reviewed by our appellate courts, we have found none where attorneys' fees as costs or otherwise have ever been claimed or allowed.

[3] 2. Section 1255a, Code of Civil Procedure, provides that, upon the abandonment, express or implied, of the suit, a judgment on motion of defendant may be entered "awarding the defendant his costs and disbursements which shall include all necessary expenses incurred in preparing for trial and reasonable attorney's fees" which "may be claimed in and by a cost bill to be prepared, served and filed and taxed as in civil cases," provided that "said costs and disbursements shall not include expense incurred in preparing for trial when said action is dismissed forty days prior to the time set for the trial of said action." Appellant contends that this section "clearly recognizes that attorney's fees are an element of costs and disbursements," and that there is but one exception provided for, namely, "when there is a dismissal within forty days prior to the time set for the trial of the action." We cannot so construe the statute. There must first be an abandonment of the action, express or implied, before attorneys' fees are allowable as costs on a dismissal of the action. The exception is that, if the action is dismissed 40 days prior to the time set for the trial of the action, the expense incurred in preparing for trial shall not be included as costs and disbursements. This is the obvious meaning of the statute, which was not enacted to supersede section 1255, but to meet certain abuses arising out of resort to the action without seriously intending to prosecute it to a conclusion. Section 1255a can be held to apply only to the cases or the situation of cases as therein indicated. "Expressio unius exclusio alterius" would seem to apply. Where the case is prosecuted to a final conclusion, section 1255 confers upon the court the power in its discretion to allow costs. Lincoln Northern Ry. Co. v. Wiswell, 8 Cal. App. 578, 581, 97 Pac. 536. Where plaintiff abandons the action, section 1255a introduces another rule, and authorizes attorney's fees to be taxed as part of defendant's costs.

The order is affirmed.

We concur: HART, J; BURNETT, J.

SPRING VALLEY WATER CO. v. ALAMEDA COUNTY. (Civ. 1251.)

1. Taxation (§ 47*)—"Double Taxation."

Assessing to one land with its riparian rights, and to another the riparian rights, is double taxation, within the prohibition of the Constitution and Pol. Code, § 3607.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 3, pp. 2186, 2187.]

2. Taxation (§ 421*) — Assessment — "Real Estate"—Riparian Rights.

The inclusion in an assessment of land of riparian rights appurtenant thereto, being contemplated by Pol. Code, § 3617, part of the act as to taxation, defining the term "real estate" to include "all rights and privileges appertaining" to the land, an assessment of land not intended to include such rights should expressly show it.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 7, p. 5937; vol. 8, pp. 7778, 7779.]

3. Taxation (§ 421*)—Assessment—Description—"Riparian Right."

Under Pol. Code, § 3650, providing that the description in the assessment book, in case of land, shall be "by township, range, section, * * * and when such land is not in a congressional division * * * by metes and bounds, or other description sufficient to identify it," the description, after the township and county, "Riparian rights, the right to take, divert and use water from A. creek and its tributaries," is insufficient.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 7, p. 6244.]

4. Evidence (§ 387*)—Parol Evidence—Record of Assessment.

Parol evidence is not admissible to vary or affect the written record of an assessment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; W. H. Waste, Everett J. Brown, and Wm. S. Wells, Judges.

Action by the Spring Valley Water Company against the County of Alameda. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. H. L. Hynes and Walter J. Burpee, both of Oakland, for appellant. McCutchen, Olney & Willard, of San Francisco, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. Two actions were brought to recover taxes claimed to have been illegally collected. The first included the assessment for the fiscal year 1911-1912 and the other for 1912-1913. The amount of the two was $88,237, and the same legal question is involved in each action. In fact, they were tried together; but the record is presented in two different transcripts.

The trial was before Hons. William H. Waste, Everett J. Brown, and William S. Wells, judges of the superior court of Alameda county, sitting in bank, and they decided that the purported assessments, as follows: "In Washington township, said county: Riparian rights. The right to take, divert, and use water from Alameda creek and its tributaries," $21,677; and "In Pleasanton township, said county: Riparian rights. The right to take, divert, and use water from Alameda creek, Calaveras creek, Arroyo de Laguna, Arroyo del Valle, Arroyo Honda, San Antonio creek, and contributary branches," $20,160—were and are invalid and void. They based their conclusion, apparently, upon the following grounds:

"(1) That there is no sufficient or adequate description in the said assessment book of the property assessed, or intended to be assessed, as required by the Constitution and laws of the state of California. (2) That riparian rights do not, nor does the right to take, divert, and use water from creeks or streams, constitute property subject to assessment and taxation under the Constitution and laws of the state of California, apart from the land to which such riparian rights are appurtenant, or of which the same constitute and form part and parcel. * * * (4) That all of the riparian lands along the said Alameda creek, Calaveras creek, Arroyo de Laguna, Arroyo del Valle, Arroyo Honda, San Antonio creek, and contributory branches are elsewhere assessed in the said assessment book at their full cash value, including all riparian rights appurtenant thereto, or constituting part and parcel thereof, and that to assess the said riparian rights separately is to assess the same property twice. (5) That the riparian rights to the waters of the said stream are assessable only as appurtenant to, and part and parcel of, the lands riparian to the said streams, and are in the said assessment book illegally and improperly assessed separately therefrom. * * * (8) That, if it is intended in the said assessment to describe water in the said creeks, such water is not property subject to assessment under the Constitution and laws of the state of California, and the said assessment is so inextricably mingled with the assessment of riparian rights as not to be susceptible of separation therefrom."

The foregoing appear in the findings of the court, having been incorporated therein from the written protest of respondent against the payment of the tax. Some other grounds are set forth, also; but they are substantially covered by the quotation.

We think there can be no doubt as to the soundness of at least two of these reasons for holding the assessment to be void. In fact, the position of respondent is contested by the district attorney in a manner somewhat perfunctory; that official probably feeling that on account of the large amount involved and to avoid criticism he should invoke the judgment of an appellate court upon the question at issue.

[1] The primary principle underlying the judgment is as stated by Judge Cooley in his work on Taxation, p. 598, as follows:

> "The assessment being so important, the statutory provisions respecting its preparation and contents ought to be observed with particularity. They are prescribed in order to secure equality and uniformity in the contributions which are demanded for the public service, and if officers, instead of observing them, may substitute a discretion of their own, the most important security which has been devised for the protection of the citizen in tax cases might be rendered valueless."

As suggested in his preface to the first edition of this work, so vast is the power of taxation, and so readily does it yield "to passion, excitement, prejudice, or private schemes," and so frequently is its execution committed to incompetent hands, that any stretch of power on the part of the Legislature which authorizes the tax or of the ministerial officers who levy or execute it should be unhesitatingly opposed and condemned.

It cannot be disputed that the provisions for the exercise of this power in this state are specific and complete. We are concerned here, however, only with sections 3607, 3617, and 3650 of the Political Code. The first of these provides, in a general way, as to what property is subject to taxation, and it prohibits double taxation. In fact, the Constitution itself precludes double taxation. Estate of Fair, 128 Cal. 607, 61 Pac. 184. It is true, also, that double taxation does not necessarily consist in assessing the same property twice to the same person, but may consist in requiring a double contribution to the same tax on account of the same property, though the assessments are to different persons. Germania Trust Co. v. San Francisco, 128 Cal. 589, 61 Pac. 178; Estate of Fair, supra.

[2] In the case at bar it appears that the land was fully assessed, and, in addition, the assessor listed the "riparian rights." But these rights are unmistakably "appurtenant to" and a part of the land. The case would be no different if the assessor had assessed the land and improvements thereon and thereafter had assessed again the improvements. It is true that in assessing the land he did not specify the "riparian rights"; but it must be assumed that he included them as they are a necessary part of the value of the land. "Riparian rights" are not common to the citizens at large; but they exist as an incident to the right of the soil adjacent to the water. In such ownership they have their origin. McCarthy v. Murphy, 119 Wis. 159, 96 N. W. 531, 100 Am. St. Rep. 876.

> "The rights which a riparian proprietor has with respect to water are entirely derived from his possession of the land abutting thereon." Potomac Steamboat Co. v. Upper Potomac Steamboat Co., 109 U. S. 672, 3 Sup. Ct. 445, 4 Sup. Ct. 15, 27 L. Ed. 1070.

Said section 3617 provides that:

> "The term 'real estate' includes: 1. The possession of, claim to, ownership of, or right to the possession of land. 2. * * * and all rights and privileges appertaining thereto."

Riparian rights being "rights and privileges appertaining thereto," the statute contemplates, of course, their inclusion in the assessment of the land, and we must assume that this course was pursued. If the assessor did not intend to include the value of the riparian rights, it should so appear in his assessment.

As to the riparian rights claimed to belong to respondent independent of the ownership of the land, if we assume that they are capable of separate assessment, we would also be confronted with the presumption that they were included in the assessment for the full value of the lands to which said rights are appurtenant. It may be said, also, in this connection, that the other riparian lands as to which respondent did not own any rights were assessed in the same manner as the lands which we have already considered.

The situation, then, is that the lands owned by the Spring Valley Water Company, the lands not belonging to said company, but as to which it is claimed the company owned the riparian rights, and the lands as to which the company had no right were all assessed for their full cash value, without any deduction for riparian rights, and the assessment itself shows that this addition of $3,000,000 to the roll was in the face of the constitutional inhibition as to double assessment.

[3] But, assuming that these riparian rights were not included in the assessment of the parent estate, and that they are capable of separate and independent assessment, still the judgment must be affirmed, for the reason that the description of the property is too vague and indefinite. It is not disputed that they are interests in real property; but the only attempt at identification is the recital of the road and school district in which and of the creeks along which they are located. Said section 3650 provides that the property must be listed "under the appropriate head. * * * 2. Land, by township, range, section, or fractional section; and when such land is not a congressional division or subdivision, by metes and bounds, or other description sufficient to identify it, giving an estimate of the number of acres, not exceeding in each and every tract six hundred and forty acres, locality, and the improvements thereon." Herein it is manifest there was no pretense of complying with said requirement. It would be impossible from the assessor's description to identify the property. No idea can be formed even of the number of acres involved, or at what points or on which side of said streams the rights are located. The description would have been no more indefinite and uncertain if the assessor had simply listed the property as "the riparian rights" of respondent in the specified district.

Where the Legislature has declared specifically how a particular kind of property should be assessed on the assessment roll, the statute should be regarded as mandatory, not directory. Hammon v. Nix, 104 Fed. 689, 44 C. C. A. 132. This case holds that the assessor's failure to comply with the Colorado statute requiring the survey numbers of mining claims to be given on the assessment rolls renders a sale void if not corrected before.

Under a statute providing that resident lands shall be assessed by the number of the lot or such other description as it is commonly known by, the description "L. G. M.—J. M. occupant—75 acres," is insufficient. Jones v. Blanchard, 62 N. H. 651.

Under a statute providing that assessors in assessing certain bridges shall state "the metes and bounds of the ground occupied by such bridge" the assessors should state the length of the bridge and approach assessed. Keokuk & H. B. R. Co. v. People, 145 Ill. 596, 34 N. E. 482.

The foregoing are sufficient to indicate what particularity of compliance with the requirement of the statute is demanded of assessors in a matter of so much importance to the taxpayer.

If we conjecture that the assessor had in view the right to take water from said creeks to sell and assume that said right is property which is assessable to respondent, it is sufficient to say that in the condition of the assessment roll such conclusion would be nothing more than a mere conjecture and utterly insufficient to warrant a reversal of the judgment.

[4] It is true that an effort was made to supply the defect in the assessment by the testimony of J. C. Hedemark, chief deputy of the county assessor. After directing his attention to the assessments in question, he was asked:

> "Are you familiar with them, or sufficiently familiar with them to be able to state whether or not there was any deduction made from the amount of the assessments on account of riparian rights, or whether there were separate assessments made, one for the land, and the other for riparian rights?"

The district attorney, in explanation of this question, stated that his purpose was to show:

> "That the land was not assessed for as much as it would have been had the riparian rights been included in the assessments; that the riparian rights for all the various pieces of land that they owned were assessed separately and distinctly from the lands, in order that there might be one assessment of the water rights and one assessment of the real estate."

He further stated that his proposition was "to prove by this witness by extrinsic evidence that the books are incorrect." This the court held he could not do.

It is apparent from the preliminary examination of the witness that his testimony, if received, would have been hearsay, as he did not make the assessment. It is also manifest that his answer could at most have relieved the situation of the appearance of double assessment, and would not have removed the objection as to the description of the property.

But the ruling was clearly justifiable on the ground that parol evidence is not admissible to vary or affect the written record of the assessment.

> "Assessment is, from its legal requirement, and the necessity of preserving its evidence, a written entry, and must depend upon the records of the commissioner's office, and not upon parol testimony, or the private duplicate of the assessor." Philadelphia v. Miller, 49 Pa. 440.

In Allen v. McKay, 139 Cal. 94, 72 Pac. 713, it was held that:

> "The sole and exclusive evidence of the date of the assessment of real property is the date when the assessment roll was completed and certified by the assessor, and the parol evidence of the assessor is not admissible to show an earlier date of such assessment."

In Savings & Loan Soc. v. San Francisco, 146 Cal. 680, 80 Pac. 1089, it is declared:

> "It has often been said that the assessment roll, when completed and certified to the board of supervisors, is the only evidence of the acts and intentions of the assessor," citing cases.

In conclusion it may be stated that no suggestion has been made that respondent is seeking to avoid the payment of a just tax. While that proposition was not urged or directly presented, it is apparent, on the contrary, from what precedes that the assessment in controversy imposed an unjust as well as an illegal burden.

I concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.

HART, J. I concur in the judgment on the ground last stated in the opinion of Justice BURNETT, viz.: That the riparian rights attempted to be assessed are not so described in the assessment as to conduce to a ready or definite identification of the particular water rights thus sought to be burdened. As pointed out by Justice BURNETT, the failure thus to describe said riparian rights is plainly repugnant to the requirements of section 3650 of the Political Code.

The findings and conclusions of law, however, appear to be susceptible of inferences which might be so construed as to establish the principle that riparian rights are not capable of being assessed separately from the lands to which they are appurtenant, and upon this point I am not now prepared to express an opinion satisfactory to myself. But it may not be amiss to suggest that, if such rights may be granted without granting the lands to which they are appurtenant, it would seem that necessarily they may be assessed as property separately from such lands, unless it may justly be held that, although so granted or conveyed to another, they are still to be included in the assessments of such lands, and thus assessed to the grantor of such rights. Manifestly if, having been so granted, such rights may be assessed to the grantee, who has not acquired the lands to which they are appurtenant, then they may be assessed separately from such lands while the title to both the lands and the rights still remain in one person. Of course, as Justice BURNETT declares, if such an assessment is permissible, the description of the riparian rights in the assessment must be such as clearly to show that such rights are connected with or appurtenant to the lands of which they are a part and parcel.

The obvious proposition may also be suggested that riparian rights, although in legal contemplation a part and parcel of the lands to which they are appurtenant, are a mere usufruct, and therefore, when it comes to the assessment of lands to which they are appurtenant, cannot be governed by the principle, "Cujus est solum ejus est usque ad cœlum, et ad inferos."

However, as stated, on the propositions here suggested I express no opinion, since there is no necessity therefor in this case.

1. BROKERS (§ 67*)—RIGHT TO COMPENSATION.

Ordinarily a broker engaged to sell property cannot enforce a contract for compensation, where he was employed by and to be paid by both parties, for an agent cannot serve two masters, although the rule is otherwise as to mere middlemen.

2. BROKERS (§ 67*) — COMPENSATION — "MIDDLEMEN."

One employed merely to bring the buyer and seller together, so as to enable them to make their own contract, is a mere "middleman," and where both parties agree he may recover compensation from each.

3. BROKERS (§ 86*)—COMPENSATION—ACTIONS—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

In an action by a broker who effected a sale of a placer mine, evidence held to warrant a finding that he acted as a mere middleman, and that he was not guilty of any bad faith in accepting compensation from the purchasers, and hence might recover from the seller the agreed commission.

Appeal from Superior Court, Calaveras County; Fred V. Wood, Judge.

Action by J. E. King against Ira Hill Reed. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Snyder & Snyder and Ira Hill Reed, all of San Andreas, for appellant. John Hancock, of San Andreas, and Frank R. Wehe, of San Francisco, for respondent.

HART, J. This is an action to recover the sum of $1,950, alleged to be due the plaintiff from the defendant for services in negotiating and consummating for the latter a sale of a gravel placer mine.

The complaint alleges that, on the 29th day of April, 1907, the defendant entered into a written contract with the plaintiff whereby the first named promised to pay the plaintiff 10 per cent. of the selling price of the gravel placer mine known as "Reed Drift Mine" in the event that plaintiff should sell said mine in accordance with the terms of a bond or agreement for the sale of the same, entered into by and between the plaintiff and the defendant on the 29th day of April, 1907; that the plaintiff thereafter, in pursuance of the terms of said agreement, succeeded in effecting a sale of said mine to J. J. Hickey and Charley Lamb for the sum of $36,000—

> "out of which amount, and under and in pursuance to the terms of said commission agreement, dated April 29, 1907, between the plaintiff and the defendant herein, there was due to plaintiff the sum of thirty-six hundred dollars, being the said ten per cent. of said selling price."

It is alleged that the defendant paid to the plaintiff, on account of the compensation due him under said commission agreement for so effecting the sale of said mine, the sum of $1,650, but no more than said sum, and that there is, therefore, a balance due the plaintiff on the commission which the defendant agreed to pay him for the services referred to the sum of $1,950, for which, together with interest thereon from the date that the same became due, judgment is prayed.

The theory of the defense, as disclosed by the answer, is that the plaintiff, having accepted employment from both the vendor and the vendees to negotiate for the one the sale and the others for the purchase of the property involved, cannot recover upon the pleaded contract for reasons which will hereafter be made to appear.

The answer declares that the plaintiff, in the negotiations with the defendant for the purchase of the mine, in pursuance of the terms of his employment by Hickey and Lamb, induced the defendant to execute, on the 21st day of April, 1907, writings in the words and figures following, to wit:

> "It is hereby understood that if on or before next Friday, April 26th, 1907, Joseph E. King with a Mr. Lamb will visit the Reed mine that I agree to sell the latter the said property at the agreed purchase price of thirty-six thousand dollars and this offer to sell is to hold good for ten days after said Lamb appears on the ground.
> "Apr. 21st, 1907.
> "[Signed] Ira Hill Reed."
> "In the event of a sale of the Reed mine to a Mr. Lamb under an agreement of even date given to Joseph E. King fixing the purchase price at thirty-six thousand dollars it is understood that said King is entitled to a commission of ten per cent. pro rata on payments of said purchase price as made.
> "April 21, 1907.
> "[Signed] Ira Reed Hill."

Said negotiations, proceeds the answer, resulted, on or about the 29th day of April, 1907,

> "in the execution by the defendant of a contract and agreement for the sale of said premises by the defendant to the said Hickey and Lamb, the said contract having been made on behalf of said Hickey and Lamb in the name of plaintiff, J. E. King; that the purchase price of said premises provided in said contract and agreement was the sum of $36,000; that, on said 29th day of April, 1907, the plaintiff procured the defendant to make a further writing, which was and is in the words and figures following, to wit:
> "'It is understood and agreed that in the event of a sale of the Reed mine under a bond made this day to Joseph E. King at the stated price of thirty-six thousand dollars or at any other sum he is entitled to a commission of ten per cent. pro rata on payments as made.
> "'April 29th, 1907.
> "'[Signed] Ira Reed Hill.'"

The answer then avers that, during all said negotiations, the defendant believed that the plaintiff was acting solely for him, and was wholly ignorant of the fact that the plaintiff was acting for Hickey and Lamb therein; that the plaintiff never at any time disclosed to the defendant that he was representing Hickey and Lamb as their agent in said negotiations, but led the defendant to believe that he was acting therein for him alone; that the writings executed by the defendant and quoted above were executed by him with the understanding and belief that the plaintiff was solely representing him (defendant) in said transaction—

> "that defendant would not have executed said writings aforesaid if he had known or had notice before the execution thereof that the plaintiff was so acting as the agent and representative of said Hickey and Lamb."

It is alleged that Hickey and Lamb entered into a contract with the plaintiff whereby they agreed to pay him for effecting the purchase of said mine the sum of $1,800, and that plaintiff has been paid said amount by Hickey and Lamb. The payment of $1,650 by the defendant to the plaintiff, on account of the contract entered into by them, was made, so the answer alleges, before the defendant was made aware of the fact that the plaintiff conducted the negotiations referred to solely as the agent of Hickey and Lamb.

The defendant sets up a counterclaim against the plaintiff based upon the money received by the latter from the defendant under the circumstances above set forth.

The court found all the material allegations of the complaint to be true, and, as to the defense set up in the answer, found that:

> "It is not a fact, as alleged in paragraph 3, that plaintiff negotiated for the purchase of the mining claim or procured the defendant to execute the writings therein mentioned in pursuance only of his employment by Hickey and Lamb or solely as the agent or representative of said Hickey and Lamb."

The court further found that the plaintiff informed the defendant that Hickey and Lamb were to pay the plaintiff a compensation, either in money or an interest in the mine concerned here, to be thereafter fixed by them (Hickey and Lamb) for the services of the plaintiff in negotiating the purchase of said mine; that, upon April 29, 1907 (the date of the last commission agreement between the plaintiff and the defendant), and at all the times he paid the plaintiff said commission aggregating $1,650, and at all times subsequent to the 29th day of April, 1907—

> "the defendant understood and well knew that in the negotiations for the purchase and sale of said mine plaintiff was acting both as the agent of Hickey and Lamb and of defendant, and plaintiff never represented to defendant that he was acting in any other capacity" etc.

The court decided that the defendant was entitled to take nothing on account of the counterclaim set up in the answer, and gave judgment for the plaintiff in the sum sued for, with interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from June 6, 1910. From said judgment and the order denying his motion for a new trial the defendant appeals.

The defendant, although admitting the execution of the agreement to pay the plaintiff a commission of 10 per cent. of the purchase price of the mine, nevertheless contends that said agreement is not binding upon him, since it is made to appear that the plaintiff had previously been employed by Hickey and Lamb to negotiate with the defendant for the purchase for them of said mine. In other words, the position of the defendant is that the plaintiff, in the transaction culminating in the sale of the mine to Hickey and Lamb, acted as the agent of both the latter and the defendant, and on the one hand negotiated for the purchase of the mine and on the other for its sale, and that it is contrary to the policy of the law, or, in other words, against public policy and sound morality, for a party to act as an agent of both parties to a transaction whereby the one purchases property from the other.

The contention of the defendant, as thus stated, presents the most important question involved in this dispute. It is, indeed, the only question submitted here requiring serious consideration.

Some of the authorities make a distinction in such cases between those where the parties to the transaction had knowledge of the fact that the agent is acting for both parties and those where the broker conceals the fact of his double employment. For instance, it is held in Puysley v. Murray, 4 E. D. Smith (N. Y.) 245, that the rule invoked by the defendant here does not apply where the parties are aware, previously to the consummation of the transaction, that the broker is acting as such for both, and the Pennsylvania Supreme Court, in Cannell v. Smith, 142 Pa. 25, 21 Atl. 793, 12 L. R. A. 395, appears to take the same view. But there are many cases which refuse to recognize such distinction and strongly condemn, as intrinsically opposed to those principles of right conduct and practice which should be observed in the prosecution of business dealings between man and man, those business transactions in which one and the same person represents, in the consummation thereof, both parties thereto, and in which the interests of the latter are necessarily antagonistic or conflicting. The cases last referred to rest the invalidity of a contract for a broker's commission in such case upon the broad grounds of public policy, and hold that it cannot even be enforced against a party who, knowing that the broker is already employed by the other party, expressly promises to pay him for his services. Lynch v. Fallon, 11 R. I. 311, 20 Am. Rep. 458. In that case it is said:

> "The general rule is that, though a person may be entitled to pay from both parties to a sale or exchange where he acts merely as a middleman to bring them together (Rupp v. Sampson et al., 16 Gray [Mass.] 398 [77 Am. Dec. 416]; Siegel v. Gould, 7 Lans. [N. Y.] 177), he cannot be allowed to serve as an agent or broker for both, because in such case there is a necessary conflict between his interest and duty, and he is exposed to a temptation to sacrifice the interests of one or both of his principals to secure his double commissions. As agent for the vendor, his duty is to sell at the highest price; as agent for the vendee, his duty is to buy for the lowest; *and, even if the parties bargain for themselves, they are entitled to the * * * skill, knowledge, and advice of the agent, and, at the same time, to communicate with him without the slightest fear of betrayal, so that it is hardly possible for him to be true to the one without being false to the other.* (Italics ours.) The claim to charge commissions to both parties is so unreasonable that it cannot be justified by any custom or usage" —citing a large number of cases.

In Raisin v. Clark, 41 Md. 158, 20 Am. Rep. 66, it was held that the broker could not recover of the party who last employed him, even though the double employment was known to both parties, and the party who first employed him had paid his commission. The court said:

> "The rule * * * forbids the courts to entertain an action founded upon such a contract. * * * It is perhaps possible for the same agent to serve both parties to such a transaction honestly and faithfully, but it is very difficult to do so, and the temptation to do otherwise is so strong that the law has wisely interposed a positive prohibition to every such attempt"—citing Story on Agency, secs. 210, 211.

In Rice v. Davis, 136 Pa. 439, 20 Atl. 513, 20 Am. St. Rep. 931, the plaintiff entered into an agreement with the defendant by the terms of which the former agreed to effect a sale of the latter's interest in a coal company for the sum of $45,000 and for that service the defendant agreed to pay the plaintiff a certain stipulated sum. The plaintiff, under an agreement with the purchasers, received for his services in the transaction four shares of the stock of the company, worth about $4,500. The defendant knew of this arrangement between the plaintiff and the purchasers of the stock. The defendant requested the trial court to instruct the jury that, under those circumstances, the plaintiff could not recover. This request was refused upon the ground that the defendant knew that Rice was to receive four shares of stock from the purchasers, the trial court saying that:

> "Knowledge of these facts by all the parties, without complaint or dissent at the time, and without any evidence of bad faith in the transaction, takes the case out of the class of cases to which we have been referred, where it has been held that an agent is not to be allowed compensation from both parties to a sale."

The judgment upon a verdict for the plaintiff was reversed by the Supreme Court in an opinion from which we feel justified in presenting here the following extended excerpt:

> "The principle, underlying this case, that an agent for the sale of property cannot, at the same time, act as agent for the purchase thereof, or interest himself therein, and thus entitle himself to compensation from both vendor and vendee, is grounded on the infallible declaration that 'no man can serve two masters.' As a rule of public policy, it is distinctly recognized in our text-books on agency, and in numerous adjudicated cases, among which are Everhart v. Searle, 71 Pa. 256; Pennsylvania R. R. Co. v. Flanigan, 112 Pa. 558 [4 Atl. 364], and cases there cited. It forbids that any one intrusted with the interests of others shall in any manner make the business an object of personal interest to himself, because, from a frailty of nature, one who has the power will be too readily seized with the inclination to use the opportunity for serving his own interests at the expense of his principal. The various forms of agency to which the principle is applicable, and the reasons for upholding it, etc., are referred to in Everhart v. Searle, 71 Pa. 256. The controlling facts in that case were briefly these: Flagg, the owner of land, employed Searle to sell the same, and agreed to give him for his services all that he obtained over $125 per acre. Searle found several applicants for the land, but he finally agreed to give Everhart the preference, for which the latter agreed to pay him $500. Flagg and Everhart were brought together, and the sale was concluded. They each refused to pay Searle anything, because, by acting for both of them, he had undertaken to serve two masters. Suit was then brought against Everhart, and judgment obtained for the $500, and interest. On behalf of the defendant in error, it was contended that Searle neither did nor contemplated any wrong against either vendor or vendee; that neither of them was induced to act by any false representation made by him; that Flagg got his price for the land, and Everhart secured the preference for which he was willing to pay $500, and hence there was no error in permitting the plaintiff to recover. Referring to the position thus assumed, Chief Justice Thompson said there was plausibility and seeming force in the argument that Flagg, the plaintiff's principal in the sale, was not injured by the arrangement with the defendant, etc., but it is unsound. The transaction is to be regarded as against the policy of the law. It matters not that no fraud was meditated, and no injury done. The rule is not intended to be remedial of actual wrong, but preventive of the possibility of it. * * *

"Conceding, for the sake of argument, that it would be competent for persons, circumstanced as the parties in this case were, to waive or suspend, by mutual agreement, the operation of a rule of public policy, it cannot be successfully contended that such agreement may be inferred either from knowledge of the fact that such rule has been violated, or from silence or failure to dissent at the time, or from all these combined. Nothing short of clear and satisfactory proof of an express agreement to do so should be regarded as sufficient for that purpose."

The same point is discussed in the case of Clark v. Allen, 125 Cal. 276, 57 Pac. 985. It was there contended, as here, that the plaintiff acted as broker for both the seller and purchaser in a sale of real estate, and to be compensated by both. While the court held that the facts showed that the broker acted only as a middleman, and not as an agent or broker, and was therefore entitled to recover on his commission agreement with the seller as well as legally to claim the compensation agreed to be paid him by the purchaser, it declared that the general principle invoked here by the defendant was sound, thus recognizing the propriety of its application in all proper cases. See, also, Rauer's Law, etc., Co. v. Bradbury, 3 Cal. App. 256, 257, 84 Pac. 1007, opinion by Judge Harrison, and cases therein cited.

[1] With the rule as it is applied in the above last mentioned cases we are fully in accord, and cordially assent to the very just principle which forbids the enforcement of a contract for the compensation of a broker for consummating the sale of property where it is made to appear that he has been employed and is to be paid for his services by both parties to the transaction to which his contract relates. It is, as the above cases declare, no legal defense to such a contract to say that, in a given case, the broker may not have acted in bad faith or dishonestly with either of the parties, or that neither of the principals has suffered actual injury or loss by reason of his double employment. The vice of a double employment in such a case does not depend so much upon what its consequences may have been in a given case as upon what its result is most likely to be in all cases. In other words, the vice of a double employment in such a case inheres in that fact itself, because of the temptation it opens up for double dealing by the broker with one or the other of his principals—because, indeed, it is an employment which is directly opposed to the idea and principles underlying a confidential or fiduciary relation.

Of course, where, as in Clark v. Allen, supra, a party acts as a mere middleman, that is, where he is merely instrumental in bringing together the seller and buyer, who themselves wholly make and carry out the bargain without in that connection any interposition in any manner or degree by such middleman, the situation is entirely different, for then the latter acts as agent or broker for neither the seller nor buyer—there is, in other words, no fiduciary relation existing between him and either the seller or buyer in the transaction, and if, in such case, either or both desire and agree to compensate him for his trouble in bringing them together upon a proposition, with either the making or carrying out of which he has had nothing to do, there can be no legal or moral objection to the enforcement of such agreement.

We might, perhaps, be justified in resting the conclusion that the contract sued upon is one which, under the doctrine of the cases last above referred to, cannot be enforced upon the findings of the court; but the claim is urged that, although the plaintiff in a sense acted for both the vendor and the vendee, his position was only that of a middleman, and that the part he took in the transaction was merely to bring the parties together upon a proposition which was fixed and definite, he taking no part either in the making or carrying out of the bargain. It is therefore deemed essential, in order to determine this question, to look into the evidence to some extent.

It appears that the plaintiff, whose business was that of a broker, engaged principally in negotiating sales of mining properties, on an occasion long prior to the date of the first of the several transactions directly leading up to this litigation, had been employed by the defendant to sell the mine involved here. Originally Reed wanted $60,000 for the property, but later reduced the price to $40,000. King did not succeed in disposing of the mine at the time or on the terms above mentioned, and nothing more seems to have been done either by King or Reed looking to the sale of the mine until about the latter part of March, 1907, at which time King met Reed near a small bridge in the town of San Andreas, the place of residence of the latter, and had a conversation with him relative to the mine. King testified:

"He asked me in that conversation about the mine and suggested that I try to sell it. * * * The judge [referring to Reed] said, 'What can you do for me on the Reed mine? She is looking pretty good just now.' I said, 'Judge, I can't do anything for you on that mine; your price is too high.' He said, 'What would you call a reasonable price?' I said, 'Judge, I told you what I think a reasonable price for the mine, about $35,000.' He said, 'I wouldn't take that, Joe; that is like giving it away; however, I am kind of hard-pressed for money just now, and would take a reasonable figure for the mine.' I says, 'What do you call a reasonable figure, Judge?' He says, 'Why, I don't know just now. I will think the matter over and let you know.'"

It appears that one R. R. Smith was associated to some extent with the plaintiff in the business of selling mining property. It does not clearly appear whether Smith was a permanent partner of King, or merely connected with him in occasional deals of the character of the one here. It does appear, however, that in the particular transaction concerned here he was interested with King, and the two acted together or jointly in an effort to effect the sale or purchase of the property. Smith, it seems, prior to the time at which King secured the option involved here for the purchase of the mine from Reed, had been talking to Hickey and Lamb about purchasing the mine—that is to say, he endeavored to interest them in the property with a view of effecting a sale of it to them.

Lamb testified that a short while subsequent to the time Smith first spoke to him about buying the property, the latter introduced him to King. In his presence, Smith and King held a conversation in which it was agreed that King should procure an option for the purchase of the mine and that the same should thereafter be turned over to Hickey and Lamb. They (King and Smith), testified Lamb, said that they would secure the option at the very lowest price, and Hickey gave similar testimony, which was not contradicted or the fact to which it relates denied by either King or Smith. In this connection, it may furthermore be noted that Reed testified (and upon this point his testimony is nowhere contradicted) that King said to him that "he had parties he thought would take the mine, if I would put the price at the lowest possible figure." Hickey and Lamb concluded to take the option, if the same could be secured by King and the price for the mine was reasonable. King then proceeded to press negotiations with Reed for an option on the mine, and urged him to put the price of the property down to the lowest figure that he might be inclined to sell it for.

On April 20, 1907, and after the understanding had with Hickey and Lamb, as above related, and, as will be seen, prior to the date of the execution by Reed of the written memorandum of April 21, 1907, authorizing King to sell the mine and of the commission agreement of the same date, the plaintiff addressed the following letter to said R. R. Smith:

"Richard Russell Smith, Dear Sir and Friend —I went down to the old man's mine today & I panned 12 pans as they came out, of the mine & the result I ship to you today under a separate cover in the form of a package. You can show it and weigh it for Mr. Lam & tell Him that it is 12 Pans one pan off of each car just as it was coming to the mill to day when I was down there. He has a Brest about one hundred and 60 ft. wide of good dirt. I am to see him Monday & see about a Bond for time enough examine it & you tell Mr. Lamb I will surely count on him & you showing up when I phone to you that I have the Bond. I tell you friend Dick that property at $30,000.00 or $35,000.00 is cheap & awful cheap if a man gets Holt of it & opens it up. The old man has a good foreman there now but he is threatening to quit. The old man is still at the same old game of pulling his boss around. Now friend Dick I am going after the old man & pull him down for all I can & then I will turn it over to Mr. Lam, if he wants it for just what I get it for, he to allow us a small Interest in it a small Interest in that mine will be worth a lot more than a commission if the mine is put on its feet sure as I am writing this letter to you. Now if Mr. Lam, will Join us in this he will never regret his buy for he cannot fail. I have played this game of gravel mining to long to get very badly FOOLED. I am not one of Solomans profits or wise men but I know a good thing in gravel when I see it & that mine would be cheap at $50,000.00 but I am going to do my best to make the old man believe it would be well sold at $30,000. Well you and Mr. Lam will hear from me in a day or to be sure to show Mr. Lam the gold I send that mine is OK. Yours, J. E. King.

"Notice I have written this letter so as to get Lam interested so you can just let on as if you dont know whether I wanted you to expose my letter or Not but let him read it just the same; the mine is OK Dick. Joe."

After the above letter was written, and on the 29th day of April, 1907, Reed and the plaintiff entered into and executed a written agreement whereby the former agreed:

"In consideration of the faithful performance of the terms and conditions by said party of the second part (plaintiff) as hereinafter set forth, * * * to sell and convey the said 'Reed' mine to said party of the second part, at any time within sixty (60) days from the date of these presents, upon payments and conditions as follows"

—and then follows a specification of said "terms and conditions."

Contemporaneously with the execution of the foregoing agreement, the defendant executed a second commission agreement, whereby, as in the first similar agreement, he agreed to pay the plaintiff 10 per cent. on "the stated price of $36,000.00, or any other sum" for which the mine might be sold, the commission to be paid pro rata on payments as made according to the terms specified in the bond.

On May 18, 1907, King assigned the bond or option obtained from Reed for the purchase of the mine to Hickey and Lamb, the latter agreeing in writing to pay King, in consideration of said assignment—

"five per cent. of the total purchase price of the said $36,000.00, amounting to the sum of one thousand eight hundred dollars," etc.

Thereafter, Hickey and Lamb, exercising their right under said bond or option, purchased the mine from Reed for the sum of $36,000.

It was admitted by King that he received from Hickey and Lamb the sum of $900 on account of the commission which they agreed to pay him as a consideration for the bond or option.

It is, as we have seen, admitted in the complaint that King received from Reed the sum of $1,650 on account of the commission which the former agreed to pay him for negotiating the sale of the property.

The foregoing involves a sufficient review of the evidence to show beyond peradventure that, in the transaction resulting in the sale of the mine, the plaintiff was more than a mere middleman; that, indeed his position was that of a broker, and as such represented in the deal both the vendor and the vendees, negotiating for the one the sale and for the others the purchase of the property. Upon this point no question of conflict in the evidence arises. The plaintiff admitted the dual employment. In other words, according to his own testimony, he was employed by both the parties to the deal. His commission agreements with the vendor and vendees show that he was employed or retained by each of the parties to the transaction to consummate its execution, for which service he was to receive compensation from each. Obviously, where one is employed as a broker to sell or negotiate the purchase of property, he becomes the agent and not a mere middleman of the party thus employing him. His principal is then entitled to the full and exclusive benefit of his skill, knowledge, and advice in the transaction which thus he has agreed to manage, and obviously this service the broker cannot give if he also be employed by one intending or desiring to buy the property and whose interest in the transaction must necessarily be adverse to that of the owner.

The Smith letter, which constitutes testimony the verity of which is not required to be determined by the aid of those rules by which the question of the truth or falsity of testimony given ore tenus at nisi prius is tested, and which, therefore, tells its own story, is distinctively significant in that it clearly shows that, from the very beginning, King's scheme was to secure authority from both the vendor and vendees to effect a sale and purchase of the mine, from which fact the inference is clear that thus he desired to place himself in a position by which he could himself entirely control the situation and so manage the deal as to insure the receipt by him of the compensation which both the vendor and vendees might promise to pay him. This construction of the letter is clearly confirmed by his subsequent conversations with Reed in which he declared to him that he (Reed) asked too great a sum for the mine and suggested that he reduce the price to a reasonable figure—a figure at which he had considerable reason for believing that he could sell it to Hickey and Lamb. But the letter in question is particularly important because it emphasizes the wisdom of the rule which puts the stamp of disapproval upon the act of a broker in accepting employment as such from both the vendor and the vendee in the same transaction, in which, at one and the same time, in consideration of a promise of compensation by each, he is to negotiate for the seller the sale and for the buyer the purchase of the property involved. Under such circumstances, a broker cannot ordinarily be fair and faithful to either of his principals. Indeed, he thus places himself in a position in which the temptation to subordinate the interests of at least one or the other of his principals in the transaction to his own is so very great that it is not easy even if possible to resist it. As before declared, under the rule announced in the cases above referred to, the mere fact of the double employment in a transaction involving adversary or conflicting interests itself vitiates or renders void and nonenforceable such a contract as the one here, regardless of the consequences flowing therefrom in a given or particular case, and, under the admitted facts in this case, the contract upon which the plaintiff has sued comes clearly within the bar of the doctrine so announced, and cannot for that reason legally be enforced.

As to the money already paid to the plaintiff by the defendant, our conclusion is that the latter should, under the circumstances disclosed by the evidence and the findings, be held to have waived, to the extent of said payment only, the rule proscribing the enforcement of such a contract. In other words, since the court finds, upon sufficient evidence, that the defendant, at all times pending the existence of the transaction here, knew of the double employment of the plaintiff, the voluntary payment by the former to the latter of a portion of the stipulated commission should be regarded and treated as the equivalent of an express waiver by the defendant of the right, otherwise available to him, to claim the invalidity of so much of the contract as has been voluntarily executed by him. This is merely to apply the rule that, where a contract is, for certain reasons, void ab initio, and a party thereto voluntarily performs its terms when fully cognizant of the circumstances which render it invalid, he will not where, as here, he has in point of fact received some benefit from such contract, be aided by the law in setting it aside and having restored to him the thing with which he has parted in the performance of the same. In this case, as seen, only part of the contract was executed by the defendant under the indicated circumstances, and, while this partial performance cannot render valid the part unexecuted, it certainly must, upon every consideration of justice, have that effect upon the part so executed.

For the reasons set forth herein, the judgment and order are reversed.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; BURNETT, J.

On Rehearing.

BURNETT, J. In this cause a rehearing was granted by this court for the purpose of giving further consideration to the question whether the plaintiff acted as an agent for both parties or only as a mere middleman in the transaction involving the sale of the mine referred to in the complaint. A general view of the case may be presented by the following quotation from the opinion filed herein, September 29, 1913:

"This is an action to recover the sum of $1,950, alleged to be due the plaintiff from the defendant for services in negotiating and consummating for the latter a sale of a gravel placer mine.

"The complaint alleges that, on the 29th day of April, 1907, the defendant entered into a written contract with the plaintiff, whereby the first named promised to pay the plaintiff 10 per cent. of the selling price of the gavel placer mine known as 'Reed Drift Mine,' in the event that plaintiff should sell said mine in accordance with the terms of a bond or agreement for the sale of the same, entered into by and between the plaintiff and the defendant on the 29th day of April, 1907; that the plaintiff thereafter, in pursuance of the terms of said agreement, succeeded in effecting a sale of said mine to J. J. Hickey and Charley Lamb for the sum of $36,000, 'out of which amount, and under and in pursuance to the terms of said commission agreement, dated April 29, 1907, between the plaintiff and the defendant herein, there was due to plaintiff the sum of $3,600, being the said 10 per cent. of said selling price.' It is alleged that the defendant paid to the plaintiff, on account of the compensation due him under said commission agreement for so effecting the sale of said mine, the sum of $1,650, but no more than said sum, and that there is therefore a balance due the plaintiff on the commission which the defendant agreed to pay him for the services referred to the sum of $1,950, for which, together with interest thereon from the date that the same became due, judgment is prayed.

"The theory of the defense, as disclosed by the answer, is that the plaintiff, having accepted employment from both the vendor and the vendees to negotiate for the one the sale and the others the purchase of the property involved, cannot recover upon the pleaded contract for reasons which will hereafter be made to appear.

"The answer declares that the plaintiff, in the negotiations with the defendant for the purchase of the mine, in pursuance of the terms of his employment by Hickey and Lamb, induced the defendant to execute, on the 21st day of April, 1907, writings in the words and figures following, to wit:

"'It is hereby understood that if on or before next Friday, April 26th, 1907, Joseph E. King with a Mr. Lamb will visit the Reed mine that I agree to sell the latter the said property at the agreed purchase price of thirty-six thousand dollars and this offer to sell is to hold good for ten days after said Lamb appears on the ground.

"'Apr. 21st, 1907.

"'[Signed] Ira Hill Reed.'

"'In the event of a sale of the Reed mine to a Mr. Lamb under an agreement of even date given to Joseph E. King fixing the purchase price at thirty-six thousand dollars it is understood that said King is entitled to a commission of ten per cent. pro rata on payments of said purchase price as made.

"'April 21, 1907.

"'[Signed] Ira Hill Reed.'

"Said negotiations, proceeds the answer, resulted, on or about the 29th day of April, 1907, 'in the execution by the defendant of a contract and agreement for the sale of said premises by the defendant to the said Hickey and Lamb, the said contract having been made on behalf of said Hickey and Lamb in the name of plaintiff, J. E. King; that the purchase price of said premises provided in said contract and agreement was the sum of $36,000; that, on said 29th day of April, 1907, the plaintiff procured the defendant to make a further writing which was and is in the words and figures following, to-wit:

"'It is understood and agreed that in the event of a sale of the Reed mine under a bond made this day to Joseph E. King at the stated price of thirty-six thousand dollars or at any other sum he is entitled to a commission of ten per cent. pro rata on payments as made.

"'April 29th, 1907.

"'[Signed] Ira Hill Reed.'

"The answer then avers that, during all said negotiations, the defendant believed that the plaintiff was acting solely for him, and was wholly ignorant of the fact that the plaintiff was acting for Hickey and Lamb therein; that the plaintiff never at any time disclosed to the defendant that he was representing Hickey and Lamb as their agent in said negotiations, but led the defendant to believe that he was acting therein for him alone; that the writings executed by the defendant and quoted above were executed by him with the understanding and belief that the plaintiff was solely representing him (defendant) in said transaction; 'that defendant would not have executed said writings aforesaid if he had known or had notice before the execution thereof that the plaintiff was so acting as the agent and representative of said Hickey and Lamb.'

"It is alleged that Hickey and Lamb entered into a contract with the plaintiff whereby they agreed to pay him for effecting the purchase of said mine the sum of $1,800, and that plaintiff has been paid said amount by Hickey and Lamb. The payment of $1,650 by the defendant to the plaintiff, on account of the contract entered into by them, was made, so the answer alleges, before the defendant was made aware of the fact that the plaintiff conducted the negotiations referred to solely as the agent of Hickey and Lamb.

"The defendant sets up a counterclaim against the plaintiff based upon the money received by the latter from the defendant under the circumstances above set forth.

"The court found all the material allegations of the complaint to be true, and, as to the defense set up in the answer, found that: 'It is not a fact, as alleged in paragraph 3, that plaintiff negotiated for the purchase of the mining claim or procured the defendant to execute the writings therein mentioned in pursuance only of his employment by Hickey and Lamb or solely as the agent or representative of said Hickey and Lamb.' The court further found that the plaintiff informed the defendant that Hickey and Lamb were to pay the plaintiff a compensation, either in money or an interest in the mine concerned here, to be thereafter fixed by them (Hickey and Lamb) for the services of the plaintiff in negotiating the purchase of said mine; that, upon April 29, 1907 (the date of the last commission agreement between the plaintiff and the defendant), and at all the times he paid the plaintiff said commission aggregating $1,650, and at all times subsequent to the 29th day of April, 1907, 'the defendant understood and well knew that in the negotiations for the purchase and sale of said mine plaintiff was acting both as the agent of Hickey and Lamb and of defendant, and plaintiff never represented to defendant that he was acting in any other capacity.'"

The judgment was in favor of plaintiff in the sum sued for, and the defendant has appealed therefrom and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

In passing to the consideration of the question set forth at the outset, it may be incidentally stated that the evidence is sufficient to support the finding of the court that defendant was notified by plaintiff as to the employment by said Hickey and Lamb. The controlling question is the one suggested, however; that is, Can we uphold plaintiff's theory that he was a middleman, that he simply brought the parties together, and that they made the bargain and consummated the sale and purchase without the exercise of any discretion on the part of plaintiff?

[2] In such case it is not disputed, as stated in the former opinion herein, that if—

> "either party or both desire and agree to compensate him for his trouble in bringing them together upon a proposition, with either the making or the carrying out of which he has had nothing to do, there can be no legal or moral objection to the enforcement of such agreement."

The principle applicable to such capacity and which distinguishes it from the fiduciary relation of agency has been announced and illustrated in numerous decisions of the courts.

In Clark v. Allen, 125 Cal. 278, 57 Pac. 985, it is said:

> "If the duty of the broker is simply to bring together two men who desire to exchange their lands, and the broker's entire duty is performed when he has brought the two men together, then we see nothing against good morals and a sound public policy in allowing compensation to the broker from each of the parties. In such a case, the broker is in no sense representing conflicting interests. He has nothing whatever to do with the trade. Under the contract his advice and assistance to either party is not called for. Upon the state of facts here assumed, the broker may be termed a middleman and not an agent in the strict sense of the term."

In discussing the legal and moral principle involved in the dual employment which is condemned by the law, it was said, by Judge De Haven, in McLure v. Luke, 154 Fed. 650, 84 C. C. A. 4, 24 L. R. A. (N. S.) 659, that:

> "It will be found upon examination that this principle of law is only applied in cases where the agent is clothed with some discretion in the matter of advising or negotiating the sale or purchase of property, when the duty which he owes to one principal is inconsistent with that which he owes to the other."

Among the cases cited therein is Knauss v. Krueger Brewing Co., 142 N. Y. 70, 36 N. E. 867, in which the opinion was written by Judge Peckham, afterwards Associate Justice of the United States Supreme Court. The property involved was a brewery, which was sold for $1,822,000. The plaintiff was employed to bring the possible buyer and seller together and in case of sale he was to be compensated by defendant. The plaintiff testified that he was to have nothing to do with fixing the price or terms of sale, that being left to the principals. The defense was that plaintiff, without the knowledge of defendant, was in the employment of the proposed purchaser. The court, in its opinion, said:

> "The whole matter depends upon the character of his employment. If A. is employed by B. to find him a purchaser for his house upon terms and conditions to be determined by B. when he meets the purchaser, I can see nothing improper or inconsistent with any duty he owes B. for A. to accept an employment from C. to find one who will sell his house to C. upon terms which they may agree upon when they meet. And there is no violation of duty in such case in agreeing for commissions from each party upon a bargain being struck, or in failing to notify each party of his employment by the other."

The term "middleman" is defined by the Supreme Court of South Dakota, in Langford v. Issenhuth, 28 S. D. 451, 134 N. W. 889, as follows:

> "A middleman is a broker whose duties are limited by his contract to finding and procuring a purchaser able, willing, and ready to accept his client's terms, or to effect a transaction with his client on any terms satisfactory to both, the term 'middleman' being merely descriptive of the nature of the contract of employment, he being in no fiduciary relation to his principal nor under any obligation not to receive compensation from the opposite party to the transaction, while a broker, in addition to the duties of a middleman,' is employed to use discretionary authority for the benefit of his employer and to act for his best interests, and therefore may not accept a secret double employment or commissions from both parties."

The whole subject is exhaustively reviewed in the note to Leathers v. Canfield, as reported in 45 L. R. A. 33, to which we refer, contenting ourselves with this quotation to which is appended by the author a long list of authorities:

> "Where there is an agreement to pay a middleman for services of value rendered, honestly entered into, it cannot be avoided on the ground that another person with distinct and independent interest has agreed by a separate contract to pay for the same services, and if the broker only undertakes to bring the parties together so that they may make a trade if they choose without his interference in the contract itself as the agent of either party, he is entitled to compensation from both on an arrangement from each."

[3] The record before us, scrutinized with a view of finding support for the conclusion of the trial court, brings the case clearly within the purview of the foregoing declared characteristics of a "middleman." We are justified in asserting that plaintiff had for a long time been authorized to sell the property for defendant, the original price being for $60,000 and then being reduced to $40,000; defendant having executed to plaintiff a bond for the sale at these respective figures. Efforts were made by plaintiff to secure a purchaser, but without avail; plaintiff testifying that he brought four different parties to the mine before bringing Hickey and Lamb. Plaintiff then had a conversation with defendant in which the latter asked the former what he could do for him "on this mine," and the reply was that he thought his price was too high. Thereupon the defendant fixed the price at $36,000. Plaintiff had in view Hickey and Lamb as probable purchasers, having, it seems, succeeded in getting Mr. Lamb interested in the property. This was made known to defendant, and he executed said contracts of April 21st set out in his answer. Hickey and Lamb came to the mine, and in connection with King personally examined and prospected the property, with the knowledge of Reed, it being known to Hickey and Lamb that King had the option for the sale. The contract of sale was prepared and executed by defendant on April 29th, and after certain changes were made therein, on suggestion of Mr. Hickey, said contract was delivered to King. The price of the property and all the terms of the contract were determined by the parties themselves and King had no discretion whatever in the premises. The whole service performed by him, in brief, consisted in directing the attention of Lamb and Hickey to the mine and in bringing the vendor and vendees together, whereby, through their own negotiations, resulted the sale and purchase of the property. There was not present, therefore, the confidential relation which renders a dual capacity obnoxious to equitable and moral principles.

Indeed, viewing the evidence as the rule requires, we must conclude that there was no taint of fraud or duplicity in the transaction from beginning to end, that no misrepresentations were made and no deceit was practiced by King, and that the respective parties to the sale were informed of the fact that King was to receive compensation from the other.

There is, however, one circumstance that might seem at first blush somewhat irreconcilable with the theory of honorable conduct on the part of respondent. This pertains to a letter written by plaintiff to one Richard Russell Smith, on the 20th day of April, 1907. The letter, though, is rather indicative of the usual broker's "puffing" of property than of downright cunning or dishonesty. It presents also an amusing revelation of the illiteracy and prattling simplicity of the author. Its general tenor may be shown by the concluding portion as follows:

> "I am not one of Solomans profits or wise men but I know a good thing in gravel when I see it & that mine would be cheap at $50,000.00 but I am going to do my best to make the old man believe it would be well sold at $30,000. Well you and Mr. Lam will hear from me in a day or to be sure to show Mr. Lam the gold I send that mine is OK. * * *
> "Notice I have written this letter so as to get Lam intersted so you can just let on as if you dont know whether I wanted you to expose my letter or Not but let him read it just the same; the mine is OK Dick."

But whatever may be thought of the letter it cannot be regarded as a factor in the case. There is nothing to show that it was ever seen by Lamb or Hickey, nor is there any ground for the inference that King induced Reed to believe that the mine was worth no more than the actual selling price. In fact, no one had better knowledge of the mine than the owner, who was anxious to sell, and who therefore fixed the price at a sum which he and King agreed might be realized.

That Reed was abundantly satisfied with the sale is disclosed by the circumstance that after receiving $10,000 as a part of the purchase price, rather than retain that as a profit together with the mine, he brought suit to recover the balance due under the contract. It may be said, also, that it is declared by respondent and not denied that the mine proved to be valueless.

After a careful examination of the record and of the authorities, we are satisfied that the evidence is sufficient to support the findings, that they support the judgment, and that no prejudicial error was committed by the trial court. The judgment and order are therefore affirmed.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; HART, J.

McGINN v. WILLEY. (Civ. 1147.)

1. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (§ 114*) — CONTRACTS—COMPLAINT—SUFFICIENCY.

A complaint for specific performance of a contract to sell real estate, which sets forth the terms of the contract, tender by the purchaser of the balance due, a demand for a deed, and the vendor's refusal to comply, and that the contract was fair and equitable, is sufficient; it being presumed, if necessary, that the contract was in writing, in the absence of anything indicating the contrary.

2. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF (§ 129*)—SALE OF LAND — PAROL CONTRACT — PARTIAL PERFORMANCE.

A complaint for specific performance of a parol contract to sell real estate, which alleges payment of the price by the purchaser, and that the vendor had delivered possession to the purchaser, who went into possession by virtue of the contract and performed work on the property, enhancing its value, and remained in possession, states facts to take the case out of the statute of frauds.

3. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 54*) — CONTRACTS—PERFORMANCE BY PURCHASER — TITLE ACQUIRED.

Where a purchaser of land performs his part of the contract, he acquires the equitable title, and the vendor holds the legal title only in trust, and must account to the purchaser for any money received while acting as trustee.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Cent. Dig. § 85; Dec. Dig. § 54.*]

4. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (§ 129*)—PURCHASE OF LAND—RELIEF.

A purchaser of land suing for the specific performance of the contract which he has performed is entitled, not only to a decree of specific performance, but to a decree for any moneys realized by the vendor while holding the legal title in trust for him.

5. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (§ 121*) — CONTRACTS—PERFORMANCE—EVIDENCE.

Evidence held to support a finding of a valid parol contract for the sale of real estate followed by part performance by the purchaser, who tendered the balance due and demanded a deed, justifying relief, in view of Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1971, 1972, requiring every transfer of real property to be in writing, without abridging the power of any court to compel the performance of an agreement in case of part performance.

6. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 941*)—SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (§ 8*)—GRANTING OF RELIEF—DISCRETION OF TRIAL COURT—REVIEW.

The trial court has wide discretion in granting specific performance, and, where there has been a part performance of a parol contract to convey real estate, and the trial court has decreed specific performance, an appellate court will not interfere, unless the decision is inequitable and unjust.

7. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF (§ 129*)—PAROL CONTRACT TO CONVEY REAL ESTATE—PART PERFORMANCE.

Where a vendor was only a tenant in common, the possession of the purchaser as an element of part performance to take the parol contract out of the statute of frauds need only be exclusive of the vendor.

8. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (§ 13*)—CONTRACTS ENFORCEABLE.

A decree for specific performance of a contract to sell land will be rendered, though it is impossible for the vendor to perform by reason of a subsequent contract of sale to third persons, where he has not entirely divested himself of the legal title, and as to that the decree will operate.

9. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (§ 121*) — CONTRACTS—EVIDENCE.

In a suit for specific performance of a contract to sell an undivided interest in real estate, evidence held to sustain a finding that a subsequent agreement was not intended as a substitute for the original, and that the original agreement remained in force, authorizing relief.

10. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (§ 117*)—PLEADING—NEW MATTER.

In a suit for the specific performance of a contract to convey real estate, a new contract alleged to have been substituted for that sued on cannot be relied on, unless pleaded.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. §§ 377–381; Dec. Dig. § 117.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Mariposa County; J. J. Trabucco, Judge.

Action by Edward McGinn against Charles F. Willey. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. B. Curtin and F. P. Otis, both of Sonora, for appellant. J. C. Webster, of Sonora, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. [1] We can perceive no valid objection to the sufficiency of the complaint in this action for the specific performance of an agreement to sell one-sixth interest in a certain mine in Mariposa county. The terms of the contract are set out, the tender of the balance due, and a demand for a deed, and defendant's refusal to comply with the demand appear, and it is further alleged:

> "That the said agreement of purchase and sale between plaintiff and defendant was in every respect fair and equitable, and no advantage of any kind was taken of defendant, and the said consideration so to be paid was a fair consideration for the said interest in said property, and the said sum of $265 was the value of said interest in said property at the time of said agreement of sale between plaintiff and defendant and the full amount asked by defendant therefor."

[2] In support of the complaint it would be presumed, if necessary, that said contract to sell and purchase was in writing; nothing appearing to the contrary. However, upon the supposition that it was a parol agreement, which it was shown to be by the evidence, there is sufficient to take the case out of the statute of frauds by reason of the allegation of certain payments, and that "defendant then and there delivered possession of the said property to plaintiff, and plaintiff went into possession thereof under and by virtue of said contract of purchase and performed work and labor on the said property, and has ever since remained in possession thereof," and that said work and labor in the development and improvement thereof enhanced the value of said property.

[3] Another element, somewhat unusual in this class of cases, is injected by the allegation that, after plaintiff had gone into possession of the property under said agreement of sale, the defendant and the owners of the other interests in the mine entered into an executory contract to sell it to other parties for $30,000, a portion of which had been paid to defendant, and that the executory contract was executed by defendant "under the express agreement and understanding that he was acting as the trustee of the plaintiff herein in executing the same, and that he would account to the plaintiff for all moneys realized by virtue thereof by the said defendant, but the said defendant has failed and refused to account to plaintiff for the said money or any part thereof, and has failed and refused, and still continues to refuse, to pay the same to plaintiff, or any part thereof, though demanded so to do."

[4] It is clear that, if the contract of sale between plaintiff and defendant was executed as alleged in the complaint, plaintiff became the equitable owner of the property upon compliance with its terms, defendant holding the legal title in trust for the benefit of plaintiff, and it would necessarily follow that the latter would be entitled to whatever was paid by another for that interest; but we have the additional consideration that defendant promised to account therefor to plaintiff, and we can discover no reason why the latter should be required to resort to another action to recover it.

The principle is analogous to that set forth in the case of Heinlen v. Martin, 53 Cal. 341, wherein it is said:

> "If the plaintiff holds only the equitable title, and is forced to go into a court of equity to compel a conveyance of the legal title, it is well settled that he cannot afterwards maintain an action at law for the mesne profits, for the reasons already indicated; and, if he cannot recover rents and profits in the action in equity, he is without remedy. But fortunately a court of equity will not permit so great a wrong, and will afford complete relief in such a case. 'If there is a trust estate, and the cestui que trust comes into equity upon his title to recover the estate, he will be decreed to have the further relief of an account of the rents and profits.' 1 Story, Eq. Jur. 512; 3 Atk. R. 124."

In the opinion is cited, with approval, Worrall v. Munn, 38 N. Y. 137, wherein the facts were similar to those herein, except that the third party had taken possession; the New York Court of Appeals declaring:

> "The general rule on this subject, as laid down by the elementary writers, and in the adjudged cases, is that the court of equity will, so far as possible, place the parties in the same situation as they would have been if the contract had been performed according to its terms; and, to that end, the vendor will be regarded as trustee * * * for the benefit of the purchaser, and liable to account to him for the rents and profits, and the purchaser will be treated as trustee of the purchase money, if not paid, and will be charged with interest thereon, * * * and, when the vendor is himself in the actual occupation of the premises, he is charged with the value of the use and occupation."

See, also, Swain v. Burnette, 76 Cal. 303, 18 Pac. 394.

Here, as we have seen, it appears that plaintiff was entitled to a conveyance at the time of the execution of said contract of sale with said third parties, and therefore, in equity, he was deemed the owner and a just claimant of the consideration received by defendant.

An additional assurance of the soundness of respondent's position is found, of course, in the allegation of defendant's agreement to account to plaintiff.

[5] There can be no doubt as to the sufficiency of the evidence to support the finding as to a valid sale of the premises to plaintiff. This is demonstrated by his own testimony, which, in material respects, is corroborated by the testimony of other witnesses. As to this point we deem it unnecessary to do more than quote the following from plaintiff's statements on the witness stand:

> "Willey told me that he wanted to sell his one-sixth interest in that mine, and that he would take $264 for the same, and I accepted his offer. I wanted to take it all then; but I didn't have the money to pay for it, and he said I could pay one half cash and the other half within one year, and I paid the half, and he accepted it. I had a lot of mining supplies and materials at Stent, and I loaded those tools and cars and blacksmith shop tools, all of which was about the value of $400, and I put them on two wagons and pulled the wagons to the top of the hill and started for the mine the next morning. I told Willey at that time, if I took out a pocket of $10,000, he would be sorry he sold me the mine; but he said it was all right, and whatever I took out of the mine belonged to me, that all he wanted out of it was the amount he had put into it, that he was glad to get out of it, and everything I made out of it I was welcome to. Two hundred sixty-five dollars was a reasonable price for his interest in the mine at that time. It was the value of that interest. After I took possession of the property I worked on the mine timbering the same. We were trying to make a showing to sell the mine. We worked there five months from August, 1907, my brother, William, and myself, and then I came back, and I brought Pete Strike with me; that was about the last of January or in February, 1908, and he worked two months. We were drilling and blasting and looking for pay ore, drifting and opening up the mine, left the quartz and ore right on the property for the purpose of opening it up to get a purchaser. From July, 1907, the work I did enhanced the value of the property. Before the payment of $132.50 was due before the end of that first year, I asked for further time, and Willey extended the time. He told me it would be all right, I could take plenty of time; and he extended the time to September, 1909. About September 1, 1909, I had the balance of $132.50 and took the same to the defendant, Mr. Willey, and offered it to him in payment of the balance due, but I wanted to use $32.50, and Mr. Willey said I could use the $32.50 as long as I wanted it; I could pay him when it suited my convenience. I went into possession under that agreement of purchase."

As to the bond to sell the property he testified:

> "That agreement was entered into on November 13, 1909. I negotiated with James McGinn about the sale of that mine. The defendant, Mr. Willey, had nothing whatever to do with any agreement relative to the sale of the mine, except to sign the papers when they were ready. We had an understanding at the time that I bought that interest from him that he was to sign all papers for the sale of the mine, if we sold it up to the time I got the deed from him; he was to sign any papers I wanted. It was understood and agreed between Willey and me that after July 1, 1907, when I bought him out, everything that came out of the mine belonging to that one-sixth interest would belong to me; that it was my property, and he had no further interest in it, except for the balance of the purchase price; that I was entitled to all that interest would bring. Willey said all he wanted was his money back, and that he hoped I would do well with it; that I was welcome to all I could make out of it. Ever since I bought Willey out in July, 1907, I have done all the assessment work and paid the taxes on that interest."

To the foregoing, it may be added that the testimony shows, also, a formal tender of the balance due and a demand for the deed with defendant's refusal as alleged in the complaint.

This brings the case clearly within the well-recognized rule of equity set forth in such cases as Day v. Cohn, 65 Cal. 508, 4 Pac. 511:

> "Possession of a lot of land under a parol contract for the sale thereof, the expenditure of money in the improvement thereof, and partial payments of the price stipulated to be paid for it, constitute part performance of the contract, which takes it out of the statute of frauds, * * * and entitles the vendee to a specific performance of the contract."

And furthermore, in answer to appellant's contention that the agreement was too indefinite as to the time for the payment of the $32.50, we may quote from the syllabus, as follows:

> "No definite time was stated in the agreement for the payment of the purchase money; but, by the terms of the agreement, payments were to be made from time to time as the money should be earned by the vendee. Held, that time was not of the essence of the agreement, and that a failure to make payments as the money was earned did not affect the rights of the vendee; the vendor having acquiesced in the delay."

Additional citation is not required, as the principle is familiar. Indeed, express statutory authority for its application is found in section 1972 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which, in referring to section 1971, requiring every "transfer of real property to be in writing," provides:

> "The preceding section must not be construed * * * to abridge the power of any court to compel the specific performance of an agreement, in case of part performance thereof."

[6] We deem it unnecessary to notice specifically the cases cited by appellant, as they are not at all inconsistent with the position of respondent. Of course the trial judge is clothed with wide discretion in according or withholding specific performance. This necessarily follows, as the judgment must depend upon the impression made by the particular circumstances of the case upon his sense of justice and equity. We naturally expect and find, therefore, opposite conclusions reached in some cases involving apparently slight differences as to the facts. But where there has been a part performance, and the lower court has decreed the complete execution of the agreement, an appellate court should not interfere, unless it appears clearly that the decision is inequitable and unjust. In the case at bar we cannot say that the court below was not entirely warranted in exacting of defendant a compliance with his contract.

[7] In this connection it may be said that appellant is in error in his position as to the significance of plaintiff's possession of the premises. The contention seems to be that defendant must have delivered exclusive possession of the mine to render it an effective circumstance in decreeing specific performance. This would be impossible, since defendant was only a tenant in common, and he could not destroy the right of his cotenants to enjoy their respective interests. The rule requires no more than that the possession of the vendee shall be exclusive of the vendor, that the former, in the use and occupancy of the property, shall be substituted for the latter. That equity should require the vendee of an undivided interest to unlawfully exclude his cotenants from the possession of the property as a condition precedent to the maintenance of "part performance" would be rather a startling doctrine to proclaim.

In Peek v. Peek, 77 Cal. 108, 19 Pac. 228, 1 L. R. A. 185, 11 Am. St. Rep. 244, it is said:

> "The reason assigned for holding possession to be part performance is that, unless validity be given to the agreement, the vendee would be a trespasser. * * * The possession which is referred to by the cases which hold it to be sufficient part performance is a possession exclusive of the vendor."

It is manifest that herein plaintiff would have been a trespasser if effect were not given to his agreement with defendant, and it is equally plain that his possession of the mine was exclusive of the vendor.

[8] There is no more merit in the contention that defendant should not be required to perform the contract since it became impossible by reason of the contract of sale to said third parties. However, this would not apply to said payment received by defendant. It is also clear that he had not entirely divested himself of the legal title to the undivided one-sixth, and as to this the decree would operate.

In Farnum v. Clarke, 148 Cal. 610, 84 Pac. 166, it is said:

> "It is no answer for a vendor to say, when specific performance is sought under his contract, that the interest or title, which the decree seeks to affect, is not as complete as he agreed to convey. If the vendee is willing to enforce the contract against a lesser interest or a less perfect title, it does not lie with the vendor to object on that account. It is only when the vendor has no title nor interest in the lands at all that such a decree will not be awarded, for the very good reason that courts will not attempt to require done what it is so impossible to do. If, however, the vendor has any interest in the property contracted to be conveyed, the vendee may enforce the contract as to whatever interest he may possess"—citing cases.

[9] Another contention is worthy of more serious consideration. It is insisted that according to plaintiff's own testimony the contract upon which he relies was superseded by another agreement subsequently made, and that any failure on the part of defendant to perform the second would not revive the first contract. Attention is called to plaintiff's testimony as follows:

> "Q. Now, Mr. McGinn, isn't it a fact, as you testified, you made a fair, square agreement with Mr. Willey that, if he would pay you back the $100 that you paid him on the second payment on that mine, that you and he would then share equally in that ownership and all moneys that would result from a sale of the mine? A. Yes. Q. Now, when he went back on that agreement, as you say, to divide equally, you went back on your agreement also? A. When he [Willey] went back on his agreement to divide equally, I went back on mine also. Q. You canceled the old agreement by agreeing to divide the $5,000, he have half and you half, and, when he went back on his agreement, you wanted to revive the old agreement? A. Yes; that is about the way it was."

It is therefore claimed that we have a case of novation, to wit: The "substitution of a new obligation between the same parties with intent to extinguish the old obligation." Sections 1530 and 1531, Civ. Code.

It is but fair, though, to say that this statement of the witness was qualified by his further declaration:

> "The old agreement was still in force. The old agreement was to remain the same as it was, but I was to take him back and divide the one-sixth interest with him when he gave back the $100; but he went back on this agreement and said he had concluded to keep all the property and the money I had paid him also. Then I offered him the $132.50, and he refused to take it, and I offered to deposit it in a bank for him; but he said, if I did so, it would be at my own risk."

This would justify the court in finding that the second agreement executed was not intended to constitute a novation, and, having been repudiated by defendant, it did not extinguish the first obligation. Besides, the defendant himself testified that there was no such second agreement, and the court might, of course, have adopted his version of the matter.

The trial judge, though, undoubtedly accepted the account given by plaintiff, as, among the findings, we discover the following:

> "That thereafter, to wit, about August 1, 1910, plaintiff requested of defendant the use of $100, and defendant returned to plaintiff the sum of $100, and it was then and there mutually agreed between plaintiff and defendant that in consideration of the return of said $100 that said plaintiff and defendant would share equally the said one-sixth interest in said mining property, but immediately thereafter, to wit, on or about two weeks after the 1st day of August, 1910, said defendant repudiated his agreement to share one-half of said interest with the plaintiff herein, and stated to plaintiff to the effect that he had concluded to retain all of the moneys paid on account of the purchase price of said property and the property itself, and would not deed to plaintiff any part thereof, and no longer recognized plaintiff as having any rights whatever in or to the said property, or any part thereof."

It is to be observed, however, that the finding is not broad enough to include a novation, since there is no declaration therein that the agreement was made with the intent to extinguish the old obligation.

[10] Besides, this finding is entirely without the issues, and will be disregarded. Marks v. Sayward, 50 Cal. 57. Indeed, defendant did not rely upon a novation, but, to the contrary, disclaimed it, and this, no doubt, is the reason that he did not plead it in his answer. It is held to be new matter of defense in the nature of release or discharge which must be specially pleaded. Piercy v. Sabin, 10 Cal. 30, 70 Am. Dec. 692; Coles v. Soulsby, 21 Cal. 50; Temple v. Teller Lumber Co., 46 Colo. 497, 106 Pac. 8.

Some other questions of minor importance are discussed by counsel, but a consideration of all the points made leaves us satisfied that the judgment and order denying the motion for a new trial should be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; HART, J.

HALL v. E. W. WELLS & SON. (Civ. 1185.)

1. BILLS AND NOTES (§ 497*)—VALIDITY—BURDEN OF PROOF—GOOD FAITH.

Upon proof of fraud in the inception of a note, the burden is cast upon the indorsee to show that he is an innocent holder, as by showing a purchase before maturity or from an innocent indorser for value in the due course of business.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bills and Notes, Cent. Dig. §§ 1448, 1675–1681, 1683–1687; Dec. Dig. § 497.*]

2. BILLS AND NOTES (§ 351*) — BONA FIDE PURCHASER—NOTICE.

The indorsee of overdue paper takes it with notice that it is subject to some defense, and is subject to the defense that it was affected in its inception by fraud, illegality, duress, want of consideration, payment, or some other equitable defense arising out of the transaction in which it was given.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bills and Notes, Cent. Dig. §§ 878–881, 882½–885; Dec. Dig. § 351.*]

3. BILLS AND NOTES (§ 344*) — BONA FIDE PURCHASER—TAKING AFTER ONE INSTALLMENT DUE—NOTICE.

A purchaser or indorsee of a note payable in installments after one installment is due and unpaid is chargeable with notice of the dishonor of the entire note and of the maker's equities, which infirmity affects every installment alike.

4. BILLS AND NOTES (§ 517*)—ACTION—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—EXECUTION.

Evidence, in an action by the indorsee of a note after maturity, held to show that it was signed without the maker's authority, induced by the false and fraudulent representations of the payee's agent.

5. BILLS AND NOTES (§ 517*)—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—RATIFICATION.

Evidence, in an action by the indorsee of a note signed without the maker's authority, induced by the false and fraudulent representations of the payee, held not to show a ratification of its unauthorized execution.

Action by John F. Hall against E. W. Wells & Son. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Ernest Walling, of Eureka, for appellant. Mahan & Mahan, of Eureka, for respondents.

CHIPMAN, P. J. This is an action on a promissory note of which the following is a copy:

"P. O. Eureka, State of Calif., Aug. 3, 1911. For value received we promise to pay to the order of American Manufacturing Company, fifteen hundred dollars ($1,500) at Chicago, Ill., in installments payable as follows: One month after date $150.00; (then follow nine other installments of $150.00 each, payable in 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9 and 10 months after date respectively). Default in the payment of any installment shall at the option of the payee herein, render the unpaid balance immediately due and payable.
"[Signed] E. W. Wells & Son,
"Per E. P. Correll."

It is alleged in the complaint that "defendant by its agent, duly authorized thereto, made and signed" said promissory note; that, prior to the commencement of the suit and before the maturity of said note, the payee, for a valuable consideration, sold, assigned, and transferred said note to the Commercial Security Company, a corporation duly incorporated under the laws of the state of Illinois; that, prior to the commencement of the suit, said last-named company, for a valuable consideration, sold, assigned, and transferred said promissory note to plaintiff, who ever since has been and now is the owner and holder thereof.

In its answer defendant denies the execution of said promissory note; denies that by its duly authorized agent or any agent of defendant it executed the same; denies the alleged transfers of said promissory note and the payment of a valuable or any consideration therefor. It is further alleged, on information and belief, that said E. P. Correll (who executed said note) "signed the name of E. W. Wells & Son to a certain contract of which the following is a copy": Then follows a somewhat lengthy and complicated document which is an order for "1 touring car, described on reverse side; 16-42 piece dinner sets"; and sundry articles apparently to be used in conducting some sort of a contest by which the manufacturing company was to bring about an increase of defendants' sales of merchandise from $45,000 per annum to $65,000. For the property ordered and other considerations the defendant was to pay $1,500. The promissory note in question was appended to the contract and was part of it, but was detachable without interfering with other parts of the contract. It is alleged that Correll was induced to sign said contract through the false and fraudulent representations of the payee's agent, one W. W. Gray, the particulars of which are set out, that said company failed to keep and perform the covenants by it agreed to be performed, in certain respects, which are set out.

The cause was tried by the court without a jury. Findings of fact were waived and defendant had judgment. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment and order denying his motion for a new trial.

The American Manufacturing Company is a Tennessee corporation and, we infer, has its place of business in Lexington, Tenn., and has a sales' house in Chicago. The Commercial Security Company is an Illinois corporation doing business in Chicago. Plaintiff is an attorney residing in Lexington, Tenn. The testimony submitted by plaintiff consists of his deposition and the depositions of the officers of the two corporations.

The secretary of the manufacturing company testified that the contract or "order for one of its automobile advertising deals" was procured by its agent, W. W. Gray; that "E. W. Wells & Son never claimed at any time or in any way that they did not execute the order or note referred to in the order, or that they did not authorize any one to execute the same for them. The order was received by the American Manufacturing Company on August 8, 1911."

One of the claims made by plaintiff is that, even conceding Correll's lack of authority, defendant ratified the act of signing its name to the contract and note. This contention rests largely on the correspondence between the parties, and hence it becomes necessary to set it out. Witness testified:

"On August 21st, 1911, the American Manufacturing Company received the following telegram from E. W. Wells & Son: 'Eureka, California, Aug. 21, 1911. American Mfg. Co., 150 So. Lasalle St., Chicago. Do not ship automobile till you receive our letter. Conditions of your contract not entirely satisfactory. E. W. Wells & Son.'

"The letter referred to by the telegram and received by the American Manufacturing Company, is as follows: 'Eureka, California, Aug. 22, 1911. American Manfg. Co.—Gentlemen: Confirming our telegram of yesterday we wish to state that your Mr. Gray first called upon the writer (our Willard Wells) and outlined in a general way your proposition; having made all arrangements to take my vacation at this time, could not go into details as I should have done, but turned the matter over to our head clerk, Mr. E. P. Correll. Now the most serious objections we have to this contract is that about 35 per cent. of our entire business is kodak goods. Our contract with the Eastman Kodak Company will not permit us to enter this proposition of yours as you call for each cent purchased at our stores, so you will see that if we eliminate this part of our business your contract cannot be fulfilled. Now we do not want to ask too much, but is there not some way that will be agreeable to you to cancel same? If necessary we think we can transfer the contract to another line of business. Please advise us at once. Yours very truly, E. W. Wells & Son.'

"Telegram marked 'D' Exhibit 'D' and letter Exhibit 'E.'

"In reply to this letter, Exhibit 'E,' the American Mfg. Co. wrote the defendant as follows: 'Sep. 6, 1911. W. W. Wells & Son, Eureka, Cal.—Dear Sirs: Replying to your letter of recent date in reference to order given our representative for automobile to be used in a voting contest, for which you signed note and contract, wish to state that it is difficult for us to cancel an order of this kind, as we immediately passed on your order and ordered the printing matter, and got the machine ready for shipment. We are also obliged to pay the commission to our salesman for taking the order and it would be quite an expense to you if the contest did not go through. In regard to the kodak part of the business will say that if you desire, you need not count them in the sales, that is not give out any votes for kodaks sold and we will make you the same percentage of increase eliminating the sales of Eastman's goods. Our customers are all having marked success with the contest, many of them doubling their sales, and we are sure you would be much pleased and benefited by it. We enclose you two letters showing what success others have had. Awaiting your immediate reply, we are very truly yours, American Manufacturing Company.'"

The manufacturing company again wrote defendant, on September 29, 1911, calling for certain information, and stating:

"Your automobile has been ordered shipped to you and your printed matter will come forward in a few days."

In reply, defendant wrote, on October 6th:

"Your letter dated September 29, 1911, received. We are unable as we have stated before to accept this proposition. See our letter dated August 22, 1911."

Witness testified that on October 4, 1911, the company wrote defendant "offering to cancel the order if the defendant would pay what the company was out on the transaction, to wit, the salesman's commission of $185, the amount paid for discounting the defendant's note, $100, and printed matter $50." There is no copy of this letter in the record. Whether it was received by the defendant does not appear.

Witness Hall testified: "Defendant never offered to accept these terms of settlement"; that "the American Manufacturing Company complied with all the terms of their contract with defendant on their part. The American Manufacturing Company was not the owner and holder of the defendant's note at the time the last letter was written. They had previously discounted it with the Commercial Security Company of Chicago." Witness further testified that the manufacturing company secured $1,380 as consideration for the transfer of said note; that the company "had nothing to do with placing the note in the hands of the plaintiff for collection and have had no control over said note since they sold it."

Witness Crandall, president of the security company, testified that his company purchased the note in question on September 29, 1911, and paid $1,380 for it, and about the middle of August, 1912, transferred it to plaintiff; that, to witness' knowledge, his company "was never informed, either before or after they had purchased said note, as to what the consideration was for it between the original parties to it."

Plaintiff Hall testified:

"Said note was due when it was delivered to me in August, 1912, and I do not claim to be a holder of said note in due course before maturity and for value. The rights I claim under said note are those of a purchaser for value after maturity, and I only claim such rights as the Commercial Security Company had therein. I first saw the note some time during the month of January, 1912, when it was placed in my hands for collection by said Commercial Security Company, and about that time I sent the note to C. P. Cutten, an attorney of Eureka, Cal., for collection. He returned the note to me, and I afterwards sent it to Mr. Ernest Walling of Eureka, Cal., for collection. I did not know what the consideration was that passed between the parties for the making of this note, when the same was delivered to me in January, 1912. I first learned what the consideration was for the making of said note after January 15, 1912. I purchased the note because I was assured by the Commercial Security Company, then my clients, that they were the holders of said note in due course of trade, before maturity, of all installments but the first of $150, due September 3, 1911, and upon which no demand had been made, for a cash consideration, and thereupon I purchased the note, as they said they would rather sell than litigate."

It appeared that Willard Wells and his father, E. W. Wells, constituted the defendant partnership. The members were also interested in the Red Cross Pharmacy, doing business in Eureka, of which E. P. Correll was a member and the manager. The two firms were entirely separate and distinct from each other. Correll had nothing to do with the defendant and had no authority to act for it in any capacity. Willard Wells managed the defendant partnership, his father living in San Francisco. On August 2, 1911, Gray, the agent of the manufacturing company called on Willard Wells and explained the automobile contest scheme being promoted by the manufacturing company. Wells seemed to think favorably of it, but objected that it involved too much for his firm alone and suggested that the two firms in which he was interested might take it up and told him to see Correll. He, shortly after, about noon, met Correll and told him of this scheme and that Gray would call upon him and explain. He testified:

"My purpose in speaking to Mr. Correll was to make a joint matter of it between the two stores, provided anything was done. The next day I left for San Francisco. I was gone twelve days and then returned to Eureka. On my return I had a talk with Mr. Correll within a day or two, and asked him what he had done with the automobile contest, if he had gone into it, and he said, 'I thought we had better take it up, and I have entered into an agreement with him.' He had no copy of the agreement and I did not see any copy until the month of September, 1911, or October, 1911, possibly 60 days after the date of its signing. A copy of it was then sent through the mail to E. W. Wells & Son. Immediately after having the talk with Mr. Correll on my return, I wired the American Manufacturing Company, and also wrote them. The telegram and letter have already been read in evidence. At the time I wrote the letters read in evidence and at the time I sent the telegram, I did not have any copy of the contract. I was relying at that time in regard to the terms of the contract upon the information I had received from Mr. Gray."

He testified that he did not know there was a note signed by Correll until the automobile arrived when the company was immediately notified by telegraph that it would not be received and "was held at their disposal." The bond which was to have been given by the company was sent to the Humboldt County Bank, in October, 1911, but neither defendant nor Correll had notice that it was there. Witness testified:

"The American Manufacturing Company never furnished any 1912 Howard automobile under this contract as called for by it. The automobile that was sent was a 1909 'Crow' machine. I employed an expert to examine the machine sent, and his report to us was that it was not according to the specifications in any sense of the word. It was a very inferior car to the one called for by the contract. I refused to accept the car, and the American Manufacturing Company were notified by my attorneys to that effect by wire, and also that the car was held at their disposal. I know from their letters that they received that telegram. I never authorized E. P. Correll at any time to sign the name of E. W. Wells & Son to this note, nor to any instrument. When I sent the first telegram, I knew that Mr. Correll had signed a contract because he told me so, but I did not know anything about any note being signed. I know the gist of the contract and knew that it took in the sale of kodaks. I have no recollection of ever hearing that there was a note signed until the automobile arrived and I put the matter in the hands of my attorneys Mahan & Mahan. The telegram notifying the American Manufacturing Company that we would not accept the automobile was sent November 29, 1911. I received a copy of the contract before that, some time in October."

On cross-examination he was asked to explain what he meant by his letter of August 22, 1911, and answered:

"I wanted Mr. Correll to determine whether he wanted to take it up or not, and whether he thought it was a good proposition as between the red Cross Pharmacy and E. W. Wells & Son's stores. I intended if we handled the proposition at all to handle it between the two stores. At the time I came back from the city and at the time I wrote the letters introduced in evidence, I did not know that Mr. Correll had signed the contract 'E. W. Wells & Son' alone. I had not the slightest idea how he had signed it, whether he signed it Red Cross Pharmacy or E. W. Wells & Son, although I naturally supposed that he would sign it E. W. Wells & Son. The first I knew it was signed E. W. Wells & Son was when I received the copy of the contract. Mr. Gray understood at the time I was talking to him that I was to see Mr. Correll and see what could be done between the two stores. I did not tell Mr. Gray that I would turn the matter over to Mr. Correll to handle. The matter was turned over to him because he made this contract. I did not communicate to Mr. Gray my intention of having Mr. Correll act for us in the matter, but he went to see Mr. Correll because I told him to. Q. Did you intend for Correll to act for you in the matter if he saw fit to go into the proposition at all? A. In one sense of the word I did; I told Correll if he thought it was a good proposition that we would take it up. Q. That was what your intention was when you talked with Mr. Gray, too, wasn't it? A. In one sense of the word, yes. In my conversation with Mr. Correll after my return he told me he had taken the matter up with Mr. Gray and signed the contract with him. * * * In turning the matter over to Mr. Correll my idea was that unless he saw fit to take the matter up for the Red Cross Pharmacy the thing was ended. It was for him to say what he thought about it and then confer with me for further dealings; if it was agreeable for the Red Cross Pharmacy, then I would consider it for E. W. Wells & Son. * * * That is what I had in mind when I wrote the letter marked Exhibit E, stating that I had turned the matter over to Mr. Correll."

Witness Correll testified that, soon after he met Mr. Wells, Gray called on him and said that Wells had told him to call and have witness look into the automobile proposition. Later in the afternoon Gray returned and explained the scheme fully. Witness testified:

"I told him to go and see Willard Wells and get his final approval of the thing and then come back again and I could close the matter up. That was in the afternoon of August 2d. Willard Wells was in town then. Mr. Gray went away and came back the next day in the afternoon, and he told me he saw Mr. Wells, and that he was very well satisfied with the whole proposition, and that he was willing to go in with his store, and that we could go in together on that proposition. That was on the 3d he told me this. Then I told Mr. Gray to go ahead and fix the matter up. He fixed the papers up and I looked at them, but to tell the truth I looked more at the automobile than anything else. I asked him all kinds of questions about the automobile, and he gave me a full detailed account about what kind of a machine it was and what a good grade of machine it was. He said it was a 1912 Howard car, and the same kind of a car as is represented on the contract. After he got the paper made out he handed it to me and wanted me to sign it. I told him that I would sign the paper only with the understanding that it was satisfactory to Mr. Willard Wells. I was going to sign it Red Cross Pharmacy first, then I told him that we had no rating, and I don't know whether to sign it E. W. Wells & Son or not. He said: 'Yes, go ahead; sign it E. W. Wells & Son.' I told him then it must have the absolute approval of E. W. Wells & Son. I would only sign it on that condition. He said he saw Mr. Wells and it would take a month to fix everything up satisfactorily. At that time Willard Wells was gone. At the time I signed it, I did not know that I was signing a promissory note. I did not know that until Willard Wells called my attention to it, after one of the Mr. Mahans had called his attention to it; that was after the machine arrived, about the 25th of November. I talked with Willard Wells after he returned. I don't know whether I told him I had signed it or not, but I did not tell him I had signed the name of E. W. Wells & Son and I did not tell him I had signed a promissory note. The first conversation I had with Mr. Wells about signing the name of E. W. Wells & Son to it was when the contract came back, about the 3d or 4th or 5th of October. Willard Wells in the first conversation I had with him never in any way authorized me to sign the name of E. W. Wells & Son to this paper. I simply signed it that way because the Red Cross Pharmacy had no rating, and I never imagined I was signing a serious paper of that kind, and I signed it on the condition that it should have the approval of Willard Wells."

He was asked, on cross-examination, why he signed the name of E. W. Wells & Son to the note and not the names of the two stores. He answered:

"I didn't know it was a note, I was going to sign Red Cross Pharmacy, and I told him that we had no rating, and it was a kind of mutual agreement that I should sign 'E. W. Wells & Son,' and I only signed that on condition that it would be absolutely satisfactory to E. W. Wells & Son. I did not know this was a note. I did not read it before I signed it because I was very busy that day and did not have time to go into the matter thoroughly, and in fact I never signed a paper like this before in my life. * * * Mr. Gray came back a second time and told me he had seen Mr. Wells and told him that I was satisfied with it, and he told me that it was satisfactory to Mr. Wells to take the matter up. That was the day I signed the contract. The last time I talked with Mr. Gray, Mr. Wells had gone away."

[1] Plaintiff testified that he did not claim to be the holder "in due course before maturity and for value," but solely under "such rights as the Commercial Security Company had therein" and that he knew what the consideration of the note was. It was held by us, in Meyer v. Lovdal, 6 Cal. App. 369, 92 Pac. 322, that upon proof of fraud in the inception of the note the burden is cast upon the indorsee to show that he is an innocent holder, which he may do by showing that he purchased the note before maturity or from an innocent indorser for value in the usual course of business. See, also, cases there cited.

[2] The indorsee of overdue paper takes it with notice that it is subject to some defense, for he takes it at a time when in due course it should have been paid. He is therefore subject to the defense that it was affected in its inception with some inherent vice, as, for example, fraud, illegality, duress, want of consideration, payment, or some equitable defense arising out of the transaction in which the paper was given. 1 Daniel on Negotiable Instruments, § 725a.

[3] The evidence was that the security company purchased the note after the maturity of the first installment. This raises the question whether a purchaser or indorsee of a promissory note, payable in installments, after one installment is due and unpaid, must be charged with notice of the dishonor of the entire note and of the maker's equities; and does such an infirmity affect every installment alike?

Mr. Daniels, in his Negotiable Instruments (volume 1, § 787), says:

> "If the note be payable by installments, it is dishonored when the first installment becomes overdue and unpaid, and he who takes it afterward takes it subject to all equities between the original parties."

Vinton v. King, 4 Allen, 562, Fued v. Tibbetts, 57 Mo. 359, and Hart v. Stickney, 41 Wis. 630, are cited and fully support the text. The reason for the rule is given in Vinton v. King, and seems to us entirely satisfactory. Said the court, by Mr. Justice Metcalf:

> "The note is a single contract to pay $212 in four half-yearly installments, and the plaintiff took it with notice on its face that, as to the first installment, the defendant might have a justifiable cause for withholding payment, whatever that cause might be; whether a cause which affected that installment only—as a release thereof by the payee, or a legal set-off against him to the amount thereof—or a cause which between him and the payee, vitiated the whole note, as want of failure of consideration, unlawful consideration, fraud, or duress. And if the payee had sued for the recovery of the first installment, before the second was payable, the defendant might have defeated the action, by showing that the note was wholly void; and a judgment for him, on such ground of defense, would have been conclusive against the maintenance, by the payee, of a subsequent action to recover the other installments."

It remains to determine whether defendant supported its defense by sufficient evidence.

We have given the evidence very fully and need not enter upon an extended comment as to what inferences may justly be drawn from it. The payee of the note is answerable for the acts of its duly authorized agent, Gray, among which were his false representations that defendant had agreed to enter into the contract and that Correll might sign for it; that Gray prepared the papers and directed how they should be signed; that he left no copy with Correll, in the absence of which Willard Wells, who represented the defendant, had no means of knowing what were the provisions of the contract. Correll testified that he did not know he was signing a promissory note, and Wells testified that he did not know this fact until his attention was called to it by his attorneys after he had written the letter of August 22, 1911. No copy of the contract was sent to defendant until some time in October. This letter, of August 22, 1911, relied upon by plaintiff as a ratification of the contract, was written in ignorance of its details and especially in ignorance that it had attached to it a promissory note signed by defendant. There was no correspondence between the parties except this letter of August 22d and the reply of September 6th, until September 29th, when the manufacturing company wrote the letter hereinabove set out, to which defendant repeated its statement that it would not accept the proposition, calling attention to its letter of August 22d. It was on September 29, 1911, that the note was assigned to the security company, but it did not get into the hands of plaintiff as owner until about a year later, although he had it for collection in January, 1912.

[5, 6] Turning to the letter of August 22d, we cannot see how it can by its terms be regarded as in any sense a ratification; it distinctly states that the contract is not satisfactory. When the telegram of the 21st of August and the letter of the 22d were sent, defendant had but an imperfect knowledge of the contract and none whatever as to how it was signed or that it embraced a promissory note signed by defendant. If Correll may be said to have been defendant's agent, which in fact he was not, he could not exceed his authority as such agent and a ratification of his unauthorized acts can only operate after full knowledge of those facts. Davidson v. Dallas, 8 Cal. 227. "The * * * essence either of an election or ratification is that it is done advisedly, with full knowledge of the party's rights" (King v. Lagrange, 50 Cal. 328); the party to be charged "must have fully known what he was doing" (Brown v. Rouse, 104 Cal. 672, 38 Pac. 507). We can discover no intention of defendant to ratify the contract relied upon, either in the correspondence or anything that took place between the parties. Some printed matter was sent defendant in October which it refused to receive. The automobile was not sent until in November, more than two months after defendant had written that the contract was not satisfactory, and it was not such a machine as was promised but an inferior one. The manufacturing company was promptly notified that it would not be accepted and that it was held subject to the shipper's order.

Plaintiff alleges in his complaint that:

> "The said defendant by its agent, duly authorized thereto, made and signed its promissory note of which the following is a copy."

We do not think he has established this issue either by showing the direct authority of defendant given to its agent or by its subsequent ratification of the act of the alleged agent of defendant.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

1. Courts (§ 212*)—Jurisdiction—District Courts of Appeal—Mandamus.

The provisions of the Constitution giving jurisdiction in mandamus to the District Courts of Appeal being identical with those conferring similar jurisdiction upon the Supreme Court, the jurisdiction of the Court of Appeal is coequal with that of the Supreme Court, and it may compel the superior court to enter a default in an action which is appealable only to the Supreme Court.

The order of the District Court of Appeal transferring such case to the Supreme Court under rule 32 (119 Pac. xv), providing for the transfer of cases appealed to the wrong court, does not give the Supreme Court jurisdiction, and the papers will be returned to the District Court of Appeal.

In Bank. Original application to the District Court of Appeal by Mattie E. Davidson for a writ of mandamus against Eugene D. Graham, County Clerk of San Joaquin County. Cause transferred to the Supreme Court by the District Court of Appeal, and returned to the District Court of Appeal by the Supreme Court.

For subsequent opinion in District Court of Appeal, see 141 Pac. 834.

Webster, Webster & Blewett, of Stockton, for petitioner. A. H. Carpenter and Walter F. Lynch, both of Stockton, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an original proceeding by mandamus begun in the District Court of Appeal of the Third District to compel the county clerk of San Joaquin county to enter the default of the defendant in a cause pending in the superior court. It appears that the action in which the entry of default is sought is an action in which the appellate jurisdiction is in the Supreme Court. Because of this fact, the justices of the District Court of Appeal were of the opinion that that court had no jurisdiction of the mandamus proceeding, and accordingly an order was made in that court purporting to transfer the cause to the Supreme Court for hearing and decision, and the court forwarded the papers to the clerk of the Supreme Court, believing that it had power to do so under rule 32 (119 Pac. xv).

[1, 2] In this the District Court was in error. The Constitution gives the District Court of Appeal original jurisdiction of proceedings in mandamus, in language identical with that giving such jurisdiction to the Supreme Court. Its jurisdiction in such matters is therefore coequal with our own, and does not depend upon the existence of appellate jurisdiction over the case to which the manda-mus relates. Hyatt v. Allen, 54 Cal. 355. Rule 32 (119 Pac. xv) does not apply to such a case; consequently the District Court had no authority to forward the papers to the Supreme Court, or to transfer the cause, and its order to that effect does not give this court jurisdiction of the proceeding. We disapprove of Rickey v. Glader, 6 Cal. App. 114, 91 Pac. 414, on this point. The clerk of this court will return the papers in the cause to the clerk of the District Court of Appeal of the Third District. The jurisdiction is with that court, and it must proceed to a decision of the cause, as in other cases.

1. Appeal and Error (§ 994*) — Review — Weight and Credibility of Evidence.

It being within the province of the trial court to determine the credit and weight to be given testimony, its finding, disregarding testimony not directly contradicted, will not be disturbed unless it appears there are no matters or circumstances which at all impair accuracy of the testimony.

3. Specific Performance (§ 121*)—Contract to Make Will—Evidence

Evidence, in an action for specific performance of a contract of deceased to will certain property to plaintiff, held to authorize a finding that there was no such contract, but that plaintiff's execution of a quitclaim to deceased, and her statement that she would will the property, were voluntary and parts of no contract.

As tending to rebut the inference from the allegation of the complaint that at the time of making the alleged contract with his aunt, whereby she was to will property to him, he was "first" informed by her that his expected portion in his uncle's estate was forfeited, cross-examination of him to show that previously, from independent sources, he had obtained the information was proper.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Action by Stewart Blanc against Ida E. Connor, administratrix of Susan Blanc, deceased, and others. From an adverse judgment and order, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

William M. Cannon, of San Francisco (Kingsley Cannon, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant. Garret W. McEnerney and Andrew F. Burke, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

MELVIN, J. The plaintiff appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The action was one in which a nephew sought to obtain specific performance of an alleged oral contract by which the aunt, according to his declaration, agreed to devise to him a certain parcel of land located in the city and county of San Francisco. The court found that there was no such contract, and the appeal is based largely upon the alleged errors in the making of findings to that effect.

Nearly all of the facts are undisputed. Indeed, many of them are settled by stipulation. Alexander Blanc and his wife, Susan Blanc, a childless couple, resided for many years in San Francisco. Alexander's brother, Stewart Blanc, had married Susan's sister, and that couple had three children; the plaintiff herein being one of them. Stewart

Blanc, the father, for some reason did not support these little children, and about the year 1872 they were taken into the home of the uncle and aunt, Alexander Blanc and his wife. The plaintiff, who was but one year of age in 1872, remained with his uncle and aunt until the death of Alexander in 1891 and afterwards for several years with the aunt. The boy was sent to school and was treated with affection by his kinsfolk. His mother died in 1876, but it does not appear definitely when his father died. Two days before the death of Alexander (which took place on June 14, 1891) he executed a will by the terms of which all of the estate was to go to his wife, except a parcel of land on Jackson street, which was to go to her for life with remainder to the plaintiff in case he should survive her, and in case of his death prior to hers she was to take in fee simple absolute. The plaintiff was a witness to this will. It was filed for probate and was sustained by the court after a contest in which the plaintiff assisted his aunt in making a defense. At the proper time a petition for final distribution was filed by the widow (who was also the executrix), in which it was alleged that Stewart Blanc had been deprived of the devise to him by reason of his action in becoming a witness to the will (citing section 1282 of the Civil Code). The petition contained the statement that "the said devisee, Stewart Blanc, under the provisions of section 1283 of the Civil Code of the state of California, is entitled to succeed as the nephew of said testator to a share of the estate of said decedent equal to the share he would have been entitled to receive if the will of said testator had not been established, but that such share shall not exceed the devise or bequest made to him in the will," and that since the devise to Stewart was a contingent one, solely dependent upon his surviving his aunt, he was entitled to have distributed to him no present interest in the property. The report accompanying the final account and signed by the executrix described her as the "sole devisee and legatee under the will." Whether this view of the law was correct or not we need not here determine, but it is important, in view of some of appellant's contentions, to know what the belief of Mrs. Blanc was at the time when the alleged verbal contract was made. Plaintiff was of the opinion that he had no interest in the estate by reason of his act in becoming a witness to the will. At his aunt's suggestion he made an assignment to her of any interest which he might have or assert. This assignment was filed with the probate court, and distribution was thereupon had to Mrs. Blanc of the entire estate.

Plaintiff asserts that, at the time the assignment was executed, his aunt proposed to him that if he would sign it, thus simplifying distribution under the will of his uncle, she would make a will in which she would devise to him the Jackson street property. It is the belief of plaintiff that a contract then and there arose between him and his aunt, and that the evidence of such contract is ample, unimpeached, and sufficient in law, and that there was no basis for the court's finding that no such agreement existed. Susan Blanc died intestate October 6, 1900; and her estate was in course of probate when this action was commenced 14 months after her death.

[1-4] It is asserted by counsel for plaintiff that, unless the court is prepared to impute perjury to four uncontradicted witnesses, it cannot uphold the finding of the trial court that no contract was made whereby, in consideration of the execution of the quitclaim by plaintiff, his aunt agreed to devise the Jackson street land to him. The position of counsel for respondents is this: There is no witness to the alleged contract save the plaintiff himself; the other witnesses did not say there was a contract or that Mrs. Blanc admitted the existence of an agreement to devise property to Stewart Blanc, but they did say merely that she expressed an intention of leaving him her property on Jackson street by will; by section 1847 of the Code of Civil Procedure the presumption that a witness speaks the truth may be repelled by the character of his testimony; and the character of plaintiff's testimony was of a sort that justified the court in rejecting his statement regarding the details of the alleged agreement. It is asserted that this is a class of cases sometimes arising in fraud and abounding in perjury, and, although disclaiming any thought that the instant case is so tainted, counsel contend that the court was justified in scrutinizing the testimony very carefully and refusing to accept it as proof of the contract unless it presented a very strong showing that the agreement was made substantially as alleged. It is true that courts are very slow to overturn findings of fact made by a jury and a fortiori those made by a court acting without a jury, even when contrary statements which are uncontradicted appear in the testimony of witnesses. The rule was thus stated in Davis v. Judson, 159 Cal. 128, 113 Pac. 150, in which Mr. Justice Lorigan, delivering the opinion of this department, said:

> "While it is the general rule that the uncontradicted testimony of a witness to a particular fact may not be disregarded, but should be accepted by the court as proof of the fact, this rule has its exceptions. The most positive testimony of a witness may be contradicted by inherent improbabilities as to its accuracy contained in the witness' own statement of the transaction; or there may be circumstances in evidence in connection with the matter, which satisfy the court of its falsity; the manner of the witness in testifying may impress the court with a doubt as to the accuracy of his statement and influence it to disregard his positive testimony as to a particular fact; and, as it is within the province of the trial court to determine what credit and weight shall be given to the testimony of any witness, this court cannot control its finding or conclusion denying the testimony credence, unless it appears that there are no matters or circumstances which at all impair its accuracy."

In many jurisdictions such contracts as that here asserted are scrutinized with the greatest care, and they are only sustained upon the most convincing proof. It is unnecessary to review the many authorities upon this subject from other jurisdictions. In this state the rule is well established and has been ever since the decision of Owens v. McNally, 113 Cal. 451, 45 Pac. 712, 33 L. R. A. 369, which has been reaffirmed every time a similar case has come to this court on appeal. In the opinion in that case, Mr. Justice Henshaw said:

> "Where a contract such as this, resting in parol and sought to be enforced after the death of the other party to it, comes before a court of equity for review, it is scrutinized, and should be scrutinized, with particular care, and only upon a satisfactory showing that it is definite and certain and just will it be enforced. The proofs of the contract should be clear, and the acts of the claimant referable alone to the contract. Ackerman v. Ackerman, 24 N. J. Eq. 587."

That case has been reaffirmed in the late case of Rogers v. Schlotterback, 138 Pac. 732. The rule that proof of the contract to make a certain kind of will must be definite and distinct before a chancellor will enforce specific performance was emphasized in the case of Baumann v. Kusian, 164 Cal. 583, 129 Pac. 986, 44 L. R. A. (N. S.) 756, in which a demurrer to the complaint was held to have been properly sustained, although the contract pleaded was to the effect that the decedent, Mrs. Fisher, had promised to treat plaintiffs as her own children "in every respect." Viewing the testimony of the plaintiff under this rule, we cannot say that the chancellor was in error when he held that there was no proof of a contract to make a will. Plaintiff said that, when his aunt presented to him for his signature the form of assignment to her of his interest in his uncle's estate, she told him that the purpose of obtaining such a document was to get the estate out of litigation, and that, if he signed, she would make a will giving him the Jackson street property as his uncle had wished. The most succinct account of the conversation between plaintiff and his aunt occurred during the cross-examination of Stewart Blanc. Asked to repeat the whole of the conversation in the order in which it occurred, he said:

> "Well, I don't know; it may have been I came into the room, and she may have called me in, I don't know. I could not say positively. And she said, 'Now, here is something more about the case,' and I said, 'What is it now?' She said, 'Here is a paper for you to sign.' I said, 'What is it?' She said, 'Well, it is to close up the estate.' I said, 'Close it up? I thought it was settled.' She said, 'No, this has to be signed before we can get it outside the courts; otherwise, why, it will stay in there for years, probably, and be et up.' She said, 'I want you to sign it.' I said, 'All right, what is it?' So I kind of looked it over, and I said, 'Gee, I will do that all right for you.' She said, 'Everything will be just the same as when the uncle left it.' I started in to sign it, and she said, 'I will make a will and see that you get it.'"

Such a conversation comports as well or better with the theory that plaintiff was impelled by gratitude towards his aunt than with the hypothesis that he was bargaining with her. Each thought that he had forfeited his interest under the will. If he possessed any right to share in his uncle's estate after failure to take under the devise, it was vague and shadowy. Indeed, it does not definitely appear that his father was dead and that he was an heir at law of his uncle, entitled to the benefits, if any, arising under section 1283 of the Civil Code. The whole transaction was such as to justify the conclusion that out of gratitude to the aunt, who had reared and educated him, he was willing to remove any technical obstacle to the settlement of his uncle's estate, and that her declared intention to will the property on Jackson street to him was a similar manifestation of affectionate regard and not part of a contract. In order that such a contract may be sustained, the court must find that it was founded upon a valuable consideration and deliberately made by the decedent. Schaadt v. Mutual Life Ins. Co., 2 Cal. App. 718, 84 Pac. 249. The court may well have decided, in view of the evidence, that Mrs. Blanc, believing the interest of Stewart Blanc in her husband's estate to have been utterly defeated, did not deliberately enter into a contract to devise the property on Jackson street to her nephew in return for a quitclaim which she believed would pass no real interest but would be useful only in hastening distribution of her husband's estate by removing all possible claim by Stewart or his heirs or assigns to some shadowy interest possibly conferred by section 1283 of the Civil Code.

The so-called corroborating testimony need not be reviewed at length. It established statements by Mrs. Blanc that she intended to devise the property to Stewart Blanc, but not that she had an agreement with him so to do.

[5, 6] The appellant's counsel insists that Stewart Blanc and his aunt were bargaining, not for an interest, but for a document, the execution of which was a consideration which should sustain the promise to devise, and that therefore it was error to permit the counsel for defendants to cross-examine plaintiff for the purpose of bringing out his belief that he had no interest or claim against his uncle's estate. Such cross-examination, even if erroneous, could have done no harm, because plaintiff testified, without objection, that he was always under the impression that he was "cut off entirely" from participation in his uncle's estate. It was justified, however, because it tended to rebut the inference arising from the allegations in the complaint that he was first informed by his aunt, at the time of the making of the alleged contract, that his expected portion was forfeited. By cross-examination it was developed that not from his aunt, but from independent sources, one of them a lawyer whom he consulted more than a year previous to the execution of the quitclaim, he obtained the information that he could enjoy no part of his uncle's estate. This was matter which the court was entitled to consider in the process of interpreting the conversation between the aunt and the nephew.

[7] On redirect examination the witness was asked whether or not he believed he was entering into a contract with his aunt at the time of the conversation which he had undertaken to narrate. Objection to this question was properly sustained, for it sought to elicit a self-serving declaration as to his belief. Murray v. Bethune, 1 Wend. (N. Y.) 191. Since the consent to the contract must be communicated by each of the parties to the other (section 1565, Civ. Code), the undisclosed intention of the plaintiff respecting his wish to contract with his aunt was clearly inadmissible.

It is earnestly contended that the execution of the paper and its delivery amounted to a consideration, no matter what may have been the real interest in the property possessed by the plaintiff, and that such consideration supports the contract. It is unnecessary to examine the arguments in this behalf, because, in view of the court's finding that there was no promise, the consideration which it is asserted might have supported a promise, if one were made, need not be discussed.

Error is predicated on the insufficiency of the evidence to support the finding that Alexander Blanc had two sisters, Ann Howe and Jane Wiley. It appeared from the proceedings in the estate of Alexander Blanc that he had two sisters named Ann Howe and Jane Wiley. The court found in accordance with that showing, but also found as follows:

> "The court is unable to find from the evidence whether Ann Howe or Jane Wiley or either of them survived Alexander Blanc, or whether either of them left any descendants her surviving who themselves survived the said Alexander Blanc."

In view of this finding, we cannot see how appellant could be injured by any insufficiency of proof of their existence.

[8, 9] It is finally contended that either a resulting trust or a constructive trust in favor of plaintiff should be impressed upon the Jackson street property because plaintiff transferred some interest to his aunt by the quitclaim. In support of the doctrine of resulting trusts, Russ v. Mebius, 16 Cal. 355, is cited. In that case there was a promise to devise which turned out to be void. In this case the court found that there was no promise to devise; but we need not discuss the authorities which appellant cites in support of either trust theory, because the pleadings and proof below were based on the proposition that a contract had been made; and another theory may not be advanced in this court for the first time. Bank of Visalia v. Dillonwood Lumber Co., 148 Cal. 24, 82 Pac. 374. In any event, if there was a resulting trust in plaintiff's favor, it arose in 1892, and an action thereon was barred by the statute of limitations which was pleaded in the answer.

The theory of a constructive trust is based upon the confidential relations between the aunt and the nephew; his alleged implicit reliance in and obedience to her commands; his ignorance of and her knowledge of the fact that he still had an interest under the law in his uncle's estate, whereby she was enabled to obtain an undue advantage over him. In the first place, there is no allegation in the complaint that plaintiff had any interest in the estate of Alexander Blanc which was passed by assignment. There is a statement that he was a nephew of Alexander Blanc, but no pleading that he became an heir at law by reason of his father's death before that of his uncle. Nor is it shown that he relied on any representation made by his aunt. He testified that he took independent advice of his right to share in his uncle's estate, and believed he had forfeited all right. He entertained this belief from August 8, 1891, up to his aunt's death. The account of the conference with his aunt, given by plaintiff, falls far short of showing violation by her of any fiduciary relation, and under the authority of Colton v. Stanford, 82 Cal. 351, 23 Pac. 16, 16 Am. St. Rep. 137, he is entitled to no relief as upon a constructive trust.

No other alleged errors require consideration.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

All licenses shall show the name, age, and place of business of the applicant, and it is made the duty of the city clerk to keep a record of all licenses. Section 42. No license shall be for a period longer than one year, and, when the license has expired, application shall be made for the renewal. Section 44. It is made unlawful for any plumber (except a licensed master plumber or his employé) to engage in the business of plumbing in the city of Stockton, or "to make any connection with sewers, drain, soil or waste pipes or any pipes connected therewith in said city" (section 46), and section 47 requires the payment of $10 annually for such license.

It is claimed that the statute law provides a complete procedure for obtaining plumbers' licenses, and that the ordinance endeavors to provide a different procedure; that the statute requires an applicant for license to take an examination before the board of health of the city, while the city ordinance delegates the power to the city clerk and license clerk of the city; that section 43 of the ordinance provides "for an informal examination in the form of an affidavit" which, it is contended, is in conflict with the statute; furthermore, that the ordinance permits master plumbers to engage in their business or trade on terms declared to be unlawful by the general law.

Reliance is placed upon Ex parte Grey, 11 Cal. App. 125, 104 Pac. 476. In that case the city of San Jose by an ordinance undertook to confer power on the board of police and fire commissioners to appoint a board of plumbing examiners to examine and issue licenses to plumbers. It was held that the city had no power to delegate such power to another body or person, and hence the ordinance was void as in conflict with general law.

By section 30 of the charter of the city of Stockton, act of March 2, 1889 (Stats. 1889, p. 577), as amended (Stats. 1905, pp. 832, 859), the council is given power—

> "to establish and regulate the issuing and granting of municipal licenses and the collecting of license taxes." Subdivision 35.

By an amendment, section 72, subd. 31, the city is given power—

> "to license for purposes of regulation and revenue all and every kind of business transacted * * * in the city; to fix the rates of licenses upon the same and to provide for the collection thereof by suit or otherwise." Extra Session, Stats. 1911, pp. 274, 279.

The city of Stockton is conducting its government under a freeholders' charter. Concerning "municipal affairs," it has power to legislate uncontrolled by general law. Section 6, art. 11, Const. A municipal affair is one which refers to the internal business affairs of the municipality. Fragley v. Phelan, 126 Cal. 383, 58 Pac. 923. Where the power to impose a license tax for revenue is conferred upon a municipality, the power becomes a municipal affair within the meaning of those words in the Constitution (Ex parte Braun, 141 Cal. 204, 74 Pac. 780); and ordinances passed for the purposes of revenue are valid exercise of power, if the municipality by its charter has been given such power (Ex parte Helm, 143 Cal. 553, 77 Pac. 453; Ex parte Lemon, 143 Cal. 558, 77 Pac. 455, 65 L. R. A. 946).

We think that subdivision 35, § 30, supra, of the Stockton charter confers the power, and it is expressly given by the amendment of 1911.

The writ is denied.

PEOPLE v. BREMER. (Cr. 316.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. April 10, 1914.)

1. Criminal Law (§ 311*)—Evidence—Presumptions—Mania a Potu.

As there is no presumption of continuance of mania a potu induced by excessive use of intoxicants, as in the case of general insanity, accused, who claimed that he killed while suffering from such mania, cannot introduce evidence of previous attacks, and expert testimony as to the symptoms of such mania is properly excluded.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; T. L. Lewis, Judge.

William Bremer was convicted of murder in the first degree, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Shreve & Shreve and J. T. Reed, both of San Diego, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and George Beebe, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

SHAW, J. Defendant was convicted of murder in the first degree, and, upon recommendation of the jury, his punishment fixed at imprisonment for life. He appeals from the judgment and from an order of court denying his motion for a new trial.

One of the defenses interposed by defendant was that at the time of the homicide he was suffering from that form of insanity known as mania a potu. The homicide occurred at about 6 o'clock in the evening of August 27, 1913. Defendant testified that for years he had indulged in the use of alcoholic liquors; that sometimes he would go for months without drinking and then get intoxicated. He was then asked whether he had ever had delirium tremens, whether after he had been drinking he was possessed of the belief that he saw snakes or animals, followed by other questions whereby it was sought to show that on one occasion some twelve years before the homicide, and on another occasion one or two years prior thereto, and again on the night before the killing of deceased, he suffered from certain designated hallucinations, delusions, and illusions, such as usually manifest themselves in cases of mania a potu. Defendant then made an offer to prove by the witness the facts sought to be elicited by the questions, and that a night or two before the homicide, after defendant had been drinking more or less for a month, he awakened and imagined he saw near his bed a monster or dragon, which vanished, returned, and disappeared. To all of these questions and offer an objection that the same were incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial was sustained. These rulings are assigned as error.

[1, 2] When the existence of general insanity is established, it is presumed to continue. This presumption, however, does not apply to that form of the disease known as delirium tremens brought on by one's own procurement and passing away with the removal of the exciting cause. State v. Potts, 100 N. C. 457, 6 S. E. 657; Goodwin v. State, 96 Ind. 551. Hence, since there is no presumption of its continuance or recurrence, the fact that during a period of twelve years defendant had had attacks of delirium tremens, the last one "a night or two before the killing," would not tend to prove "the existence of a paroxysm of the disorder * * * at the very time of the act" with the commission of which he was charged. Volume 2, p. 780, Clevenger on Medical Jurisprudence. For this reason we are constrained to hold that the evidence sought to be elicited, if otherwise competent, was wholly immaterial. Moreover, defendant's normal condition was that of a sane man. His alleged mental derangement was not only transient in character, but such condition was the result of his voluntary acts in the use of alcoholic liquors. Under such circumstances, one prosecuted for the commission of a crime cannot urge such condition as a defense thereto. In People v. Fellows, 122 Cal. 233, 54 Pac. 830, the Supreme Court, in discussing a like question, said:

> "No act committed by a person while in a state of voluntary intoxication is less criminal for this reason, saving that, when the actual existence of any particular purpose, motive, or intent is a necessary element to constitute any specific species or degree of crime, the circumstance of voluntary intoxication may be considered by the jury in determining the fact whether or not that particular purpose, motive, or intent was present. Pen. Code, § 22. But a sane person who voluntarily becomes intoxicated is not relieved from responsibility because of any mental derangement, mania a potu, or insanity produced by and consequent upon his own voluntary act. Such is the import of the instruction in People v. Lewis, 36 Cal. 531, and it is that form of insanity, if insanity it may be called (for we do not think the word happily chosen), to which the instruction has reference. A sane man, therefore, who voluntarily drinks and becomes intoxicated is not excused because the result is to cloud his judgment, unbalance his reason, impair his perceptions, derange his normal faculties, and lead him to the commission of an act which in his sober senses he would have avoided. Upon the other hand, if one, by reason of long-continued indulgence in intoxicants, has reached that stage of chronic alcoholism where the brain is permanently diseased, where the victim is rendered incapable of distinguishing right from wrong, and where permanent general insanity has resulted, then, and in such case, he is no more legally responsible for his acts than would be the man congenitally insane, or insane from violent injury to the brain."

This language was quoted with approval in People v. Hower, 151 Cal. 643, 91 Pac. 507.

What is said upon this point is equally applicable to the ruling of the court in excluding expert testimony as to the symptoms or manner in which mania a potu manifests itself. It follows that no error was committed by the court in excluding the evidence.

The court instructed the jury that:

> "Settled insanity produced by long-continued intoxication affects responsibility in the same way as insanity produced by any other cause, but it must be settled insanity, and not merely a temporary mental condition produced by recent use of intoxicating liquor."

Authority for this instruction is found in People v. Travers, 88 Cal. 233, 26 Pac. 88, and the principle there enunciated reiterated with approval in People v. Hower, supra. Appellant, in support of his attack upon the instruction, cites People v. Ford, 138 Cal. 141, 70 Pac. 1075, where the court said:

> "Temporary insanity as a defense to crime is as fully recognized by law as is permanent insanity."

What was there said, however, had no reference to that form of so-called insanity designated mania a potu, where, as stated, the condition is due to the voluntary act of the party.

The defendant requested 26 instructions, 10 of which were by the court given as requested, and 16 assignments of error are predicated upon the rulings of the court in refusing to give the remainder of those requested. As to nearly all of these assignments no argument is made in support of the alleged erroneous rulings; appellant contenting himself merely by setting out in hæc verba the instructions refused. A careful examination of the record discloses that the charge of the court, when taken in connection with the instructions given at the request of defendant, fully and fairly covered every phase of the case presented, and embodied a correct statement of the law applicable thereto, save in one or two minor matters which in no event could have been prejudicial to the rights of defendant.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

LAPIQUE v. SUPERIOR COURT OF LOS ANGELES COUNTY et al. (Civ. 1488.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. April 9, 1914. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court June 8, 1914.)

1. Mandamus (§ 51*)—Subjects of Relief—Courts and Judicial Officers.

When the lower court from the bench stated that he thought petitioner entitled to a certain order, and directed petitioner's attorney to draft the order, and then later refused to sign it, petitioner was not entitled to a writ of mandate to compel him to do so, since the statements from the bench were no part of the record or entitled to consideration.

2. Mandamus (§ 26*)—Subjects of Relief—Courts.

Petition by John Lapique against the Superior Court of the County of Los Angeles, Fred H. Taft, Judge, for a writ of mandate. Denied.

John Lapique, of Orange, in pro. per. Percy V. Hammon, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. It appears from the petition that in December, 1913, Lapique, as the assignee of an unsatisfied judgment rendered in favor of his assignor in 1905, applied to the superior court of Los Angeles county, pursuant to the provisions of section 685, Code of Civil Procedure, for an order directing the issuance of an execution for the enforcement of the judgment. Upon the hearing of the motion, the judge from the bench expressed the view that the application so made by plaintiff should be granted, and directed plaintiff's attorney to prepare and submit an order for the issuance of an execution, stating that he would sign the same. Thereafter the court refused to make such order, but, instead, on January 8, 1914, as shown by the return of respondent, made its order denying the application.

[1] The petition for the writ must be denied. The views of the judge expressed from the bench as to plaintiff's rights cannot be construed as an order granting the motion. It appears to be petitioner's contention that, since the judge announced from the bench that, in his opinion, plaintiff was entitled to the order asked for, he should have adhered to the opinion so expressed. What the judge said from the bench, since it did not constitute the order of the court, was immaterial. We have repeatedly held that the opinion of a judge filed in a case, where inconsistent with the findings or other action of the court, is not part of the record or entitled to consideration in determining questions brought up on appeal. So here, until the order was, in fact, made, there was no action on the part of the court, and the expressed views of the judge were as much subject to change as though they had remained unuttered.

[2] By making the order denying plaintiff's application the court acted upon the same. Whether the ruling be erroneous is immaterial, for, since it is not the function of a writ of mandate to review error (Gesford v. Superior Court, 114 Cal. 466, 46 Pac. 383), conceding its existence, no relief can be had in this proceeding.

The application is denied.

9. Appeal and Error (§ 1039*)—Review—Variance—Prejudice.

Where, in an action for breach of a contract to maintain a newspaper route, there was no material or substantial difference in terms and conditions between the oral agreement on which plaintiff was permitted to recover and the written contract alleged in the complaint, and defendant in his answer, in effect, admitted that plaintiff was vested with a right to distribute and deliver the paper in a specified district described in the complaint, but denied the value of the route as alleged, and in a cross-complaint admitted that plaintiff, under an agreement with defendant, had been engaged in distributing the paper in the district referred to, defendant was not prejudiced by an alleged variance, in that the contract sued on was alleged to have been in writing, while plaintiff was permitted to recover on an oral one.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by C. H. Otten against John D. Spreckels. From an order granting defendant a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Mastick & Partridge, of San Francisco, for appellant. Bourdette & Bacon, of San Francisco, for respondent.

HART, J. The plaintiff brought this action to recover damages in the sum of $10,750, for the alleged breach by the defendant of the terms of a certain contract, which is set out in hæc verba in the complaint.

A jury was called to try the questions of fact, and a verdict returned in favor of the plaintiff, assessing his damages at the sum of $8,000. In due time a motion for a new trial was submitted by the defendant upon the grounds of newly discovered evidence, etc., excessive damages appearing to have been awarded under the influence of passion and prejudice, insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict, and errors in law occurring at the trial and excepted to by the defendant. Upon hearing said motion, the court made the following order:

"* * * It is ordered that the motion will be granted, unless the plaintiff within 20 days from the date of entry hereof remits from the amount of the verdict and judgment herein the sum of three thousand ($3,000.00) dollars. If said amount will be remitted, an order will be entered denying defendant's motion for a new trial."

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

The plaintiff having refused or failed to remit the amount so specified by the court, the motion for a new trial stood as having been granted. This appeal is prosecuted by the plaintiff from the order granting said motion.

The contract set out in the complaint is in writing, and purports to have been made on the 30th day of September, 1903. Although, in the preliminary part of the instrument, technically called the "premises," the name of the plaintiff appears as "the party of the second part," the instrument thus purporting to be that of the defendant and the San Francisco Call, as the parties of the first part, and the plaintiff as the party of the second part, the agreement was signed by one Nicholas Ohlandt as the second party, or in the place and stead of the plaintiff.

The agreement constitutes the written evidence of a sale and transfer by the first parties to the second party, in consideration of the sum of $3,000, paid by the latter to the former, of "the agency of and for the said San Francisco Call, and of and for that certain newspaper route of the said * * * Call, lying and being in and about the city of Berkeley, state of California, and more particularly described as follows, to wit," and here follows a minute description of the boundaries of the route so sold.

The contract provides that the parties of the first part will, at a certain specified price per week, or at such other price as may thereafter be mutually agreed upon by the parties, furnish the second party with a sufficient number of the daily issues of said newspaper to supply said newspaper route. It further provides that the second party "shall manage, control, and conduct the said newspaper route in such manner, and with such efficiency, as shall be for the best interests of the said San Francisco Call newspaper, and shall maintain and preserve the extent and value of said newspaper route to the satisfaction of said parties of the first part. * * * And the said parties of the first part * * * further reserve the right to give their written consent before any legal transfer of this contract shall be made."

The complaint alleges that:

> "Although said contract was signed by Nicholas Ohlandt, the real party in interest was and still is this plaintiff; that said contract was signed by said Nicholas Ohlandt only for convenience; and that said facts were, at the time of entering into said contract, and ever since, well known to defendant."

It is further alleged that, on the 1st day of January, 1909, the defendant "ceased to supply the daily or any issues of said San Francisco Call to this plaintiff, and ever since has refused and neglected, and still refuses, to supply any thereof to plaintiff."

The defendant filed an answer to the complaint and also a cross-complaint.

By the answer, the defendant alleges that "he has no knowledge, information or belief as to whether the contract alleged in said complaint between the said plaintiff and this defendant was ever executed or delivered as alleged in paragraph 1 thereof, and, basing his denial upon that ground, denies that the plaintiff and defendant herein did, on the 30th day of September, 1903, or at any other time, or at all, enter into the contract set out" in said complaint, "or ever entered into any contract of any kind or character," or that he ever entered into the contract set out in the complaint with Nicholas Ohlandt as a party thereto. The answer positively denies that the real party in interest to said contract was or is the plaintiff, and likewise denies that said Ohlandt signed said contract for convenience only, or that, at the time the same was executed, the defendant knew that the plaintiff herein was the real party in interest to the said contract.

The cross-complaint avers that, for more than two years prior to the commencement of this action, which was April 21, 1909, the plaintiff was engaged in distributing the Call in a certain district in the town of Berkeley, under an agreement whereby the plaintiff paid the defendant for such newspapers as were delivered to him for distribution in said district, and collected from the subscribers payments for the papers so delivered monthly, in the name of the Call, for the defendant, "and at all times conducted the business of distributing the said newspapers and collecting therefor, as the business of the said San Francisco Call"; that said agreement further provided that the plaintiff should so manage the distribution and delivery of the said newspapers and make such collections as to maintain and preserve the extent and value of the business done by the said Call in said district, and to the satisfaction of the said defendant.

It is charged in the cross-complaint that the plaintiff failed properly to manage and conduct said business, in that he frequently failed to deliver said newspapers to subscribers at the proper hour in the morning; that in rainy weather he caused the same to be thrown into the yards of the subscribers, instead of delivering them upon the porches, so that said papers would lie in the rain and become wet; and that he failed to present or collect the accounts for said newspapers promptly, and would allow the same to run for months at a time uncollected. It is alleged that, by reason of the plaintiff's aforesaid carelessness and negligence in properly managing said business and promptly collecting the accounts for the newspapers supplied to him by the defendant for distribution and delivery in said district, the business of the said defendant in the said district was reduced and decreased in extent, and its value greatly depreciated. The defendant, so the cross-complaint further alleges, often called the plaintiff's attention to his remissness in attending to and managing the business in the manner exacted by the agreement, but that the plaintiff paid no attention to the remonstrances of the defendant in that regard; that the business of the defendant was thereby threatened with extinction; and that thereupon, and on the 1st day of January, 1909, the defendant did refuse to deliver to the plaintiff any newspapers to be used by him and distributed in the said district, and commenced the distribution thereof upon his own account.

The plaintiff, answering the cross-complaint, specifically denies the averments thereof. The plaintiff contends that the evidence is sufficient to support the verdict in all respects, and that therefore the court was without legal justification for ordering him, as a condition precedent to the denial of the defendant's motion for a new trial, to remit or consent to the reduction in the sum of $3,000, or in any other sum, of the amount of damages awarded him by the jury.

It will not, of course, be doubted that the order from which this appeal is prosecuted, although expressing the judgment of the court that the evidence is sufficient to justify a verdict for the certain amount of damages specified therein, is nevertheless one granting a new trial upon the ground that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict as rendered and returned. Indeed, the order is, in legal effect, nothing less than one based upon the ground that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict.

[1] While counsel for the defendant insist (whether correctly or incorrectly, it is not necessary to determine here) that the order appealed from, by reason of its peculiar phraseology, may be upheld upon any of the grounds stated in the notice of motion for a new trial, assuming all said grounds to be legally tenable, we are of the opinion that the only question submitted by this appeal to which attention need be given is whether it may reasonably be held that the record discloses any evidence from which the jury might have justly found that the plaintiff suffered no greater damage than that represented by the sum to which the court required the plaintiff, on pain of granting the motion for a new trial, to consent to a reduction of the amount of damages awarded by the jury. If there is such evidence, then it is not for this court to declare that the order appealed from is erroneous; for it is well settled that, where there is a conflict in the evidence, an order granting a new trial upon the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict is entirely within the legal discretion of the trial court. Domico v. Casassa, 101 Cal. 413, 35 Pac. 1024; Mills v. Oregon Ry. & Navigation Co., 102 Cal. 357, 36 Pac. 772; Warner v. Thomas Dyeing & Cleaning Works, 105 Cal. 409, 38 Pac. 960; In re Martin, 113 Cal. 480, 45 Pac. 813; Green v. Soule, 145 Cal. 96, 102, 78 Pac. 337; Cutten v. Pearsall, 146 Cal. 690, 81 Pac. 25; McCarthy v. Morris, 17 Cal. App. 723, 121 Pac. 696; Shea-Bocqueraz Co. v. Hartman, 20 Cal. App. 534, 536, 129 Pac. 807. Indeed, it has repeatedly been said in the cases that the action of a trial court in granting a new trial upon the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the decision "is so far a matter within its discretion that, if there is any appreciable conflict in the evidence, it is not open to review." Newman v. Overland Pac. Ry. Co., 132 Cal. 74, 64 Pac. 110, and cases therein cited.

It is true, as is said in Harrison v. Sutter St. Ry. Co., 116 Cal. 161, 47 Pac. 1020:

> "That such discretion is not a right to the exertion of the mere personal or arbitrary will of the judge, but it is a power governed by fixed rules of law, and to be reasonably exercised within those rules, to the accomplishment of justice. But, so long as a case made presents an instance showing a reasonable or even fairly debatable justification, under the law, for the action taken, such action will not be here set aside, even if, as a question of first impression, we might feel inclined to take a different view from that of the court below as to the propriety of its action. * * * The opportunities of the trial court in such instances for reaching just conclusions are, as a general thing, so superior to our own that we will not presume to set our judgment against that of the former, where there appears any reasonable room for difference."

Moreover, even in cases where there may not appear to be a conflict in the evidence, and where all the proofs seem to be favorable to the one or the other of the parties litigant, the question as to the probative force or evidentiary value of the testimony, in a proceeding on a motion for a new trial based upon the ground that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict, is one whose determination is with the trial court.

[2] The rule (elementary and commonly familiar in our system of jurisprudence) is that the plaintiff in a civil action must establish his case by a preponderance of proof, but, although many witnesses may testify directly in favor of his position, and no adversary testimony directly adduced, it is still with the jury, in the first instance, and finally with the trial court, where a new trial is asked on the ground stated, to say whether such testimony, when subjected to the legal tests whereby the probative value of evidence is to be judged, measures up to the requirement of the law as to the degree of proof essential to the support of an issue of fact. Of course, as has frequently been asserted, neither the jury nor the judge, in such a case, can arbitrarily reject testimony received in proof of the ultimate fact, or thus declare it to be unworthy of credence, but it is the duty of both, when exercising their respective functions with reference thereto, to consider and dispose of it by the light of the surrounding circumstances of the transaction constituting the subject-matter of the litigation, and their action in that regard will not be disturbed on appeal, where there appears to flow from the general surrounding circumstances of the case probable justification for discrediting or giving no weight to testimony which, on its face, may bear all the earmarks of probability.

Now, as before stated, from the nature of the order complained of here, it is manifest that the question with which this court is mainly concerned has reference to the evidence bearing upon the question of the value of the route over which this controversy has arisen; such value obviously constituting the measure of damages for the alleged breach of the agreement, which is the foundation of the plaintiff's right to a recovery, if any he has.

[3] An examination of the record before us will show that the testimony—both that produced by the plaintiff and that presented by the defendant—addressed to the question of value is not of a very satisfactory character; yet, testing the evidence upon that element of the case by the principles above stated, we do not feel that we are thus placed in a position to say that the court, in making the order from which this appeal is prosecuted, transcended the bounds of a sound judicial discretion.

It appears that, when the plaintiff offered the pleaded contract in evidence, objection by counsel for the defendant to its admission was sustained by the court. The record does not reveal the particular ground upon which the objection was interposed or sustained, but it appears from the briefs that the theory upon which the contract was excluded was that, from the fact that the instrument appeared upon its face to have been signed and executed by said Ohlandt, it was not the contract of the plaintiff, and that the latter was not, therefore, the real party in interest thereto. However, the court permitted the plaintiff, over objection by the defendant, to prove an oral agreement, between which and the contract pleaded in the complaint we perceive no substantial difference in terms, conditions, etc., whereby the plaintiff was vested with the agency of the Call in the territory described in the contract as set out in the complaint for the distribution and delivery therein of the said newspaper.

The evidence addressed to the proof of the value of said route showed these facts: That in the year 1903 the plaintiff's net income from the route amounted to the sum of $110 per month; that by the month of November, 1906, he had increased the number of subscribers in his route from 470 to 900, and that the expense in serving each subscriber remained the same as it had always been during the period preceding that time; that in the month of November, 1906, the plaintiff delivered papers to about 500 subscribers, and netted therefrom the sum of $131; that in August, 1908, the plaintiff leased to one Mills a portion of the route, in which portion there were 500 subscribers, and for which the latter paid to the plaintiff the sum of $50 per month, or 10 cents per subscriber; that thereafter (in the month of September, 1908) the same territory leased to Mills was leased to one Hanna, the monthly rental therefor being $50; that, after the plaintiff had leased to Mills as above explained, he had left 662 subscribers to whom he delivered the Call, and that his net profits from the delivery to said subscribers and the rentals received for other portions of his territory totaled a sum exceeding $200 per month. It further appears that the plaintiff had been offered $3,250 for a certain one-third of the territory, $3,750 for another third thereof, and $3,750 for the remaining third, totaling for the entire territory the sum of $10,750, which constitutes the amount for which he has sued.

Ohlandt, testifying for the plaintiff, was permitted to say, against the objection by the defendant, that he bought the route for the plaintiff, Otten, and one Cordes, who were his friends, and that his "best recollection" was that he paid therefor between $8,000 and $9,000. This testimony undoubtedly referred to the transaction involving and culminating in the written contract set out in the complaint, and parenthetically, it may be observed that there is a wide variance between said testimony and said contract as to the sum paid by Ohlandt for the route under that instrument, which declares that its consideration or the amount paid for said route was the sum of $3,000.

The foregoing represents a statement, in substance, of all the testimony adduced by the plaintiff in support of his estimate of the value of the route.

The defendant showed that, having become dissatisfied with the plaintiff's management of the business of distributing the Call in the territory involved in this controversy, he decided to terminate the agreement whereby the latter became his agent in said territory, and to that end procured a purchaser of said route, who agreed to pay therefor the sum of $5,000, the same to be paid to the plaintiff, and that said proposed purchaser deposited with the Call the sum of $500 on the purchase price. The plaintiff refused to accept this offer, declaring it to be inadequate to the value of the route. The defendant, however, further showed, by the production of copies of letters addressed, from time to time, by the Call to the plaintiff, that the latter's management of the business of distributing and delivering that newspaper in his territory was inefficient, and consequently unsatisfactory to said newspaper and its patrons, and that, as a result of such mismanagement, the business of said publication was rapidly falling off, and its future prospect in said territory thereby seriously menaced; that, to avert such result, or to counteract the effect of the plaintiff's mismanagement of, and asserted inattention to, the business, the Call, at extra expense, sent a man to said territory with instructions to assist the plaintiff in properly handling the work, and with authority to take such course as might be deemed essential to a rehabilitation of the business of the Call within said territory. This constitutes an epitomized statement of about all the testimony presented by the defendant.

It is manifest, from a review of all the testimony in the case, that, as declared, the showing upon the question of the value of the newspaper route involved herein is exceedingly meager and therefore unsatisfactory.

[4, 5] The fact that the plaintiff was offered certain sums for certain subdivisions of the route, while, perhaps, constituting some testimony of the value thereof which should be considered, is not the true, or even an approximately satisfactory, test of its actual value. Indeed, such testimony involves nothing more than the mere opinion upon the question of the value of the route of those expressing willingness to give therefor the prices offered by them, and even as opinion testimony it does not carry the weight as proof of value that may ordinarily be justly accorded expert testimony, since there is disclosed no standard or basis by which the witnesses were governed in offering the prices named, or, in other words, no reasons given why the prices named represented a fair valuation of the route. The same observations are, of course, applicable to the testimony presented by the defendant that the Call had procured a purchaser of the territory willing to pay therefor the sum of $5,000—a sum at which evidently the Call estimated the actual value of the route to be. Upon the question of value, however, this opinion testimony of the defendant is, to all appearances, equal, in evidentiary force, to that adduced by the plaintiff. Whatever force, then, that character of testimony may be deemed to possess as tending to establish the value of the route, it may be assumed, in support of the order appealed from, that the court, in considering the question of value, on the motion for a new trial, conceived and determined that the defendant's opinion testimony upon that subject was more reliable, or, under all the circumstances of the case, the more reasonable, estimate of the actual worth of the route than that of the same general character presented by the plaintiff.

[6] But, as the plaintiff well asserts, it was proper to consider, in determining the value of the route, the net sum that he, with approximate uniformity, earned therefrom. It was likewise proper to consider the sum actually paid therefor, if there was evidence thereof. Unquestionably these constituted important factors in the determination of value in this case. But they are by no means conclusive upon the question of value. The element of uncertainty as to the period of time during which the agreement might exist is of equal importance in testing the value of the territory. Or, as the proposition may thus be stated: The element of net earnings and that of the money actually paid for the right to deliver the newspaper in the route should be considered, as the trial court undoubtedly considered them, in the light of the nature of the agreement or the terms and conditions thereof and the character of the right vested in the plaintiff.

It is obviously true that the fact that a certain sum may be paid for a certain business or piece of property does not itself necessarily establish the actual value of such business or property. The buyer may have made, as is often the case, an improvident purchase; that is, paid far more for the thing bought than it is actually worth as an income producer.

As to the net earnings of the plaintiff, in their bearing on the question of value, it must be kept in mind that they are not to be regarded, strictly speaking, in the light of returns on the investment of money. As stated, it is true that the amount paid by the plaintiff for the exclusive right to distribute the Call within the designated territory must be considered; yet the success of the business is not, as in the ordinary or usual investments of capital, dependent upon the money paid for the route, but upon the plaintiff's personal services, from which his income is directly derived. It is, in other words, himself, and not the money paid for the right, that is working and earning the returns. But unquestionably he acquired, by virtue of the agreement, a right of property in said territory—the exclusive right to distribute and deliver the Call therein—of which he cannot be divested without just compensation; yet the right so acquired is little, if, indeed, in any degree, superior to a qualified right of property, since, as the testimony shows, the transferee of said right reserved to itself the authority and the power of terminating the agreement by requiring the plaintiff to transfer the route to some other person, satisfactory to the Call, whenever the plaintiff's management of the business became inefficient or in any substantial manner unsatisfactory to said newspaper. In other words the right remained absolute only so long as the plaintiff rendered efficient service. Therefore the value of the right to the plaintiff rested largely upon whether he did or did not manage the route according to the requirements of his contract. Manifestly, then, the value of said route would be much greater when efficient service is rendered than when the service is not efficient, and (as there is evidence tending to show occurred before the commencement of this action) the plaintiff is, for that reason, required to transfer his right to another. In any event, this element of uncertainty, although capable of being removed by the conduct of the plaintiff himself, constituted, in view of the evidence presented by the defendant, tending to disclose an unsatisfactory management of the business of the plaintiff, an important factor entering into the question of value.

Thus undoubtedly the trial court, on the motion for a new trial, considered and weighed the exceedingly unsatisfactory evidence upon the question of value, and so reached the conclusion that the Call's estimate of the value of the route was, under all the circumstances, fair and just. At all events, as stated in the outset of this opinion, this court cannot, after a painstaking review of the record, declare that the court abused its discretion in making the order appealed from.

In view of a future trial of this action, it is believed to be proper to express our views on some of the other points made here.

[7] In our judgment, the trial court should have permitted the plaintiff to prove the written contract pleaded in his complaint, upon a showing that, as the complaint alleges, the same was entered into by the parties of the first part and the plaintiff; that the latter was therefore the real party in interest to said contract; that Ohlandt signed it as a mere matter of convenience only, or as the agent of the plaintiff; and that the defendant was, at the time of the execution of the agreement, familiar with those facts, or, in other words, knew that the plaintiff was the real party in interest thereto. We can conceive of no rule or principle of law which may justly preclude proof dehors a written contract of the fact that one of the named parties thereto is only an ostensible, and not the real, party in interest to the instrument—that is, that the party whose name is subscribed to the instrument signed it for and as the agent or attorney in fact of the real party in interest—particularly where, as here, it is alleged that that fact and the reason for it were known and acquiesced in by all the parties at the time of the execution of the agreement. Indeed, the contract declares that it was made and entered into between the first parties and the plaintiff, and, as stated, no reason in principle is discernible why a parol explanation of the fact that a third party signed it as the agent of the plaintiff would not be perfectly proper.

[8] The point made by the plaintiff that the denial of the execution of the contract as pleaded on information and belief is tantamount to an admission of its due execution (Loveland v. Garner, 74 Cal. 298, 300, 15 Pac. 844) is, in view of other denials of the answer in that connection, only in part sustainable. While it is true that the answer, on information and belief, denies the execution and delivery of the contract, it positively denies that it was signed by Ohlandt as a matter of convenience only; that the plaintiff is the real party in interest thereto; and that such signing by Ohlandt and the interest of plaintiff in the contract were known to the defendant at the time of the execution of the instrument. Thus upon those points a direct issue is tendered, and it will therefore rest upon the plaintiff, as above intimated, if, on the retrial of the case, he relies on the contract as alleged by him to support by proof the last-mentioned allegations of the complaint; otherwise the instrument cannot be admitted as evidence of the agreement of the parties.

[9] It is also perhaps well to notice the point, urged by the defendant in support of the order, that there is a variance between the contract pleaded by the plaintiff and the evidence. The action, as seen, is for the breach of a written contract, and the proof shows an oral agreement. It would perhaps have been more regular had the plaintiff amended his complaint by setting up the oral agreement when he was driven to the proof thereof by the ruling excluding the contract alleged by him. But it cannot be said that the allowance of proof of the oral agreement was prejudicial to the defendant, for these reasons: (1) There is, as before stated, no material or substantial difference in terms and conditions between the oral agreement and the written contract. The only difference between the two lies in the fact that one is in writing and the other not. (2) The defendant, in his answer, in effect, admits that the plaintiff was vested with the right to distribute and deliver the daily issues of the Call in the district or territory described in the complaint, but denies that the route is of the value of $10,750, and alleges that it is not of value exceeding $1,000. The cross-complaint also admits that the plaintiff, under an agreement with the defendant, was engaged in distributing the Call in the district referred to. But, if there is any force in the objection under consideration, the ground therefor may readily be removed at a future trial of the case.

There are many alleged errors pointed out by the defendant in the rulings of the court on the admission of evidence which we do not deem it requisite to notice at this time.

For the reasons herein given, the order appealed from is affirmed.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; BURNETT, J.

DONLEAVEY v. JOHNSTON et al.

(Civ. 1213.)

1. Partnership (§ 9*) — Relation — Agreement.

Plaintiff and defendant entered into an agreement to conduct a grocery business, whereby plaintiff was to furnish all the money to conduct the business, purchase merchandise and equipment of the store, lease the premises used for the business in his own name, and the title to all the property was to be in plaintiff; both parties to give their efforts to the best advantage of the business, each to receive a salary of $85 monthly and divide the profits, one-fourth to defendant and three-fourths to plaintiff, etc. Held that, under the agreement, there was a partnership; the conditions and restrictions contained therein not making defendant a mere clerk or hired man.

3. Partnership (§ 229*)—Rights of Partners—Good Will of Business.

Where a partnership agreement provided that plaintiff was to continue the business in his own name, if defendant, his partner, did not desire to exercise the option given him therein of remaining in the business, plaintiff was entitled to the good will of the business after defendant ceased to be a partner.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; H. Z. Austin, Judge.

Action by J. F. Donleavey against F. H. Johnston and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

U. Grant Hayden, of Fresno, for appellant. Ernest Klette, of Fresno, for respondents.

CHIPMAN, P. J. This is an action commenced by plaintiff, as copartner of defendant Johnston, for an accounting, for a decree adjudging that plaintiff has an interest in certain real estate in the city of Fresno, claimed to be partnership property, and for damages. A demurrer to the complaint as first filed was sustained, the grounds of the demurrer being insufficiency of fact; that two or more causes of action are improperly joined, namely, for an accounting, for damages, and to establish a trust; that the complaint is ambiguous and uncertain, in that it cannot be determined from it how plaintiff has been or is damaged or of what such damage consists, nor can it be determined therefrom when defendants entered into the alleged agreement to purchase a certain grocery stock referred to in the complaint, nor when such agreement is to take effect. A demurrer to the amendment to the complaint on like grounds was sustained, and, plaintiff declining to further amend, judgment passed that plaintiff take nothing by his action.

The action grows out of the alleged breach by defendant Johnston of two certain written contracts, one entered into November 29, 1909, designated Exhibit A, and the other entered into as a continuation of Exhibit A, dated July 20, 1911, designated Exhibit B. By the contract, Exhibit A, the parties bind themselves "to become copartners, under the firm name of 'Donleavey & Johnston,' for the purpose of conducting a grocery business at the corner of O and Merced streets, in the city of Fresno, California, for a period of time extending from the 20th day of November, 1909, to the 1st day of January, 1911, upon the terms and conditions as follows:" Summarizing these conditions: First party (plaintiff) was to furnish all the money to conduct the business (limited to $3,000), purchase merchandise and equipment of the store, lease the premises used for the business, "in his own individual name," and "title of all property acquired for the use and conduct of the business" was to remain in first party; both parties were to give their efforts to the best advantage of the business; each was to receive "from the proceeds of sales" the sum of $85, monthly, and was to have the right to buy goods from the firm at retail prices less 10 per cent.; all goods, merchandise, and appliances were to be purchased only by first party when the price exceeded $20, and first party "shall have the sole right to draw checks upon the funds of said copartnership"; at the termination of the contract there was to be an accounting and settlement, the contract pointing out the manner of adjusting the interests of the parties. As a settlement was had for the period ending December 31, 1911, as is shown by Exhibit B, it is not necessary to state the details of such settlement; the contract declared that "it is the intention of the parties hereto that said business shall be conducted after the termination of this agreement," and the terms on which second party (defendant Johnston) "shall have the right to purchase a half or a quarter interest in said business and all the property and assets thereof" are set forth; neither party was to sign any note nor bond by way of accommodation without the consent of the other party, and a complete set of account books was to be kept recording all transactions, which should at all times be open to the inspection of both parties; upon a breach of any of the covenants, the party aggrieved may, upon 20 days' notice to the other party, terminate the agreement and have an accounting as provided in paragraph 5 of the contract.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

Exhibit B purports to be "an agreement of settlement and continuation of a certain partnership agreement entered into the 29th day of November, 1909." Exhibit A. It recites that "said agreement by its terms expired on the 1st day of January, 1911," and a "settlement and adjustment of the business of said partnership was had on said 1st day of January, 1911." The details of the settlement are set forth, showing, when summed up, that the interest of plaintiff in the business was $4,077.17 and of the defendant $454.38. It is then stated that the parties desire to continue the business in accordance with the agreement (Exhibit A) for one year from January 1, 1911, to January 1, 1912, and the agreement (Exhibit A) is referred to and made part of Exhibit B. It is then stated that inasmuch as the title to the property is in first party, who is also to furnish the money to conduct the business, "the said first party (plaintiff) has at the time of the execution of this agreement executed and delivered unto said F. H. Johnston his certain promissory note dated January 1, 1911, for the said sum of $454.38, payable January 1, 1912; * * * said note is given unto said second party in lieu of the profits belonging to said second party to the date January 1, 1912." (The date 1912 is doubtless error and should read January 1, 1911, which was the date of the settlement.)

It is alleged in the complaint that said agreements were entered into on the days of their dates, and that defendant Johnston has no claim on said business "excepting a stipulated salary and to one-fourth of the net profits of said business and property"; that defendant Johnston has elected not to purchase any interest in said business and so notified plaintiff, on November 20, 1911, and the whole thereof will vest in plaintiff on January 1, 1912, except Johnston's claim for the one-fourth part of the net profits for the year ending December 31, 1911; that said defendant Johnston, "in violation of his implied and express covenants of said partnership agreement," is endeavoring to secure the good will of said business and secure the location in which said business is conducted, in this: That during the summer of 1911 plaintiff and defendant discussed the proposition of buying the premises occupied by them, the price being $8,000, but defendant Johnston discouraged it, stating that "he had no money to buy with; that he did not think there was any danger of any one else buying the property," while at the same time he was planning to purchase said premises, and to that end disclosed to defendants Green and Elbow the profits of said business and induced them "to enter into a conspiracy to subvert the terms of said partnership agreement and to secure the said business away from plaintiff without paying plaintiff anything therefor," pursuant to which said purpose defendants "are now endeavoring to accomplish the same by purchasing" the premises in which said business is being conducted. It is then alleged that defendants, on November 1, 1911, entered into a written agreement with the owners of said premises for the purchase thereof at the price of $7,500, on terms stated in the complaint, agreeing to pay $500 cash and the balance on installments, to wit, $1,500 January 1, 1912, and the balance in annual installments of $1,000; that said efforts of defendant were without plaintiff's knowledge and contrary to his interests and were for the sole purpose "of taking plaintiff's business away from him"; that defendants have served plaintiff and defendant Johnston with notice to surrender the possession of said premises on January 1, 1912, and defendants and E. M. Wilson (owner of the premises) have served notice on plaintiff to quit possession on January 6, 1912; and that plaintiff is by the terms of his lease entitled to possession, said lease being from month to month payable on the 6th day of each month. It is next alleged that defendants have agreed to purchase the grocery stock of Wakefield & Walton; said agreement being entered into by defendant Johnston while a partner with plaintiff. It is further alleged that defendant Johnston tried to induce plaintiff to sell their stock of goods and business to said defendants Green and Elbow for less than plaintiff thought it worth, while defendant Johnston was himself interested with said other defendants. It is also alleged that plaintiff elects to adopt the acts of defendant Johnston in the purchase of said premises and "to accept the same as having been done for the benefit of plaintiff, and offers to reimburse defendant Johnston for any money advanced by him in said purchase, and is ready, able, and willing to do the same, and does hereby offer to do" anything necessary to the consummation of the purchase of said premises under said agreement to purchase by said defendants; that plaintiff has kept and performed all covenants by him to be performed; that at all times prior to November 20, 1911, "plaintiff supposed that it was the intention of said Johnston to continue as a partner with plaintiff in said business," a supposition founded upon the conduct and actions of said Johnston; that "plaintiff and defendant Johnston are now conducting said grocery business jointly as copartners and have joint possession thereof"; that "plaintiff is ready and willing to have an accounting with said defendant at any time prior to January 1, 1912, has heretofore, and since learning of defendant's having interests contrary and adverse to the interests of said partnership, offered to have an accounting and settlement with said Johnston, but defendant has refused to have an accounting; that plaintiff is entitled to an accounting and requests that an accounting be had not later than January 1, 1912; that on the 1st day of January, 1912, plaintiff is entitled to full possession and control of the whole of said business, together with the stock and fixtures and appliances used therein, and the said premises upon which said business is conducted"; that, by the said acts of said Johnston, plaintiff has been damaged in the sum of $1,500; that the defendant Modern Grocery Company is a corporation "organized within the past week" by defendants other than said company to take legal title to said premises and conduct a grocery business thereon, and plaintiff is informed and believes that some "interest in said property has been or is about to be transferred to said corporation, and for that reason it is made party defendant." The complaint was filed prior to the date for the termination of Exhibit A, to wit, December 20, 1911. The amendment to the complaint was filed February 10, 1912, and it states that plaintiff confines his claims as made in the complaint and its amendment to claims against defendant Johnston alone "as the sole defendant in the action." Paragraph 14 is added to the complaint as an amendment, in which it is alleged that said defendant Johnston and said defendants Green and Elbow took possession of the stock and business of said Wakefield & Walton, and ever since have been and now are conducting said business under the name of Modern Grocery Company; that on January 1, 1912, in accordance with said partnership agreement between plaintiff and defendant, a settlement was reached as to the value of the stock and fixtures of said firm of Donleavey & Johnston, and plaintiff took possession and control of the same " and endeavored to continue the said business on the premises described in paragraph 1 of plaintiff's complaint, but that, in accordance with the notice requiring plaintiff to vacate said premises January 6, 1912, * * * plaintiff was by the said parties serving said notice, forced to vacate said premises on the 7th day of January, 1912," and said defendants entered into possession and ever since have been and now are conducting a grocery business on said premises under the name of Modern Grocery Company; that "the fee title to said premises," in accordance "with the agreement to purchase alleged in the complaint," has been by deed of grant conveyed to said defendants Johnston, Green, and Elbow as tenants in common, "share and share alike"; that, "on account of said acts of defendant secretly and fraudulently purchasing the said premises and compelling plaintiff to vacate the same, plaintiff lost the business and good will of said business which, by the terms of said partnership agreement, defendant had agreed should belong to plaintiff; that defendant refuses to account to plaintiff for the said good will of said business."

The issues in the controversy are between plaintiff and defendant Johnston and are narrowed down to two: (1) Has plaintiff any enforceable interest in the title to the real property now held by Johnston? (2) Do the facts alleged entitle plaintiff to an accounting, or to an action for damages, to determine his interest in the lease of said property and in the good will of the business which he alleges was lost to him by Johnston's said wrongful acts and conduct?

[1] We think the agreements sufficiently show that plaintiff and defendant Johnston were partners. They were associated "for the purpose of carrying on business together and dividing its profits between them" (Civ. Code, § 2395); and also impliedly dividing its losses (Civ. Code, § 2405).

> "While, of course, the question whether or not a partnership exists is to be determined from the nature of the relation agreed upon, rather than the name which the parties have given to it, some weight must be allowed to the language of the parties themselves." Title Ins. & Trust Co. v. Grider, 152 Cal. 746, 752, 94 Pac. 601, 603.

We do not think that the relation of defendant Johnston to plaintiff created by the agreements is changed from that of a partner to that of a mere clerk or hired man, as is contended by Johnston, by the "restrictions, prohibitions, and conditions" found in the agreements. The provision that Johnston might draw out monthly $85 also included plaintiff and is not an unusual provision in partnership agreements, for partners must live. Nor does the provision that plaintiff, who put up the money necessary to carry on the business, should have the right to dictate as to purchases of a value greater than $20, or that he should make purchases in his own name, or that after the termination of the agreements plaintiff should conduct the business in his own name, necessarily show that they were not partners during the existence of the agreements. Notwithstanding these safeguards for plaintiff's benefit, defendant was to share in the profits and was chargeable with losses in the business carried on as it was under the firm name of Donleavey & Johnston.

[2] "The good will of a business is the expectation of continued public patronage" (Civ. Code, §§ 992, 993), and is property transferable like any other property. Its loss may be the subject of damages. Snow v. Holmes, 71 Cal. 142, 148, 11 Pac. 856. In Bell v. Ellis, 33 Cal. 620, 624, the court quotes approvingly from Story on Partnership, § 99, as follows:

> Good will has been defined "to be the advantage or benefit which is acquired by an establishment beyond the mere value of the capital, stock, funds, or property employed therein, in consequence of the general public patronage and encouragement which it receives from constant or habitual customers, on account of its local position, or common celebrity, or reputation for skill or affluence, or punctuality, or from other accidental circumstances, or necessities, or even from ancient partialities or prejudices."

The court, in its opinion, said:

> It is "an element of strength and permanency which adds very much to the value of the premises and stock when decreed to be sold and will accompany the sale. According to Lord Eldon * * * it is the probability that the business will continue in the future as in the past, adding to the profits of the concern and contributing to the means of meeting its engagements as they come in."

[3] This good will attached itself to the business, and plaintiff was entitled to enjoy it after defendant ceased to be a partner, for it was expressly provided that he was to continue the business in his own name if his partner did not exercise the option given him to remain in the firm. The intention of the parties was to buid up a business which was to continue after the agreements terminated. The partnership was formed to conduct its business at a particular street corner, and, as we have seen, the place where it is conducted may be of great value. To be compelled to remove from the place where the trade of the firm has been built up may seriously affect the success of the enterprise.

[4, 5] It was held in Anderson v. Lemon, 8 N. Y. 236, that where one partner secretly makes a purchase of premises occupied by the firm, while the other party with his concurrence is negotiating with the owner to obtain the property for the use of the firm, the purchaser will be declared a trustee for the firm. There can be no doubt of the soundness of the principle upon which this case was decided, that the partnership relation is one of confidence and trust, and every partner is bound to act in the highest good faith toward his copartners and may not obtain any advantage over them in the partnership affairs by misrepresentation, concealment, or adverse pressure of any kind; and this is but the doctrine of our Civil Code found in sections 2410 and 2411. The principle is more frequently invoked in renewals of leases, as merchants and tradesmen seldom own the property occupied for their business. Mitchell v. Reed, 61 N. Y. 123, 19 Am. Rep. 252, is an instructive case of this character. The authorities as to the right of trustees and partners to take renewal leases for their own benefit are there collated and discussed. It was held that one member of a copartnership cannot, during its existence, take a renewal for his own benefit of premises leased by the firm, upon which it has made valuable improvements, and by the joint efforts of the members made the good will valuable and enhanced the value of the premises, and this although the term of the renewal lease did not begin until after the copartnership had expired by its own limitations; that a lease so taken by one partner in his own name inures to the benefit of the firm, and the partner in whose name it is taken can be required to account to his copartners for its value; and it is not material that the landlord would not have granted the new lease to the other partners of the firm. Syllabi. Speaking of Struthers v. Pearce, 51 N. Y. 357, the court, by Earle, C., said:

"The principle which lies at the foundation of the decision of that and all similar cases must be the one above stated, that the defendants in possession took advantage of their position to procure the new lease, and thus deprived the plaintiff of a benefit to which he, with them, was equally entitled."

In a note to Moody v. Mathews, 17 Ves. 185, the learned editor says, as a deduction from adjudged cases, that:

"With a possible exception in favor of a bona fide purchaser, it seems an universal rule that no one who is in possession of a lease with any sort of equity in behalf of third persons can renew the same for his own use only; but such renewal must be construed as a graft upon the old stock."

After reviewing the cases, the learned judge says:

"I therefore conclude that it makes no difference that the leases were obtained for a term to commence after the partnership, by its own limitation, was to terminate. I can find no authority holding that it does, and there is no principle sustaining the distinction claimed. The defendant was in possession as a member of the firm, and the firm owned the good will for a renewal, which ordinarily attaches to the possession. By his occupancy, and the payment of rent, he was brought into intimate relations with the lessors; he became well acquainted with the value of the premises, and he took advantage of his position, during the partnership, secretly to obtain the new leases. He must hold them for the firm."

Dwight, C., reviews the cases more fully. Quoting at length from the leading case of Lee v. Vernon, 5 Brown's Parl. Cases, 10 (Eng. Ed. 1803), Judge Dwight said:

"The cestui que trust has a right to the chance of renewal. Though this is termed a 'tenant right' as between the lessee and the landlord, that is a mere phrase. It is a hope, an expectation, rather than a right. Such as it is, the trustee shall not take it to himself, but, if it results in any substantial benefit, he shall hold for his beneficiary. [Citing cases.] * * * The sound rule is that he cannot make any profit to himself from a secret transaction initiated while the relation of trustee and cestui que trust exists, no matter when it springs into actual operation."

Among other of the conclusions reached by the learned judge it is stated that:

"This doctrine extends to commercial partnerships, and one of several partners cannot, while the partnership continues, take a renewal lease clandestinely, or 'behind the backs' of his associates, for his own benefit; it is not material that the landlord would not have granted the new lease to the other partners, or to the firm."

Furthermore that:

"It is of no consequence whether the partnership is for a definite or indefinite period. The disability to take the lease for individual profit grows out of the partnership relation. While that lasts, the renewal cannot be taken for individual purposes, even though the lease does not commence until after the expiration of the partnership. * * * Common justice and due regard to rules of public policy demand that the renewal leases should be declared to belong to the firm, and that the defendant should be required to account to the plaintiff for his portion of its value."

The doctrine here announced is summarized by Mr. Pomeroy as sound at the present time, although defendant suggests that the rules enunciated in Anderson v. Lemon, supra, and Mitchell v. Reed, supra, by reason of their antiquity, have become obsolete. 3 Pomeroy, Equity Juris. § 1050. In Knapp v. Reed, 88 Neb. 754, 13 N. W. 430, 32 L. R. A. (N. S.) 869, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 1095 (Neb. 1911), it was held that, in a partnership carrying on business in premises which it holds under a lease, neither partner can, without the consent of the other, take a renewal of the lease in his own name and so exclude the other partner and secure the good will of the business for himself; and, where this is attempted, the lease will inure to the benefit of both partners; and where dissolution of the partnership, without an adjustment by the partners of their rights in the good will of the business and in the premises which they hold under the lease, it is the province of a court of equity to adjust such differences. Among the cases cited in support of the doctrine is Mitchell v. Reed, supra. Warren v. Schainwald, 62 Cal. 56, was a case where one member of a firm composed of several parties, after the death of one of them, falsely, and with the intent to prevent a proper settlement, represented to his surviving copartners that he had become the owner of the interest of the deceased and thus prevented a purchase by them of such interest. It was held that the purchase was made for the benefit of plaintiff and defendants. It appeared in the case that the interest of the deceased partner would have been purchased by the surviving partners for their mutual benefit if the plaintiff, Warren, had not prevented such purchase by misrepresentations, and under such circumstances he was justly held to have purchased for the benefit of himself and the defendants, his copartners. So in Anderson v. Lemon, supra, the partners were negotiating with the owner for the purchase of the property, showing an unmistakable intention to purchase, when one of the partners thwarted this design by himself becoming the purchaser. While the equitable doctrine of these cases, as of the cases involving leases, is sound, we are unable to see that plaintiff has shown a clear right to share as tenant in common of the fee now held by defendant Johnston and his cotenants. He discussed with his partner, at one time, the propriety of purchasing the property and was discouraged by him from making the purchase. It does not appear, however, that he really desired to purchase nor that he would have done so had he not been dissuaded by his partner from doing it. Furthermore, in view of the provisions of the agreements, we are unable to see how the quantity of interest in the land to which plaintiff would be entitled could be definitely ascertained. By the terms of the partnership agreements, he owned all the property of the partnership, and Johnston's interest was a share in the net profits only. The fee ownership of the situs or land on which the business was conducted was not contemplated, and nothing more than a leasehold interest in it was necessary to the business. But it is because plaintiff has been deprived of this leasehold interest, or a right to acquire it, by the acts of Johnston in clandestinely purchasing the land, that plaintiff has been damaged. This damage consists in loss of the good will of the business and in being compelled to seek some other place to conduct it. In ascertaining the damage thus inflicted, some consideration should be given to the value of the lease to plaintiff as securing to him the enjoyment of the good will to which the location has in part contributed.

We are clearly of the opinion that a cause of action is sufficiently stated as the basis for a judgment for damages should the evidence warrant it, and that an accounting should be had to that end.

The judgment is reversed.

HAMMITT et al. v. EDWARDES et al.

1. WILLS (§ 316*) — EXECUTION — TESTAMENTARY CAPACITY.

In a will contest, evidence on an issue of testamentary capacity held insufficient to authorize a submission of testatrix's alleged unsoundness of mind to the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 742–749; Dec. Dig. § 316.*]

2. WILLS (§ 52*)—TESTAMENTARY CAPACITY—SANITY—PRESUMPTION.

A presumption of sanity exists in favor of a testatrix, and the burden of proving unsoundness of mind in a will contest rests on the contestant.

3. WILLS (§ 55*)—TESTAMENTARY CAPACITY—MENTAL UNSOUNDNESS.

Evidence of mere imaginings by testatrix, a woman of advanced age, from which she believed there was a man in her room, and that she had received messages slipped under her door, and feared that she was being watched and was about to be robbed, did not indicate an impairment of normal testamentary capacity nor show a condition of general mental weakness sufficient to indicate testamentary incapacity.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; F. B. Ogden, Judge.

Proceeding by Jennie S. Hammitt and others, to contest the will of Mary P. MacCrellish, deceased, against William P. Edwardes, and another, proponents. From a judgment declaring the will invalid, and from an order denying defendants' motion for a new trial, they appeal. Reversed.

McGowan & Westlake, of San Francisco, for appellants. Snook & Church, of Oakland, for respondents.

MELVIN, J. Certain of the heirs of Mary P. MacCrellish, deceased, successfully contested and secured judgment for revocation of the probate of a document which had been executed as her last will and testament. One of the grounds of contest was undue influence alleged to have been exerted by William P. Edwardes and Mary W. Edwardes, the appellants, but a nonsuit was granted in their favor regarding this ground. Upon the other ground, namely, the alleged incapacity of the testatrix, the jury found in favor of the contestants, and this appeal is by proponents from the judgment entered in accordance with said verdict and from the order denying a motion for a new trial.

Appellants specify several alleged errors, but we find it necessary to consider only their contention that the evidence was not sufficient to support the verdict.

The will was in due form and was properly witnessed by men who testified at the trial to their firm belief in the testamentary capacity of Mrs. MacCrellish at the time the instrument was executed. The will was a simple and by no means an unnatural one. The contestants were Mrs. MacCrellish's nieces and nephew of the half blood. They resided in Philadelphia and were not upon terms of close intimacy with Mrs. MacCrellish. By the will their mother was bequeathed the sum of $100 and a like amount was to go to each of them. To her husband's nephew, Dr. A. C. Peterson, she bequeathed $1,000, and to her business agent, H. M. Wooley, $500. Her "beloved sister Martha V. Woodward" was mentioned in the will but was left nothing on the ground that Mrs. Woodward was "already well provided for." The residue of the estate was to be divided as follows: To Mrs. Edwardes, her niece with whom she had lived for some years, one-half; to the grandnephew of testatrix, Vance P. Edwardes, one-tenth; to a grandniece, Helen Kaufman, one-tenth; to a nephew, Thomas B. Woodward, and a grandnephew, Robert S. Woodward, each one-twentieth; to a grandniece, Isabel Melsted, one-tenth, and to Ethel Glenn, another grandniece, one-tenth.

The witnesses to the will were Rod W. Church and H. F. Whitney. The former had not met Mrs. MacCrellish before the occasion when the will was signed, but he talked with her and asked her some questions regarding the will. Her demeanor and her answers convinced him that she was of sound mind. The other witness, Wm. P. Whitney, one of the appellants, had drawn the will from memoranda furnished by Mr. Edwardes, and had given the paper to Mr. Edwardes the day before it was signed. He had met Mrs. MacCrellish a few times before the 3d day of January, 1911, the date of the execution of her will. Like Mr. Church, he was of the opinion that she was of sound and disposing mind and memory on that day. Two other witnesses, not interested in the outcome of the contest, testified very strongly to Mrs. MacCrellish's sanity and capacity to make a will. Dr. John Kastendieck, who had known her well and had formerly been her medical adviser, saw her on the Christmas day before the execution of the will. His visit was of a social nature, and he found her in excellent health and spirits. Though an aged woman who had lived 82 years, she was strong mentally, and he considered her amply qualified to make a will. Mrs. Jessie Walker, who had known her well for years, last saw Mrs. MacCrellish in February, 1911. She testified most positively to the old lady's excellent mental condition. Mr. Edwardes, the only other witness for the proponents, was the executor of the estate. He was also of the opinion that the will was the deliberate product of a sound and disposing mind. Opposed to this testimony was that of Dr. Peterson, one of the legatees, who was a nephew of the deceased husband of the testatrix, and Mr. H. M. Wooley, another legatee, who had been Mrs. MacCrellish's business agent for some years. Dr. Peterson testified that he had noticed peculiarities and conduct out of the ordinary on the part of his aunt from time to time after the fire of 1906. His testimony, however, is descriptive of an old lady, wanting an acute memory, perhaps, and doubtless somewhat peculiar, but not altogether without testamentary capacity. Speaking of her condition at a time between 1906 and her death in 1911, he said:

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

"A great deal was due to her lack of memory and condition of mind at that time. For instance, I used to give her some straight talk when I first went there, and about an hour afterwards she would broach the same thing that evidently had passed entirely from her mind, forgotten all about it."

Mr. Wooley was the principal witness on behalf of the contestants. He said that before the fire Mrs. MacCrellish was a strong-minded, highly educated woman. Prior to 1906 he spoke to her about making a will, but she said she did not desire to make one at that time. In March, 1910, he submitted to her the skeleton of a will which gave to the Hammitts about the same amount which was assigned to them in the will which was afterwards probated, but there was no provision in the skeleton will showing the proportion which was to be bequeathed and devised to Mrs. Edwardes, Dr. Peterson, or Mr. Wooley. Regarding this memorandum witness testified as follows:

"At the time I submitted this pencil memorandum or skeleton of a will to Mrs. MacCrellish, we were alone. I told her that Mr. Edwardes had spoken to me, and that it was his wish and Mrs. Edwardes' wish, and my own advice, that she should do something to get her affairs straightened out, and she asked me what I thought she ought to do, and I told her I thought she ought to make a will, and then I told her of the talk I had had with Mr. Edwardes, and submitted this outline, that I have already referred to, to her. She looked through the will and said that the form of it did not suit her (that is, the disposition of the property did not suit her); that she wanted to add to the will a special bequest to Vance Edwardes, who is the son of Mr. and Mrs. Edwardes, as she was very fond of him. She also said that she wanted to leave a special bequest to Dr. Peterson and myself, and then to divide the balance of the estate into three parts, one part for Mrs. Edwardes, one part for Mr. Tom Woodward, and one part to be divided among the eastern heirs, and she said they were her half-brother's children and she wanted them to be so remembered. This conversation was held in the early part of March, 1910, and in my opinion her mind at that time was perfectly sound."

He also said that Mrs. MacCrellish had suffered from a cerebral congestion, resembling apoplexy, about the year 1905, but had entirely recovered. About the middle of 1910 Mr. Wooley noticed a change in Mrs. MacCrellish. Of this he said:

"That was along about the middle of 1910 that I first observed that condition. Aside from that I noticed that I would tell her something and she would in a little while after, maybe in the same day, or something I told her in the previous visit, she would forget that I ever told her anything about it. At that time she was living with the Edwardes at 412 Oakland avenue, in Oakland. From that time until the time this will is claimed to have been executed on the 3d day of January, 1911, what I have told you about covers anything out of the ordinary that I noticed in what she said, except on one or two occasions when I was there she claimed that there was a man in the room, and once or twice she had me go out in the hall to look for a man. There was no man there. It was somewhere between July and December, 1910, that this condition first manifested itself. From that time on I think that occurred in my presence, I think, twice. The second time that occurred right along there in that period. The instances I recollect particularly is we were sitting in the dining room, and she says, 'There is a man out there;' and she said, 'You listen and you will hear him.' And presently she said, 'Go out and see.' And I went out and looked all around the place, and there was no one there. I don't remember just who was present at that time, but some members of the Edwardes family, and on another occasion I think Vance did the same thing. On this particular occasion to which I have referred, it was about 6 o'clock in the evening. I don't know that at that time she also told me there was a man that was watching her that was trying to get in her room at night. She told me that several times, two or three times, during the last six months of her life. She also said she got messages slipped under her door and expressed fears of being watched and being robbed. I cannot remember her language, but that was the substance of what it was."

Nevertheless Mr. Wooley continued his efforts to get her to make a will, and on the 1st of January, 1911, at Mr. Edwardes' suggestion he went to see her for that purpose. She seemed to be dazed, he said, but was sitting up. The members of the family present told him that they did not think the old lady would recognize him. Of this visit he testified that, after she had been aroused out of a "sort of stupor," he went and sat by her and asked her how she was. At first she did not recognize him, but after a minute or two she brightened up and seemed to know him. They had a very brief conversation. On the following evening, Mr. Wooley returned to the home of the Edwardes' family. The best idea of this visit may be obtained from a quotation of the following portion of his testimony:

"I don't remember the preliminary conversation. What was talked of before—that is, immediately before I started to talk with Mrs. MacCrellish about the will. I had been—he asked me in the morning to come over there and get her to make the will, and that was my business there that night, and I sat down to talk with her about the will. I told her (Mrs. MacCrellish) that Mr. Edwardes had asked me to speak to her about it; that he thought she ought to get her affairs in shape; and I thought myself that if she wanted to make a will she ought to do so. She started to cry. She said: 'I can't make a will. I haven't got 25 cents. Here I haven't got the money to pay Mrs. Edwardes my board. Now I can't do anything about that until we get the money from Mr. Lewis.' Mr. Lewis is the man to whom the mining property had been bonded. She had property at that time; she had some flats in San Francisco and property in Marin and El Dorado counties, some vacant property in San Francisco, and property in Mariposa county. The flats in San Francisco were located at Jones and Bernard streets, and they were partly rented at that time. She had not been receiving much income from the property for quite awhile. They had been only partly rented, and there were a great many expenses during that year."

After some further conversation Mr. Wooley told Mr. Edwardes that there was no use talking to Mrs. MacCrellish any longer. Mr. Wooley then went away. On the following day Mrs. MacCrellish executed the will which has been attacked by contestants. Summing up his reasons for believing the testatrix was mentally incompetent at the time of making the will, Mr. Wooley said:

> "I base that opinion on the condition of her mind that I had observed; her actions and her talk that I had observed in the last six months of her life, during nearly all of that time; she was not fit to do business during the last six months. She could answer questions, but, so far as being able to do anything or make any plans or anything of that kind, she was not able to do it. When I speak of acts and talks that constitute a basis or in part a basis for my opinion as to her mental condition, I refer to the fact of her seeing men around that were not there. My other reasons for basing my opinion are the fact of her starting in to tell me something and dropping off in the middle of her talk and not being able to finish it; forgetting what she was talking about while she was talking; and the facts of my telling her something during the conversation and she asked me the same question several times in one conversation after having been answered; also the fact of her physical condition when I saw her—particularly speaking when I saw her on the 1st of January, she was in a dazed condition and she could barely recognize me, and when I saw her on the 2d of January, when I went there to get her to make a will, and asked her about it, she started in to cry like a child and said she didn't have anything and couldn't make a will until she got the money from Mr. Lewis."

Mr. Edwardes corroborated Mr. Wooley with reference to the old lady's hallucinations upon the subject of the supposed presence of men in the house and the desire of some one to rob her.

[1] From an examination of all of this evidence, we are convinced that the court should not have allowed the issue of unsoundness of mind to go to the jury.

[2] The presumption of sanity exists in favor of a testatrix, and upon the contestant rests the burden of proving unsoundness of mind. Estate of Dolbeer, 149 Cal. 230, 86 Pac. 695, 9 Ann. Cas. 795. This burden has not been sustained by the contestants. The most that can be said of the testimony of Dr. Peterson and Mr. Wooley, giving it, as we must, the interpretation most favorable to contestants (Estate of Arnold, 147 Cal. 583, 82 Pac. 252), is that Mrs. MacCrellish was suffering from some of the infirmities of old age, and that she was afflicted with certain hallucinations having no relation to the objects of her bounty.

[3] It has long been the rule in this state that proof of such imaginings which do not indicate an impairment of the normal testamentary capacity is not sufficient to overthrow a solemnly executed instrument such as the one we are now considering. Estate of Kendrick, 130 Cal. 364, 62 Pac. 605. Evidently the witness Wooley did not consider the old lady incompetent because of these ideas that men were hiding near her, spying on her, and wishing to rob her. He urged her to make a will after he had observed these idiosyncrasies. The fact that she seemed dazed for a few moments on the 1st day of January, 1911, when he spoke to her, did not convince him of her incapacity, because the next day he returned to the task of seeking to induce her to make a will. We do not say this in criticism of Mr. Wooley, nor do we assume to weigh his testimony. We merely mention his conduct as that of the normal individual and to illustrate the impression which such facts as he mentioned would naturally make upon one in his relation of intimacy and confidence with the old lady. Neither did her weeping and her declaration on January 2, 1911, that she had no money amount to a showing that she lacked the power to dispose of her property intelligently on the following day. Some mining property which she regarded as very valuable had been bonded by Mr. Lewis, and it was natural for her to be disappointed and to mourn because he had not felt justified in purchasing it. It is true that at that time her other property was not very remunerative, and well may it have been true that she spoke in a comparative sense when she said she had no property and could not make a will until she heard from Mr. Lewis. The evidence in this case is very much weaker than that held insufficient to justify the setting aside of wills in other cases decided by this court. It is unnecessary to do more than to cite the following authorities in support of this statement: Estate of Chevallier, 159 Cal. 167, 113 Pac. 130; Estate of Packer, 164 Cal. 528, 129 Pac. 778; Estate of Purcell, 164 Cal. 305, 128 Pac. 932; Estate of Kendrick, 130 Cal. 363, 62 Pac. 605.

The judgment and order are reversed.

Department 2. Appeal from the Superior Court of Riverside County; F. Densmore, Judge.

Application by Gertrude E. Fox and another for the probate of the will of Emily M. Merryfield, deceased, contested by Clarence J. Merryfield and another. Judgment for proponents, and contestants appeal. Affirmed.

H. L. Carnahan, of Riverside, for appellants. Purington & Adair, of Riverside, for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. Emily M. Merryfield, a widow, died in 1913 leaving surviving her five sons and two daughters. For several years before her death she had been so blind that she could not recognize objects, and could only distinguish between light and dark. She was 68 years of age. On the day before her death her daughter Gertrude E. Fox found three sheets of paper folded together and placed in a locked drawer. In this drawer were other papers. Each of these three sheets contained writing entirely in the hand of the deceased. The three sheets were of the same size and character of paper, and apparently were torn from the same writing pad. The first of these sheets contained the following:

"Riverside, Cal. I write to certify that I am right and will name the property I have in my house which I give my girls, Gertrude Fox and Ethel Schofield. I give and bequeath all I have, all my property, my house and lot and things in the house."

The second sheet contained this:

"I want to have all my things in the house, the boys have got more than the girls and they won't get any more; this is my last will and is as I want it to be.

"Signed this —— of 1911, by Emily Merryfield."

On the third sheet was written:

"Riverside, Cal.

"This is my will. My mind is good and I want my girls, Gertrude and Ethel, to have all my belongings, my house and lot and the things in the house.

"This eleventh day of December, 1911.

"Mrs. Emily Merryfield."

These three sheets of paper were offered for probate as being the last will and testament of the deceased. Certain of the sons instituted a contest to the admission in probate of the three sheets, contending that the writing upon the third sheet alone constituted the will of the deceased. There was to the trial court presented no other ground of contest. That court after a hearing determined that the contents of the three sheets constituted one instrument, which was the last will and testament of the deceased. The soundness of this determination is here presented for review.

Appellants' position is that the first two sheets constituted an imperfectly executed olographic will; that the third sheet contains a perfect olographic will; that the evidence is not sufficient to support the court's finding that the first two sheets are to be read and construed as a part of a harmonious homogeneous olographic will; that the evidence is not sufficient to establish this relationship between the three sheets which the court found to exist, and that therefore the first two sheets must be denied probate.

[1, 2] The case thus presented is not that contemplated by section 1320 of the Civil Code, by which it is declared that "several testamentary instruments executed by the same testator are to be taken and construed together as one instrument," nor is it the case of the incorporation into a will of extrinsic writings where the evidence identifying such writings must be clear to justify such incorporation. Shillaber Estate, 74 Cal. 144, 15 Pac. 453, 5 Am. St. Rep. 433; In re Young, 123 Cal. 337, 55 Pac. 1011. The case actually presented may be stated by the question whether the evidence upholds the finding of the court that the three sheets of paper form a single continuous instrument constituting the last will of the deceased. That the evidence is sufficient for this we think no doubt can be entertained. There was no other writing upon the sheets saving that of the testatrix. The sheets themselves were arranged and folded together in proper sequence. If testatrix had believed that the last page alone was her will, it is not probable that she would have preserved the first and second pages with such care, and would so have enfolded them as to evidence her belief that they were a part of and incorporated in her will. The omission of words and the repetition of ideas are not unusual in the writings of a person of advanced years and unskilled in the art of exact legal expression. The fact that the will is written upon more than one sheet of paper is immaterial. Estate of Taylor, 126 Cal. 97, 58 Pac. 454. Nor is it necessary to support the finding that the several detached pieces of paper constituted one instrument that these sheets should be fastened together by mechanical or other device. 40 Cyc. 1093; Sellards v. Kirby, 82 Kan. 291, 108 Pac. 73, 28 L. R. A. (N. S.) 270, 136 Am. St. Rep. 110, 20 Ann. Cas. 214; Schillinger v. Bawek, 135 Iowa, 131, 112 N. W. 210; Murrell v. Barnwall, 110 Ala. 668, 20 South. 1021.

It is concluded herefrom that the finding of the court is sustained by adequate evidence, and the order and decree appealed from are therefore affirmed.

FINCH v. WESTERN NAT. BANK OF SAN FRANCISCO. (Civ. 1205.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 13, 1914.)

1. DAMAGES (§ 1*)—RIGHT OF RECOVERY IN GENERAL — WRONGFUL APPEAL BY GARNISHEE.

Where a garnishee declined to pay over sums due the principal debtor, and appealed from a judgment in favor of plaintiff, plaintiff's recovery, if an action for the garnishee's acts may be maintained, is not restricted to the amount due the principal debtor, as provided by Code Civ. Proc. § 544, but includes all damages occasioned by the garnishee's appeal; the action sounding in tort.

2. TORTS (§ 13*)—WRONGFUL APPEAL BY GARNISHEE—"PARTY AGGRIEVED"—"WRONG."

As Code Civ. Proc. § 938, authorizes any party aggrieved by a judgment to appeal, and the "party aggrieved" is one against whom a judgment has been rendered, no action can be maintained against a garnishee who, after the superior court ordered it to turn over funds due the principal debtor, appealed from the judgment, and, upon affirmance, attempted to secure rehearing by the Supreme Court; for the loss to plaintiff by the delay is damnum absque injuria, and is not a wrong within Civ. Code, § 3523, declaring that there is no wrong without a remedy.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank J. Murasky, Judge.

Action by Helen M. Finch against the Western National Bank of San Francisco. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. L. Smith, of San Francisco, for appellant. Gavin McNab, Geo. W. Mordecai, and Nat Schmulowitz, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

HART, J. This is an action by the plaintiff to recover the total sum of $9,533 as damages alleged to have been suffered by her through certain acts of the defendant growing out of its alleged wrongful failure to turn over to her, or to the sheriff for her, a certain sum of money which was on deposit with it in the name of, and as belonging to, one Paul V. Finch, and which had been garnished in the hands of the defendant in an action in which said Helen M. Finch, as the plaintiff, sought to recover, and finally did recover from the said Paul V. Finch, as the defendant therein, a judgment for the sum of $5,500. Judgment passed in favor of the defendant, and this appeal is from said judgment on the judgment roll alone.

It appears that the above-mentioned action by Helen M. Finch against Paul V. Finch was begun in the superior court in and for the city and county of San Francisco on the 14th day of November, 1907. On December 3, 1907, a writ of attachment was duly issued in said action, and the defendant here (the Western National Bank) was garnished, the writ having been served by the sheriff. At the time of the service of the writ of attachment or garnishment on the bank, the latter failed to provide the sheriff with a memorandum or statement of the amount of any money held, or the nature or extent of any debt owed, by it to said Paul V. Finch, and at no time did it furnish that officer with any such memorandum or statement; wherefore the bank was, on the 17th day of December, 1907, cited to appear before the court, to be examined on oath respecting any debt owed by it or any credits or other personal property in its possession or under its control belonging to the said Paul V. Finch. In response to said citation, the bank appeared before the court at the time appointed, and declared and admitted that, at the time of the service of the writ of garnishment, it had in its possession and under its control the sum of $2,000 as a commercial account owned by or due to the said Paul V. Finch.

Helen M. Finch, on the 29th day of April, 1908, recovered a judgment against Paul V. Finch in said action, and thereupon a writ of execution was issued and served upon the bank, but the writ was returned unsatisfied, the answer of the bank thereto being that the money belonging to Paul V. Finch which it had had in its possession and under its control had been paid to the sheriff on the 26th day of December, 1907. Thereafter Helen M. Finch instituted proceedings under the authority of sections 717 and 719 of the Code of Civil Procedure, designated and known as "proceedings supplementary to execution," requiring the bank to appear before the court at a certain specified time and answer concerning the money belonging to Paul V. Finch which was in its possession and under its control at the time of the service of the writ of attachment. In this latter proceeding these facts were developed: That on the 24th day of December, 1907, one E. C. Moyes secured a judgment against said Paul V. Finch for a sum in excess of $2,000. Immediately upon the entry of the judgment in the last-mentioned action, execution issued, and, on the 26th day of December, 1907, the bank was served with said writ. Thereupon the bank paid to the sheriff the sum of $2,000 belonging to Paul V. Finch then in its possession, and the sheriff in his return of the writ acknowledged said payment.

Upon hearing the evidence thus adduced the court made and caused to be entered an order directing the bank to pay to the said Helen M. Finch the sum of $2,000 referred to. From this order the bank appealed, and this court, to which the appeal was transferred for decision, affirmed the order. Finch v. Finch, 12 Cal. App. 274, 107 Pac. 594, 598. Thereafter, and within due time, the bank petitioned the Supreme Court for a hearing of the appeal after decision by this court. The petition was denied; Chief Justice Beatty and Justice Angellotti dissenting from the order denying a hearing of the cause by the Supreme Court.

After the judgment of this court became final in said case of Finch v. Finch, a demand was made upon the bank for the payment of said sum of $2,000 toward the satisfaction of the judgment in favor of the plaintiff in said case, and the bank thereupon paid to said Helen M. Finch, and the latter accepted from the bank, on the 29th day of March, 1910, the said sum of $2,000, in accordance with the order as made by the superior court and affirmed by the appellate court.

Although the record does not disclose all the facts embraced in the foregoing statement, it is conceded by counsel on both sides in their briefs that it contains a faithful narrative of the history of the several transactions finally leading to the controversy involved in the present action.

The complaint in this action alleges that, by reason of the acts of the defendant in failing to pay over said money when ordered to do so by the superior court, and in taking the appeal from said order, and, after judgment against it was rendered by this court, petitioning the Supreme Court for a further hearing of said appeal, she was—

> "put to unnecessary expense, and was obliged to, and did, actually expend, for the purpose of enforcing said order of said superior court, * * * the sum of $1,000, as counsel fee, and for costs and expenses of said proceedings of said defendant, all of which money was necessary for plaintiff to expend in order to enforce said order requiring said bank to pay to plaintiff said sum of money, and that, had it not been for said defendant refusing to pay said order and taking said appeals and other proceedings hereinbefore mentioned, plaintiff would not have been required to have expended said sum of money, and that said plaintiff has been deprived of the use of the said sum of money since the 1st day of May, 1908."

The plaintiff further alleges, on information and belief, that the—

> "defendant's refusal to pay to the sheriff, on said 1st day of May, 1908, said sum of $2,000, and said denial of said defendant's liability to said plaintiff for said sum of money, was not made in good faith, but with full knowledge of defendant's liability, and said appeals and petitions thereafter taken in said cause by said defendant were not taken in good faith, but for the purpose of wrongfully delaying and harassing plaintiff until plaintiff abandoned said proceedings on account of the trouble involved, and the time consumed, and the expense entailed in contesting same, and plaintiff further alleges that plaintiff was, in consequence, put to unnecessary expense and trouble and annoyance in connection with said proceedings in contesting said proceedings as aforesaid."

The foregoing averments, which constitute the gist of the plaintiff's cause of action, were denied by the answer.

The court's findings, given in substance, are as follows: That, by reason of the appeal and other proceedings incidental thereto which the bank took from the order of the superior court requiring it to pay over the sum of $2,000 to Helen M. Finch, as the plaintiff and judgment creditor in the case against Paul V. Finch, she (the plaintiff) was compelled to, and did, in fact, expend the sum of $1,000 as counsel fees, costs, and expenses, and that, by reason of said appeal, etc., she was deprived of the use of the said sum of money from the 1st day of May, 1908, up to the 29th day of March, 1910; that the plaintiff had been—

> "damaged in the sum of $1,000, with interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from the 29th day of April, 1910, the day on which plaintiff was compelled to pay said sum of $1,000 for said counsel fee, costs, and expenses, and in the further sum of 7 per cent. interest on the sum of $2,000, from the 1st day of May, 1908, the date when said money was demanded from said defendant by the sheriff on execution, until the 29th day of April (March?), 1910, the date when plaintiff (defendant?) paid said order."

The court further found that the damages complained of in the complaint as occasioned by the acts of the defendant are governed by section 544 of the Code of Civil Procedure; that the refusal by the bank to pay the sum of $2,000 to the sheriff on the 1st day of May, 1908, and the denial of its liability for said sum was made in good faith; that the appeal to the appellate courts and the petition for a hearing of said appeal after decision of the same by the former court were taken and filed in good faith for the purpose of protecting what the defendant believed in good faith to be its legal rights, and not for the purpose of wrongfully so delaying and harassing plaintiff as to lead the latter, by reason of the trouble involved, the time consumed, and the expense entailed in contesting said proceedings, to abandon the same and cease further to contest them.

From the facts thus found, the court concluded that the plaintiff was not, as a matter of law, entitled to a judgment.

[1] Manifestly the action here is one for the recovery of damages for injury alleged to have been wrongfully inflicted upon the plaintiff by the defendant. It is no different, in principle, from any other action sounding in tort, and if, therefore, by the acts of the defendant, as charged in the complaint, the plaintiff suffered an injury cognizable in law, she would be entitled at least to such actual damages as would justly compensate her for the loss thus sustained. And, in estimating the damage, it would be proper to consider all the elements entering into or constituting the aggregate damage so suffered which may be allowed within the limits of the averments of her complaint or the fairand reasonable and legal import thereof. This would include any actual expense to which she might have necessarily or legitimately been put by reason of the acts of the defendant as charged in the complaint. It follows, then, that the court's finding, which, in truth, is a conclusion of law, that the "said damages complained of in plaintiff's complaint as occasioned by said defendant's acts as aforesaid are governed by the provisions of section 544 of the Code of Civil Procedure, limiting the defendant's liability to the amount of all credits, property, or debts in defendant's hands at the time the notice of garnishment hereinbefore mentioned was served on defendant," is erroneous. That section, referring to the case where any credits or other personal property belonging to the defendant are garnished or attached while in the possession and control of a third party (sections 542a and 543, Code Civ. Proc.), provides:

> "All persons having in their possession, or under their control, any credits or other personal property belonging to the defendant, or owing any debts to the defendant at the time of the service upon them of a copy of the writ and notice, as provided in the last two sections, shall be, unless such property be delivered up or transferred, or such debts be paid to the sheriff, liable to the plaintiff for the amount of such credits, property, or debts, until the attachment be discharged, or any judgment recovered by him be satisfied."

The obvious purpose of said section is to preserve the integrity of the lien of the attachment or garnishment in such cases and thus render efficacious, to the extent of the value of the credits or other personal property attached, any judgment which the plaintiff may secure against the defendant. Clearly, for an obvious reason, the liability of the garnishee as such must, as the Code section directs, and could justly only direct, be measured and limited by the amount of the credits or property or debts which have been subjected to the lien of the garnishment or attachment. And manifestly, if the proceeding here were merely for the enforcement of such liability, as was the case in Finch v. Finch and the Western National Bank, supra, the plaintiff would be entitled to recover from the defendant nothing beyond or in excess of the amount of credits or property or debts upon which the attachment was levied. But, as is plainly true, this action, while growing out of proceedings authorized to be taken (sections 718 and 719, Code Civ. Proc.) for the purpose, among others, of enforcing, where they have been invoked, the provisions of section 544 of said Code, is not based upon said section, nor upon the proceedings inaugurated in the case of Finch v. Finch for its enforcement. The action is, as before stated, founded upon the alleged wrongful act of the defendant in delaying, to the alleged damage of the plaintiff, compliance with the order requiring it to turn over to the sheriff the money belonging to Paul V. Finch in its possession and under its control at the time of the service of the writ of garnishment, and the purpose of the action is not, nor would the effect of a judgment obtained by the plaintiff therein be, to extend the liability of the bank as a garnishee, but to compel it to compensate the plaintiff for the alleged damage suffered by her from the injury which she alleges was thus wrongfully inflicted upon her. Indeed, as an essential part or element of the cause of action attempted to be stated in the complaint, it is therein alleged that the liability of the defendant as a garnishee in Finch v. Finch et al., supra, had been conclusively adjudicated by the courts and discharged by the defendant by the payment by the latter to the sheriff of the money garnished in satisfaction of the execution, before this action was instituted.

But the judgment must nevertheless be affirmed, for a reason to which attention will now be given.

[2] It is frankly confessed that it is difficult to apprehend how an action of this sort may be held to be maintainable under any circumstances. Indeed, we do not think such an action can be maintained. The rule is that any party aggrieved by a judgment may appeal (section 938, Code Civ. Proc.), and "a party aggrieved" is one against whom a judgment has been given. Hayne on New Trial and Appeal (Rev. Ed.) p. 1064. Thus it appears that the defendant, in appealing from the order requiring it to pay over the money in satisfaction of the plaintiff's judgment, merely exercised a right expressly conferred upon it by law. And, of course, the same is true with respect to its effort to secure a hearing of the appeal in the Supreme Court after the judgment by the District Court of Appeal. This right it was entitled to exercise whether there proved to be merit in the appeal or not. Moreover, it had the right to challenge by appeal the propriety of the remedy invoked by the plaintiff for the purpose of obtaining the order from the superior court compelling it to pay the money, as well as to contest the right of the plaintiff to require it in any event to pay over said money in satisfaction of the judgment she had obtained against Paul V. Finch. The loss, then, suffered by the plaintiff as a consequence of the act of the defendant in prosecuting the appeal and thus delaying the payment of the money to which she was entitled (and, undoubtedly, she suffered a wrong thereby) is not a legal wrong or one of which the law will take cognizance. The loss she suffered is, in other words, of that class of losses or wrongs which comes within the doctrine of damnum absque injuria, and no action will lie for it. Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, vol. 8, p. 677. The wholesome maxim of jurisprudence, invoked here by the plaintiff, "There is no wrong without a remedy" (section 3523, Civ. Code), can obviously have no application to any but legal wrongs or those wrongs for which the law authorizes or sanctions redress.

There are some other propositions discussed in the briefs which it is conceived possess no force either in the support of or against the conclusion to which we have here been persuaded.

The judgment is affirmed.

THOMPSON v. JONES et al. (S. F. 6271.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 28, 1914.)

GIFTS (§ 30*)—GIFTS INTER VIVOS—FUNDS IN BANK.

For several years prior to 1908 defendant J. and her husband had lived together in illicit relationship, representing themselves as husband and wife. She during this time had certain funds which she deposited in a bank to the credit of the joint account of both, so that either could check against it and draw out all or any part of the money. Both did check against it, and, both having purchased certain land in controversy, it was paid for by the husband by check drawn by him against such deposit. The parties were thereafter married and later divorced. Held that, when the money was so deposited, a tentative gift was created which remained uncompleted until the husband drew the money from the bank and devoted it to his own purposes, and that, he having so withdrawn the money and purchased the land in their joint names, they became tenants in common, each owning an undivided moiety thereof.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; T. C. Denny, Judge.

Action by A. M. Thompson against Cora M. Jones and another. From an interlocutory decree in favor of plaintiff, defendant Cora M. Jones appeals. Affirmed.

T. J. Butts, of Santa Rosa, for appellant. Phil Ware and A. B. Ware, both of Santa Rosa, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. This action was brought by plaintiff for the partition of certain land situated in the county of Sonoma. The complaint alleged that plaintiff is the owner in fee of an undivided one-half interest in the land and is a tenant in common with the defendants. The answer denied any interest or ownership of the plaintiff in the lands, and by cross-complaint defendant Cora M. Jones asserted ownership in herself of all of the land, and sought a decree so declaring. The court found in favor of the plaintiff upon all the material issues and decreed a partition. From this interlocutory decree defendant Cora M. Jones appeals.

The findings of the court may be thus summarized: For many years prior to the 8th day of October, 1908, Cora M. Jones and B. W. Jones (plaintiff's grantor) had been maintaining an illicit relationship, living together and representing themselves to be husband and wife. Cora M. Jones, prior to the 8th day of October, 1908, owned as her separate property some $6,000, which upon that date she deposited in the Bank of Napa, in the city of Napa, in the name of and to the joint account of B. W. Jones and Cora M. Jones. so that either the said B. W. Jones or the said Cora M. Jones could check against this account and draw out all or any part of the money. It was the declared intent of Cora M. Jones when she made this deposit to allow B. W. Jones to check against it and use it or any part of it as he saw fit. On the 8th day of October, 1908, B. W. Jones and Cora M. Jones purchased the land described in plaintiff's complaint. The land was paid for by check against the funds in the Napa Bank, which check was drawn by B. W. Jones. The deed to the land was taken in the name of B. W. Jones and Cora M. Jones, and by this deed the two became tenants in common of the land, each owning an undivided moiety thereof.

Subsequently, in June, 1909, B. W. Jones and Cora M. Jones intermarried. They continued to live upon the land, which was farming land, until 1911. This relationship ended in a divorce procured by Cora M. Jones. Following this Cora M. Jones brought an action in ejectment against B. W. Jones to recover the land. This action was commenced on the 31st day of May, 1911. Upon June 5th following a lis pendens was filed. Intermediate the commencement of the action and the filing of the lis pendens, B. W. Jones sold his undivided half interest to the plaintiff for the sum of $860, which the court finds was paid.

It will be noted that the findings of the court already outlined declare, in effect, a completed gift inter vivos of one-half of the money which paid for the land, and consequently full and complete title in B. W. Jones of an undivided one-half of the land. Further findings of the court declare an estoppel raised against the claim of Cora M. Jones upon the ground of an "understanding" between Cora M. Jones and B. W. Jones that he owned one-half of the property and his expenditure under this understanding of time, labor, and money in the improvement of the land and the construction of permanent buildings thereon. Another estoppel is found by the court to be raised against the claim of Cora M. Jones "by reason of the illicit and unlawful relationship existing between B. W. Jones and Cora M. Jones."

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

These estoppels are against the contention of the appellant that the money was her separate property, that B. W. Jones was but her agent in the management of it and of her affairs, that it was still her money when the land was bought, that it was her money that paid the full purchase price and that, under well-settled principles, B. W. Jones, when he took title to an undivided one-half in himself, became her trustee. The further contention of the appellant vigorously urged is that plaintiff was not a bona fide purchaser, and that she is therefore entitled to establish her equitable title against him. Finally, certain rulings of the court are complained of, which rulings, it is declared, unduly limited the scope of the cross-examination of the plaintiff in defendant's effort to show the fact that he was not such a bona fide purchaser.

It is manifest, however, that, without regard to estoppels, if the findings of the court to the effect that B. W. Jones became the owner of an undivided one-half of the property by gift be sustained by the evidence, all other findings and rulings, however erroneous, are absolutely noninjurious. Therefore to this primary consideration we directly come.

While, as is to be expected, there is a conflict in the evidence upon this question, the testimony of B. W. Jones fully supports the court's finding. Jones testified that during the years in which he and Mrs. Jones maintained their relationship they "pooled their funds, forming a community fund to be used in the interests of each other. It was understood that whatever money one had was as much the other's. We both checked against the accounts. We were both sustained by the mutual fund." Cora M. Jones knew all about the purchase of the ranch and the taking of title in his name as well as in her own. She always recognized him as half owner, and never made any assertion that his title was held for her in trust. Indeed, she always insisted that half the money in the bank belonged to him.

The situation presented then is this: Cora M. Jones owned the money. It was deposited in the bank with the right to B. W. Jones to check against it and use the funds for his own purposes. So long as the money remained in the bank it was indubitably the money of Cora M. Jones. The tendered gift to B. W. Jones was incomplete, and remained uncompleted until he drew the money and devoted it to his own purposes. This is precisely what he did when he checked against it for the purchase of the land, taking title in his own name, as well as in that of Cora M. Jones. There was no concealment of his act and no attempted repudiation of it by Cora Jones until differences had arisen between the two which culminated in their divorce and in this subsequent litigation.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Chas. Monroe, Judge.

Action by Mary C. Lewis against Henry C. Lewis. From a judgment denying relief, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

A. C. Lawson, of Long Beach, for appellant.

SLOSS, J. The plaintiff appeals from a judgment denying her prayer for divorce. The complaint was based on the ground of desertion. The defendant defaulted, and the court, after hearing plaintiff's proofs, concluded that she had failed to make out a case, and entered judgment accordingly.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

The plaintiff testified that she and the defendant had been married on March 1, 1910. She was then 41 years old. His age was 81. They had been acquainted but a short while. After the marriage, the parties took up their abode at Long Beach, in a house owned by defendant. As a result of litigation then pending, this house was lost by defendant some 4½ months after the marriage. Thereupon the defendant "went away," stating that he was unable to support the plaintiff, and that he would have to go and live with his own people.

A witness on behalf of plaintiff testified that Lewis, the defendant, had told him, before the separation, that he could not support his wife, "and he could not live with the woman if he could not support her." He also said that "he never expected to live with her again; he could not support her." After the separation the defendant told this witness that he would never return to live with plaintiff.

A son of defendant testified that the defendant had told him, prior to his leaving Long Beach, that he "was going away, and that he would not return; could not stay under the circumstances; that he would soon be without means, and would not return."

[1] The court is not authorized to deny a divorce where the evidence of the plaintiff, adequately corroborated, establishes the truth of the allegations of the complaint. Kirkpatrick v. Kirkpatrick, 152 Cal. 316, 92 Pac. 853; Benkert v. Benkert, 32 Cal. 467. A case having been made out, there is no arbitrary power to grant or refuse the relief. But, in every action for divorce, the court is called upon to determine whether the evidence before it does establish the truth of the charge made in the complaint.

[2] As in other cases, every intendment is in favor of the finding made. Such finding is not to be overthrown on appeal, unless it is very plain to the appellate court that the conclusion reached cannot be supported on any rational view of the testimony. In view of the care with which the law has sought to guard against collusive divorce proceedings, the rule just stated should be applied in its full force to a finding in favor of a defaulting defendant in a divorce suit.

[3] Under the evidence here given, we think the court was justified in deciding that a case of willful desertion had not been made out. It is true that plaintiff testified that defendant had gone from her, and that he had made statements indicating that he did not intend to return. The testimony of the corroborating witnesses, too, supported the contention that defendant left without the intention of returning. But it appeared that his departure was induced by his inability to support the plaintiff. The separation was apparently regarded by the defendant as necessary under the circumstances. At his age, it was, in all likelihood, impossible for him to earn a living for himself, much less for his wife. This being so, he was compelled to look to his relatives, or, perhaps, to his wife, for support. It is by no means an unreasonable inference from the testimony, particularly that of the plaintiff, that she recognized the necessities of the situation, and that she acquiesced in her husband's belief that the only way was for him to take up his abode with "his own people." In other words, the evidence justified the conclusion that the separation was with the plaintiff's consent, and consequently did not constitute a desertion. Civ. Code, § 99.

[4] Consent to a separation may be implied "from acquiescence * * * or from other circumstances which show the plaintiff's consent or that the separation was not against her will. The consent need not be express. It may be tacit, as where the plaintiff is willing and has made no objection." Nelson on Div. & Sep. § 67; McMullin v. McMullin, 140 Cal. 112, 73 Pac. 808.

The judgment is affirmed.

ROBINETT v. BROWN. (S. F. 6376.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 26, 1914.)

1. MECHANICS' LIENS (§ 157*)—CLAIM OF LIEN — AMOUNT DUE — UNTRUE STATEMENT — EFFECT.

Where a mechanic's lien statement alleged that the reasonable value of the labor and material for which a lien was sought to be established was $97.50, but the court found that the work was done and the material furnished under a contract providing for payment of $60 only, the lien was lost for claimant's failure to truly state the terms and conditions of the contract under which the work was done and materials furnished.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mechanics' Liens, Cent. Dig. §§ 268–274; Dec. Dig. § 157.*]

2. MECHANICS' LIENS (§ 303*)—JURISDICTION —AMOUNT IN CONTROVERSY.

Since an action to enforce a mechanic's lien is equitable in character, jurisdiction to foreclose does not depend on the amount secured by the lien, where suit was brought for such relief, the fact that the claim was for less than $300, and that the superior court found that the lien was void, did not deprive it of jurisdiction to render a personal judgment for the proper amount of claimant's debt.

3. COSTS (§ 42*)—TENDER.

Where, in a suit to foreclose a mechanic's lien, the court found that claimant was not entitled to a lien, and defendant filed an offer to permit judgment for the amount to which claimant was entitled, the latter was not entitled to costs.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; W. M. Conley, Judge.

Suit by Thomas Robinett against William Brown. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed, with directions.

W. C. Cavitt, of San Francisco, for appellant. J. S. Reid, of San Francisco, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. This action was commenced to foreclose a mechanic's lien in the sum of $97.50 on property belonging to the defendant. The lien claim and the complaint both charged upon an oral contract to pay the reasonable market value of the work done and materials furnished, and alleged that this reasonable value was the sum of $97.50. The answer asserted a specific agreement on the part of the plaintiff to furnish the material and do the work in question for the sum of $60, and pleaded an offer in writing to allow judgment to be taken in that sum. Code Civ. Proc. § 997.

[1, 2] The court found the reasonable value of the labor and material to be $97.50, but further found that the work was done and the material furnished under the contract pleaded by the answer. It also and necessarily found that the claim of lien did not contain a true statement of the terms and conditions of the contract for which reason the right to a lien was lost. Wilson v. Nugent, 125 Cal. 280, 57 Pac. 1008; Buell v. Brown, 131 Cal. 158, 63 Pac. 167. It found in favor of the defendant upon the allegation of his written offer to permit judgment to be taken for the sum of $60, and finally found that plaintiff was entitled to a judgment for that amount only. The court concluded, however, that because the lien was lost the action became a simple action at law to recover a sum of money less than $300; that it had no jurisdiction over such action, and refused to render any other judgment than that declaring its lack of jurisdiction. In this the court erred. The action to enforce a mechanic's lien is equitable, and jurisdiction to foreclose the lien does not depend upon the amount of money secured by the lien; nor, when that amount is less than $300, does the court lose jurisdiction by reason of any fatal defect which destroyes the lien and prevents its foreclosure. It becomes the duty and the right of the court to retain the action and render a personal judgment in a proper amount even if that amount be less than $300. Mannix v. Tryon, 152 Cal. 35, 91 Pac. 983; Becker v. Superior Court, 151 Cal. 313, 90 Pac. 689.

[3] It follows herefrom that the court should have given judgment for plaintiff in the amount to which he was justly entitled. That amount as fixed by the findings of the court was $60, but as defendant had made proper tender of this amount under section 997 of the Code of Civil Procedure plaintiff in recovering this judgment was not entitled to his costs of action.

It further necessarily follows that the judgment of the trial court should be and is hereby reversed, with directions to the court to enter upon the findings actually made judgment in favor of plaintiff, without costs. Appellant, however, will, as matter of course, be entitled to costs upon this appeal.

We concur: MELVIN, J.; LORIGAN, J.

In re PRAGER'S ESTATE. (L. A. 3502.)

COSTS (§ 233*) — AFFIRMANCE ON APPEAL — STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

Supreme Court rule 23 (119 Pac. xiii) requires the clerk to insert in the remittitur, where the judgment is reversed or modified, a judgment that the appellant recover the costs on appeal. At the time of the adoption of the rule, Code Civ. Proc. § 1027, provided that when a new trial was ordered or the judgment was modified the costs of appeal were in the discretion of the court, but there was no statutory definition of the items properly chargeable as costs. Under the rules and practice of the court, only the expenses of printing the transcript in both courts were chargeable as costs; none of these expenses being such as would be incurred by appellee. In 1913 (St. 1913, p. 1033) Code Civ. Proc. § 1027, was amended so as to provide that the prevailing party on appeal should be entitled to costs, and might recover all amounts actually paid in connection with the appeal in the preparation of the record, including the costs of printing briefs. Held, that the failure to amend rule 23 so as to conform to the new Code section could not deprive an appellee of the costs to which she was entitled, and the remittitur on affirmance should include a judgment for the costs of appeal in favor of the prevailing party.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Costs, Cent. Dig. §§ 884–891, 929; Dec. Dig. § 233.*]

In Bank. Motion by Mary J. Prager to recall and correct, by the insertion of judgment for costs, the remittitur rendered upon the appeal of Fannie Prager Cohn (137 Pac. 37). Motion granted.

Trask, Norton & Brown, of Los Angeles, for appellant. O'Melveny, Stevens & Millikin and Oscar Lawler, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Upon an appeal by one of the devisees under the will of Charles Prager, deceased, from the decree of settlement of final account and of distribution, the decree was affirmed by this court. Estate of Prager, 137 Pac. 37. The opinion was filed December 3, 1913, and became final at the expiration of 30 days from that date. Thereupon the clerk of this court issued to the court below a remittitur. This document did not include any judgment in favor of respondent for her costs on the appeal. She now moves for the recall of the remittitur and for its correction by the insertion therein of a judgment for such costs.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

The action of the clerk was in accord with the rules of this court. Rule 23 (119 Pac. xiii) reads as follows:

> "In civil cases the clerk shall not be required to remit the final papers until the costs are paid. In all cases in which the judgment or order appealed from is reversed or modified, and the order of reversal or modification contains no directions as to the costs of appeal, the clerk will enter upon the record, and insert in the remittitur, a judgment that the appellant recover the costs of appeal."

The rule, it will be observed, directs the incorporation of a judgment for costs only where this court has modified or reversed the judgment or order appealed from. The clerk is not directed to include judgment for costs where the appeal has resulted in an affirmance.

The latest revision of our rules became effective on March 18, 1912. At that time section 1027 of the Code of Civil Procedure read as follows:

> "In the following cases the costs of appeal is (are) in the discretion of the court:
> "1. When a new trial is ordered;
> "2. When a judgment is modified."

There was then no statutory definition of items properly chargeable as costs of appeal. Rule 13 (119 Pac. xii) of this court provided, as it does now, that the expense of printing transcripts or other papers constituting the record and required to be printed should be allowed as costs. The clerk of the court was, and is, required by section 752 of the Political Code to collect a fee for filing the transcript in a civil case, this fee being in full for all services rendered up to the rendering of the judgment or the issuing of the remittitur, when no petition for rehearing has been filed. There was, when the rules of this court were last revised, no provision of rule or statute authorizing the taxing as costs of the expense of printing briefs, and no fee was imposed for filing briefs. The settled practice was that the expense of printing briefs was not chargeable as costs. The taxable costs above enumerated, viz., the expense of printing transcript, and the fee for filing the transcript (as well as the fee of the clerk below for certifying the transcript, provided for in rule 11 [119 Pac. xii]), were all incurred in the first instance by the appellant. The respondent had not been put to any expense chargeable as costs, and for this reason there was no occasion to provide by rule for a judgment allowing costs on appeal to a respondent in case of affirmance.

But, in 1913 (St. 1913, p. 1033) section 1027 of the Code of Civil Procedure was amended, so as to read as follows:

> "The prevailing party on appeal shall be entitled to his costs excepting when judgment is modified, and in that event the matter of costs is within the discretion of the appellate court. The party entitled to costs, or to whom costs are awarded, may recover all amounts actually paid out by him in connection with said appeal and the preparation of the record for the appeal, including the costs of printing briefs; provided, however, that no amount shall be allowed as costs of printing briefs in excess of fifty dollars to any one party. The appellate court may reduce costs in case of the insertion of unnecessary matter in the record."

Since this enactment has been in force, the prevailing party has an absolute right to his costs, except in case of modification of the judgment, whereas, under the former section, the court had discretion to grant or deny costs where a new trial was ordered, as well as to where the judgment was modified. The respondent whose judgment had been affirmed would probably always have been entitled to costs, if any expense chargeable as costs had been incurred. Be that as it may, this right is now beyond question. Furthermore, the amendment allows the prevailing party to recover as costs "all amounts actually paid out by him in connection with the appeal." We shall not attempt, at this time, a definition of the items covered by this comprehensive language. Certain it is that, by the terms of the statute, the expense of printing briefs is included in the category of taxable costs. This expense, at least, within the limit fixed by the code section, a prevailing respondent has the right to recover. Rule 23 is therefore not in complete accord with the present state of the law. The omission to provide by rule for a judgment, to which the prevailing party is entitled under the statute, cannot, of course, take away his right. Rule 23 should be revised to meet the changed conditions presented by the code amendment. Until it is so revised, remittiturs on affirmance, as on reversal, should include a judgment for costs of appeal in favor of the prevailing party.

It is ordered that the remittitur heretofore issued be recalled, and that the clerk issue a new remittitur, inserting therein a judgment that the respondent recover her costs of appeal.

BEATTY, C. J., does not participate in the foregoing.

BELDEN v. UNION CENTRAL LIFE INS. CO. (S. F. 5941.)

1. INSURANCE (§ 376*)—GENERAL AGENT—FORFEITURES—AUTHORITY TO WAIVE.

The fact that the general agent of an insurance company has general authority to waive forfeitures did not prevent the insurance company from inserting in the policy an express limitation that such agent should have no such authority.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. §§ 952–955; Dec. Dig. § 376.*]

2. INSURANCE (§ 668*)—GENERAL AGENT—FORFEITURES—AUTHORITY TO WAIVE.

Where an insurance contract provided that none of its terms could be modified, nor any forfeiture under it waived, save by an agreement in writing signed by the president, vice president, secretary, or assistant secretary of the company, whose authority for that purpose should not be delegated, whether a general agent of the insurer had authority by virtue of his office to waive a forfeiture was for the jury, and hence an instruction that such general agent had authority to waive forfeitures and to accept money for premiums overdue was erroneous.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by Helen Belden against the Union Central Life Insurance Company. From a judgment for plaintiff and from an order denying defendant's motion for a nonsuit, it appeals. Reversed.

W. S. Andrews and Pringle & Pringle, all of San Francisco, for appellant. A. M. Kidd, Frohman & Jacobs, Titus, Creed & Dall, and A. H. Brandt, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal by the defendant, a life insurance company, from a judgment against it and from the order denying its motion for a nonsuit. The plaintiff is the widow of Roy K. Belden, deceased. When his death occurred, there were five purported policies of insurance on his life, all issued by the defendant corporation. Two of these were paid, but the company denied liability upon the other three, being the one here in suit payable to his widow and two others upon which Georgeana Belden, Roy K. Belden's mother, is the claimant. The policy upon which Mrs. Helen Belden relies is numbered 312609 and is for the sum of $2,000; the other two upon which Mrs. Georgeana Belden sued are numbered 289416 and 312608, the former being a five-year term policy for $1,000 and the latter an ordinary life policy for $2,000. The two policies last mentioned are involved in a separate action, but the facts of the two cases are essentially the same.

Policy 312609 is of the type known as an "ordinary life" policy. It was issued November 30, 1905, and the annual premium payable November 30th of each year was $47.96. The first year's premium was paid on delivery of the policy, and, when the second year's premium became due, it was paid by a note dated November 30, 1906, and was renewed several times, but on December 26, 1907, it was returned to the company's principal office at Cincinnati as unpaid.

The insured, Roy K. Belden, resided in Germany and his brother Dan F. Belden held his power of attorney. On February 3, 1908, the latter called at the office of R. L. Stephenson in San Francisco for the purpose of paying all of the premiums due on the policies of his brother. At that time the premiums on all of the three policies mentioned above were past due. It is not disputed that Mr. Dan Belden offered to pay all that was due on the five policies, and that after the amounts were figured the aggregate was found by Mr. Stephenson to be $156.80, due on four of the policies, the premium on the fifth having been paid, so that it was kept in force until a later period in 1908. There is a conflict of testimony with reference to the conversation between Mr. Stephenson, Mr. Belden, and Mr. Maclay (the bookkeeper and cashier) at that time. Mr. Belden testified that he was asked about the condition of his brother's health, and that he truthfully answered that, so far as he knew, it was good. It appeared in evidence that his brother had been ill for many months and the insured died five days after the payment was made. Mr. Stephenson testified that he informed Mr. Dan Belden that a certificate of health would have to be filed before the reinstatement of at least one policy, and perhaps two besides, as he knew that one policy had lapsed and believed that to be the case with two others. This part of the conversation was denied by Mr. Belden, who said that no definite statement was made about any of the policies lapsing except that he was told that possibly a health certificate would be required for one of them—not the one in suit in this action. Of course the jurors were at liberty to accept either version of the conversation. We mention this conflict in view of one of the instructions which will be discussed later.

On February 4, 1908, Mr. Maclay for Mr. Stephenson wrote to the secretary of the defendant corporation a letter containing the following language:

> "I wish you would kindly look up policies Nos. 278278, 289416, 312608–9, Roy K. Belden, and inform us as to the standing of these policies. We have accepted settlement on account of the renewals and premiums due for the year 1907, together with interest due."

It was stipulated that this letter reached its destination on February 10th, and that if certain officers of the defendant were present at the trial they would testify that the letter was turned over to a clerk and never brought to the attention of the president, vice president, or secretary until February 17, 1908, when a letter from Mr. Stephenson announcing Dr. Roy K. Belden's death was received. On February 18th the home office telegraphed Stephenson that only two of the Belden policies were in force and that the others were canceled. He was instructed in the telegram to return immediately any payments made on canceled policies. This he promptly attempted to do, but Mr. Dan Belden refused to accept the return of the money.

An examination of the policy shows that upon it was a notice to the policy holder as follows:

> "All payments due on this policy for premium or notes or interest upon notes given to the company, are payable at the office of the company, in the city of Cincinnati, or to the authorized agent of the company, on the production of the premium receipt (signed by the president, vice president, secretary, or assistant secretary) or the note given in payment of premium.

"The contract of insurance between the parties hereto is completely set forth in this policy and the application for the same, and none of its terms can be modified, nor any forfeiture under it waived, save by an agreement in writing signed by the president, vice president, secretary, or assistant secretary of the company, whose authority for this purpose shall not be delegated."

There was a provision in the policy that failure to pay any of the premiums due during the first three years would avoid and nullify the policy "without action on the part of the company or notice to the insured or beneficiary." There was also a statement in the contract that notes given for premiums with their conditions were made a part of the agreement.

Appellant directs our attention to the following instruction, the giving of which is assigned as error:

"The evidence shows that Robert L. Stephenson was general agent for defendant in February, 1908. As such general agent he had the right to waive forfeitures and to accept money for premiums even if overdue."

[1] This instruction took from the jury the right to determine whether or not, from the facts presented, the assured and the insurance company were bound by the terms of the policy irrespective of the acts of the general agent. The question for us to determine according to appellant is this: Can a general agent of a life insurance company waive forfeitures in the face of a prohibition in the policy itself of which the assured has knowledge? It is argued that the quoted instruction did not amount to a statement that Stephenson did in fact waive forfeiture, but that as general agent he had authority to do so; the jury being left to determine whether or not his acts constituted such waiver. If we put this interpretation upon the instruction, the question of law arises: Did the status of "general agent" give Stephenson the right to waive forfeitures in spite of the inhibition expressed in the policy? It is admitted by appellant that waiving forfeitures and reinstating lapsed policies is within the apparent scope of a general agent's powers. But, say appellant, that does not prevent a company from placing a limitation upon the general agent's authority if third persons are informed of the restriction. We believe this to be the true rule. The powers of a general agent are admittedly very great.

"It may be laid down as a general rule that an agent with general authority, i. e., an agent who is authorized to take risks and enter into contracts of insurance without consulting the company, may waive any of the conditions contained in the policy, and his knowledge of facts material to the risk is the knowledge of the company." 16 A. & E. Enc. of Law (2d Ed.) p. 942.

"The extent of the agent's power to waive conditions and forfeitures is, of course, dependent on the extent of his authority to act for the insurer. If he is a general agent, his power to waive conditions and forfeitures is, according to the weight of authority, coextensive with that of the insurance company itself." Cooley's Briefs on the Law of Insurance, p. 2478.

But these general rules do not prevent a company from limiting the powers of any agent, no matter what his rank or designation. It was said in the opinion in Iverson v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., 151 Cal. 750, 91 Pac. 611, 13 L. R. A. (N. S.) 866:

"An insurance company can, like any other principal, prescribe limitations upon the power and authority of agents, and persons dealing with such agents with knowledge of the limitations upon their authority are bound by the restrictions imposed."

In Fidelity & Casualty Co. of New York v. Fresno Flume & Irrigation Co., 161 Cal. 468, 119 Pac. 646, 37 L. R. A. (N. S.) 322, this court adopted the opinion written by Mr. Justice Hall. In that opinion the law was clearly and unequivocally stated to the effect that an insurance corporation may, by its policies, limit the powers of its agents. At page 471 of 161 Cal., page 647 of 119 Pac., the following language is found:

"The policies delivered to and accepted by respondent were signed by the president and secretary of plaintiff, and countersigned by its general agent Bosworth. No evidence of the authority of Bosworth was given other than that he was the general agent of the plaintiff, and none was given as to the authority of Shepherd other than that he was the local agent at Fresno, and by the terms of his employment had no authority to change a policy in any way. It may be conceded that this was sufficient to clothe the agents with ostensible authority coextensive with the business intrusted to them, in the absence of any notice of a limitation thereon. But the policies accepted and retained by defendant contained the provision that 'no condition or provision of this policy shall be varied or altered by any one unless by written consent of the president or secretary of the company.' This was a limitation upon the authority of agents of which defendant had notice. That such provisions in policies are valid has frequently been decided. The matter is discussed at great length in Northern Assurance Co. v. Grand View Building Association, 183 U. S. 308, 22 Sup. Ct. 133, 46 L. Ed. 213, and it was there held (syllabus) that 'it is competent and reasonable for insurance companies to make it matter of condition in their policies that their agents shall not be deemed to have authority to alter or contradict the express terms of the policies as executed and delivered.'"

There is no peculiar magic in the title "general agent" which prevents an employer of such an agent from limiting his authority. Without such limitation his powers are great and ordinarily will support any of his acts or contracts which might have been done or executed by his principal. Mr. Justice Temple, in delivering the opinion of this court in Westerfeld v. New York Life Ins. Co., 129 Cal. 78, 61 Pac. 670, said:

"It is also said that whether a particular agent has power to waive conditions is a question of fact. Plaintiffs offered no evidence as to the authority of Hawes except the policy, which expressly denied to him the authority to modify the contract. The burden was upon plaintiffs. The title 'general manager,' for a specified territory, does not establish the particular authority required, especially, after this express limitation, which was known to the insured."

Commenting upon the position taken in some of the authorities that "notice to the agent is notice to the company," he said:

> "If this means that the company is bound unless it promptly gives notice that it is not satisfied, and in time to enable the insured to make his proof, it is clearly right and in accord with rules applicable alike to other transactions; but I see nothing in these decisions applicable to this case. Knowledge of the agent is not knowledge of the principal in matters not within the scope of the agent's authority. I see nothing unfair in such a limitation upon the authority of an agent as to matters involved here. To make such modifications of the contract is not usually expected of an agent, and the power to do so is not implied in what may be called his usual ostensible authority."

The clause of section 616, Political Code, declaring that the process agent shall also be "deemed in law a general agent," does not prevent the company from inserting in the policy stipulations that such agent shall have no power to waive forfeitures or alter the terms of the policy after it is issued. It was not intended to forbid such stipulations. The assured has notice of them, and therefore they bind him. The question whether such agent may afterwards do things which create an estoppel against the company, or which have the effect of a new contract of insurance, does not arise here and it is not considered.

The latest decision of this court called to our attention is Sharman v. Continental Ins. Co., 138 Pac. 711, where the following language was used:

> "An insurance company, like any other principal acting through agents, may limit their powers, and this was done by defendant by clear and plain terms in the policy here in question. When plaintiff accepted it, it became the contract between him and the company, and he was charged with knowledge of its terms, among others the limitations upon the power of the agent of the company. Westerfield v. N. Y. Life Ins. Co., 129 Cal. 68, 58 Pac. 92, 61 Pac. 667; Cayford v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., 5 Cal. App. 715, 91 Pac. 266; Blunt v. Fidelity & Casualty Co., 145 Cal. 268, 78 Pac. 729, 67 L. R. A. 793, 104 Am. St. Rep. 34. Provisions in policies limiting the authority of agents to bind the company by waiver of conditions therein have been the frequent subject of consideration by the courts. It is held with practical unanimity that, notwithstanding such limitations upon the authority of these agents, conditions in policies may be waived by some agents of the company, and under some circumstances will be deemed to have been waived notwithstanding the method provided for in the policy has not been pursued. But the authority of an agent to effect the waiver in the face of such a limitation as here is not vested in every agent who may represent the company. Unless such authority be given to some particular agent to do so, then, as a general rule, it is only agents of the company who are empowered to issue and deliver policies who may be regarded as having the power to waive conditions and forfeitures. They are the general agents of the company, and vested with full authority to consummate the contract of insurance, and are deemed, as such representatives, to have the same power to waive conditions as the companies themselves. As to the character of agents authorized to waive such conditions, it is said, in 3 Cooley's Briefs on Insurance, p. 2480: 'This rule includes all persons empowered to conclude contracts of insurance without first referring the negotiations to their principals, such as those which have "full power to effect such contracts of insurance, to fix rates of premiums, to consent to changes, to make endorsements, and to cancel policies." ' It may also include those declared by statute of a state to be general agents."

[2] The last sentence of the quoted language must, of course, be read in connection with the rest of the text and is applicable to the case of a general agent whose powers are not limited by the contract of insurance itself. Reason and the weight of decision both support the doctrine that an insurance company may, in its contract with the assured, limit the authority of any agent, and whether a general agent's powers have been so limited or not, or whether they have been waived by the conduct of the principal or not, are questions of fact, and the mere proof without contradiction that one has been made a "general agent" under the provisions of section 616 of the Political Code does not make it a question of law. The assailed instruction was therefore erroneous and the giving of it constituted material error for which the judgment must be reversed.

The other assignments of error are based upon the alleged insufficiency of evidence to support certain findings. As the evidence which may be adduced at the next trial, if there shall be one, may be quite different from that presented at the first one, we need not pass upon these other questions.

The judgment is reversed.

BELDEN v. UNION CENTRAL LIFE INS. CO. (S. F. 5942.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 27, 1914. Rehearing Denied June 26, 1914.)

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by Georgeana B. Belden against the Union Central Life Insurance Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

W. S. Andrews and Pringle & Pringle, all of San Francisco, for appellant. A. M. Kidd, Frohman & Jacobs, Titus, Creed & Dall, and A. H. Brandt, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The error discussed in the opinion in Helen Belden v. Union Central Life Insurance Co. (S. F. No. 5941) 141 Pac. 370, was repeated in the instruction given at the trial of this case, and upon the authority of that case the judgment is reversed.

COHEN v. MELROSE, Justice of the Peace.

1. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 194*)—CERTIORARI—EXISTENCE OF OTHER REMEDY.

Where certiorari to annul a judgment and subsequent orders of a justice of the peace has been instituted in the superior court, the Supreme Court will not entertain an original petition in certiorari for the same relief, for petitioner may prosecute the proceeding in the superior court, and, under Const. art. 6, § 4, appeal to the District Court of Appeal from an adverse judgment, or, in event of an adverse judgment of the superior court already rendered, he may appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Justices of the Peace, Cent. Dig. §§ 774, 775; Dec. Dig. § 194.*]

2. MANDAMUS (§ 31*)—COMPELLING INFERIOR COURT TO TAKE JURISDICTION.

Where the superior court refuses to take any action in a matter pending therein within its jurisdiction, it may be compelled to act therein.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mandamus, Cent. Dig. §§ 74, 75; Dec. Dig. § 31.*]

In Bank. Application for certiorari by W. G. Cohen against George C. Melrose, Justice of the Peace of Burbank Township, County of Los Angeles, to direct the justice to annul a judgment and orders subsequent thereto. Dismissed without prejudice.

James H. Creely, of Oakland, for petitioner. Earl E. Sidebottom, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is a proceeding in certiorari instituted in this court for the purpose of obtaining an annulment of a judgment and certain orders subsequent to judgment, given and made by the respondent, George C. Melrose, as justice of the peace of Burbank township, in the county of Los Angeles, on the ground that the same were in excess of the jurisdiction of said justice.

[1] The writ was issued by this court without notice to the respondent. When the matter came on for hearing in this court upon the return made by the justice of the peace, it was made to appear by a demurrer to the petition filed by the respondent that the writ should not have issued. The petition for a writ shows upon its face that a proceeding in certiorari to obtain a review and an annulment of the same judgment and orders was instituted by this petitioner against this respondent in the superior court of Los Angeles county on the 2d day of March, 1914, by the filing of a verified petition therein, setting up the same facts that are alleged in the petition subsequently filed in this court. It was alleged that "the presiding justice of the said superior court refused and still refuses to issue said writ." It is not expressly made to appear whether or not any judgment has been formally entered in said proceeding in the superior court.

By the filing of said petition in the superior court of Los Angeles county, the proceeding for a review of the judgment and orders of the justice of the peace was duly instituted. If the final judgment has not been entered therein, and the superior court refuses to take any action whatever in the matter, it still remains that the proceeding is now pending in the superior court of Los Angeles county, and the petitioner herein may prosecute the proceeding to final judgment therein, with a right of appeal, in the event of a judgment against him, to the District Court of Appeal for the second appellate district. Const. art. 6, § 4. In the event that a judgment or order of dismissal has been entered, the plaintiff has the right of appeal therefrom to said District Court of Appeal. In either event, this court should not entertain an original application in the matter.

[2] To the suggestion made that the superior court refuses to take any action whatever in the matter pending therein, the obvious answer is that the superior court could be compelled by appropriate proceeding to act therein.

This proceeding is dismissed without prejudice to any of petitioner's rights in the proceeding pending in the superior court of Los Angeles county.

It is seldom that we find an appeal so utterly destitute of merit as the one before us.

[1] The claim that the evidence is legally insufficient to support the verdict is entirely without foundation. While it is true that no living person saw the actual killing of deceased other than the perpetrator of the homicide, and that the evidence was entirely circumstantial, it is idle to assert that there was not enough in the evidence to warrant the conclusion beyond all reasonable doubt on the part of the jurors that the defendant was guilty as charged.

Mrs. Larson was found unconscious and dying in the hills above Casa Verdugo, a short distance from Glendale, on the afternoon of June 22, 1913, by a man and a woman who were taking a walk, and who were attracted by groans to the place where the body was; it having been moved aside and out of sight from the pathway. She died very shortly thereafter. She had been repeatedly struck on the head and skull by some instrument or instruments, and her death was due to concussion of the brain caused by the blows. The body was removed by the authorities to Los Angeles and was identified some days thereafter as the body of defendant's wife. The deadly wound was one that might have been caused by such a weapon as any one of certain empty beer bottles that were found at the place.

[2] Mrs. Larson had left her home in Los Angeles about 11:45 a. m. on that day, apparently dressed only for an afternoon's outing, and without any bag or baggage of any kind. She had an appointment with her husband at the corner of Sixth and Main streets, a point from which passage on a Glendale car could be taken, for about 12:10 p. m. Agreeably to the appointment, defendant and his wife met at that time and place. Defendant claims that they separated there at 12:20 p. m., she stating that she was going to San Francisco, in accord with her intention expressed to him the preceding night, and that he never saw her again until he saw her dead body in an undertaking establishment. Opposed to this theory is a mass of evidence amply sufficient to warrant the jury in concluding that he accompanied his wife from Sixth and Main streets, on a Glendale car, to a point a short distance from Glendale, where they alighted, and that he went with her to the place where her body was found, and there brutally killed and left her. That she herself almost immediately after meeting her husband must have gone from that point to the place where she was killed is clear. There was the testimony of the conductor of the Glendale car leaving the Main street depot at 1 p. m. that day that a man resembling defendant was a passenger on the car, accompanied by a woman, and that they alighted at a point near Glendale. There was the testimony of the man and woman who found the body, that just before finding it they met a man coming down the pathway, the man identifying the defendant as the person, and the woman testifying that, in her opinion, the defendant was the man. A watch was found among defendant's possessions when he was arrested, and the testimony was quite convincing to the effect that it was the watch worn by Mrs. Larson when she left her home on the day of the homicide. Defendant gave an account that was far from satisfactory as to his whereabouts during the afternoon of June 22d, up to about 6 p. m., when he met a young woman to whom he was paying some attention. The testimony of the 17 year old daughter of the parties was to the effect that she heard defendant and deceased plan a proposed outing on the evening or night of June 21st for the next day; that she helped her mother dress for the occasion; and that she (Mrs. Larson) left her home prepared only for such an outing, with only some $15 in money and no baggage or clothing for a journey to San Francisco. Defendant gave inconsistent statements as to where he left his wife on June 22d. Defendant and his wife had had considerable trouble, and within the few weeks immediately preceding the killing had quarreled several times. There were other circumstances in support of the verdict which it is not necessary here to detail. Enough has been set forth to show that there was sufficient evidence to sustain the verdict, if the same was believed by the jury to be true. Of course, all questions as to the credit to be given to any witness are exclusively for the jury and the trial court; but from a careful examination of the record we see no reason to doubt the correctness of the verdict.

There is no force in the claim of prejudicial misconduct on the part of the district attorney.

No other point is made for reversal. We have read the record carefully, and are constrained to say that it is apparent that defendant's rights were at all stages of the trial carefully protected by his counsel, and that the record is absolutely free from anything in the way of substantial error.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

BRIDGE et al. v. CONNECTICUT MUT. LIFE INS. CO. et al. (S. F. 6188.)

1. INSURANCE (§ 624*)—ASSIGNMENT OF LIFE POLICY—RIGHTS OF PARTIES.

One to whom a life policy is assigned as security, having the legal title, can collect its full amount when due; the assignor having merely a claim for the surplus after satisfaction of the secured debt.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. §§ 1557–1570; Dec. Dig. § 624.*]

2. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 167*)—PLEDGE —BAR OF DEBT.

One to whom a life policy is assigned as security may continue to hold it, though action on the debt secured is barred by limitations; and this though the secured debt is that of another than the assignor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Cent. Dig. §§ 651–653; Dec. Dig. § 167.*]

3. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 167*)—PLEDGE —BAR OF DEBT—SUBSTITUTION FOR PLEDGED PROPERTY.

Within the rule that the assignee of a life policy as security for a debt may continue to hold it though action on the debt secured is barred by limitations, the assignee having commenced action on the policy against the insurance company and the assignor, and the company having paid the money on the receipt of the other parties, and it having been deposited to await determination of their rights, it takes the place of the policy, and for the purposes of the action is to be deemed to be in plaintiff's possession.

4. INSURANCE (§ 210*)—ASSIGNMENT OF POLICY AS SECURITY—CONSIDERATION.

Settlement and satisfaction of the account between T. and B. and of the right of action of B. against T. for money due is sufficient consideration not only for the execution of the note of T. to B., but for the contemporaneous assignment to B. by a third person of a life policy as security for payment of the note.

5. BILLS AND NOTES (§ 430*)—PAYMENT—RENEWAL NOTES.

The giving and acceptance of a renewal note is not a payment of the original note, unless it is so expressly agreed, though the original note is surrendered; and the presumption is against such agreement.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bills and Notes, Cent. Dig. §§ 1251–1256; Dec. Dig. § 430.*]

6. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 95*)—RECOVERY OF PLEDGE.

Though M., who assigned a life policy to B. as security for payment of the note of T. to B., was a mere surety, so that a definite extension of the time of payment, without M.'s consent, released her assigned property, yet her right to recover it was barred by limitations, B. having continued to hold it under claim of right, with no claim on her part, for the statutory period, after the accrual of her cause of action; and this though she did not know of the extension, there having been no fraudulent concealment thereof.

7. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 92*) — VESTED RIGHTS—DECISIONS OF COURT.

A decision, made only after property was pledged, that a pledgor could as soon as the debt was barred by limitations retake pledged property without paying the debt, could not be a part of such contract of pledge, even if that would have been the effect of such a decision had it been made before the pledge, so that application to the case of such pledge of the contrary doctrine, announced by a later decision, does not deprive the pledgor of vested rights.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by Carrie E. Bridge and her husband against the Connecticut Mutual Life Insurance Company and others. From a judgment for plaintiffs, and from an order denying a motion for new trial, defendant Alice A. Taylor appeals. Affirmed.

Franklin P. Bull, of San Francisco, for appellant. Thomas E. Haven and Haven & Athearn, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. In the year 1878 the Connecticut Mutual Life Insurance Company issued to one Charles L. Taylor a policy of life insurance, whereby it agreed to pay his wife, defendant Alice A. Taylor, the sum of $3,000, and accruing profits, upon his death, provided that he and his beneficiary complied with all the terms and conditions of said policy. On January 6, 1895, in settlement of an indebtedness of $2,501 then existing on the part of Mr. Taylor in favor of plaintiff Carrie E. Bridge and found to be due her upon a statement of an account, Mr. Taylor made, executed, and delivered to Mr. Bridge for Mrs. Bridge his promissory note, payable to the order of Mrs. Bridge, for $2,501, with interest thereon at the rate of 1½ per cent. per month from date until paid. As security for the payment of said promissory note and as part of the settlement, the same being executed and delivered contemporaneously with the note, Mr. and Mrs. Taylor and their son, Charles L. Taylor, Jr., executed and delivered to Henry S. Bridge, who was at all times acting as the agent of his wife in the matter, an assignment in writing of said insurance policy; the same purporting to be an absolute transfer of the policy. This assignment was consented to by the insurance company, and was never altered or revoked. On December 8, 1898, a new note was given by Mr. Taylor to Mrs. Bridge, payable one day after date, for $4,806.30, with interest at the same rate, being the amount of principal and accrued interest on the indebtedness evidenced by the first note, none of which had been paid, and the first note was delivered to Mr. Taylor. On October 18, 1902, a new note was given by Mr. Taylor to Mr. Bridge for $7,000, with interest at 6 per cent. per annum, being the principal and accrued interest due on the second note, none of which had been paid. No part of the principal or interest on the indebtedness evidenced by the original note has ever been paid, unless the same was extinguished by the so-called renewal notes. Said original promissory note was never changed in any respect, except by the renewal thereof as hereinbefore set forth. Mrs. Taylor took no part in either of said renewals, had no knowledge thereof, and never consented thereto. Mr. Taylor died on April 14, 1908. There was then due upon the insurance policy the sum of $3,027.39, an amount very much less than the amount due from him to Mrs. Bridge on account of such indebtedness. The insurance company having refused to pay to Mrs. Bridge the amount due on the policy, because of the conflicting claims thereto, this action was brought on February 10, 1910, by Mrs. Bridge and her husband against the company and Mrs. Taylor to obtain a decree that Mrs. Bridge is entitled to receive the same and awarding it to her. The company, acknowledging its liability on the policy, paid the amount due, $3,027.39, upon the joint receipt of plaintiff and Mrs. Taylor, and the amount has been deposited to await the determination of the respective rights of Mrs. Bridge and Mrs. Taylor. The action was therefore dismissed as to the insurance company. The action was tried as between the other parties, and the findings of the trial court were in favor of plaintiffs. Judgment was thereupon given establishing the right of Mrs. Bridge to receive all the moneys due on said policy, free from any claim of Mrs. Taylor, and decreeing that she recover the same. This is an appeal by Mrs. Taylor from the judgment and from an order denying her motion for a new trial.

As is substantially said in respondents' brief, the insurance company having admitted its liability and paid over the amount due on the policy to be awarded in accord with the determination by the court of the question which of the two claimants is entitled thereto, the contest is now between two rival claimants, both of whom are actors.

[1] The right of one to whom a policy of life insurance is assigned by another, as security either for his own debt or for the debt of a third person, to collect from the insurance company the whole amount of the policy when it falls due, if he is still entitled to hold the security, cannot be doubted. The assignee in such a case has the legal title to the policy to such an extent as is necessary to enable him to do this, and the assignor is without any right to maintain any action for the money due thereon, upon the theory that he is the owner thereof. The assignor's only interest in the policy, "upon that condition of fact, is in what remains of it after the advances, for the security of which it was assigned, have been satisfied," and the assignee "cannot be made to surrender it" to the assignor until the advances made by him are repaid. Gilman v. Curtis, 66 Cal. 116, 4 Pac. 1094. See, also, Civ. Code, § 3006; Works v. Merritt, 105 Cal. 467, 38 Pac. 1109; Widaman v. Hubbard (C. C.) 88 Fed. 806; Colebrooke on Collateral Securities, § 426; Puckhaber v. Henry, 152 Cal. 425, 93 Pac. 114, 125 Am. St. Rep. 75, 14 Ann. Cas. 844; Hoult v. Ramsbottom, 127 Cal. 175, 59 Pac. 587.

[2, 3] It can make no difference, in so far as the right of the creditor to continue to hold the security is concerned, that the obligation on account of which he holds it is barred by the statute of limitations. That question was fully and carefully considered by this court in Puckhaber v. Henry, supra, and decided against the contention of the appellant here. We see no reason why the views expressed in the opinion in that case on that question should be modified or departed from. While recognizing that, where the judgment is barred by the statute of limitations, any lien which the creditor holds as security "is extinguished" and the creditor is without any right to take affirmative action to enforce the same, it was held that he may still retain possession of the pledged property, and that the debtor may not in any way interfere with such possession without paying the debt, which has not been satisfied or extinguished. It was held that section 2911, Civil Code, "was not designed to prevent the application of the equitable principle which has always been recognized as warranting courts in refusing to aid the debtor in the recovery of possession of his property from the mortgagee in possession or pledgee * * * without paying his debt." It is true that in that case the contest was between the creditor and the administratrix of the estate of the debtor, who had apparently pledged a life insurance policy payable to his personal representatives instead of to some designated person, so that no question as to the rights of one who had pledged his property for the debt of another, and who was therefore, so far as such property was concerned, a surety, was involved. But we do not see that the distinction is at all material so far as this question is concerned. One who delivers his property in pledge to a creditor as security for a debt of another can be in no better position, in this regard, than the debtor who so delivers his own property. In each case the property is so delivered as security for the payment of the debt, and the equitable principle invoked precludes the pledgor, whoever he may be, from retaking possession before the debt is satisfied.

> "The statute of limitations is a bar to the remedy only, and does not extinguish, or even impair, the obligation of the debtor." Spect v. Spect, 88 Cal. 444, 26 Pac. 203, 13 L. R. A. 137, 22 Am. St. Rep. 314.

We are not now considering any question of the release of the pledgor who is only a surety, by reason of some act or neglect of the creditor other than his mere failure to commence proceedings to enforce the obligation within the time required by the statute of limitations. Such a question is presented in this case, and will be discussed later. And, of course, we do not mean to hold that the rights of the parties would not be otherwise than we have stated, if there were stipulation to the contrary in the contract of pledge. In the case at bar, as in Puckhaber v. Henry, supra, the position of the beneficiary of the policy is that of the pledgor seeking to recover possession of the pledged property from the pledgee, without paying the debt for which it was pledged.

> "The money paid * * * as proceeds of the policy has merely taken the place of the policy held in possession by the plaintiff, and for all the purposes of this action should be deemed to be in the possession of the plaintiff." Puckhaber v. Henry, supra.

Learned counsel for Mrs. Taylor relies somewhat on what is said in Faxon v. All Persons, 137 Pac. 919, to the effect that the equitable rule that, notwithstanding the lien of a mortgage is extinguished by the barring of the debt by limitation, the mortgagor cannot, without paying his debt, quiet his title against the mortgagee, "should not be extended to a case in which the liability to pay the debt does not, in morals and equity, rest upon the plaintiff, or his property." Here the liability to pay the debt did, in morals and equity, rest on the pledgor's property. The case referred to does not assist appellant.

[4] The trial court was amply warranted in concluding that the consideration for the execution of the original promissory note by Mrs. Taylor, and the contemporaneous execution of the assignment of the policy, was the settlement and satisfaction of the pending account between Mr. Taylor and Mrs. Bridge, and of the right of action of Mrs. Bridge against Mr. Taylor for the money due her from him. Certainly no other consideration was essential, so far as Mrs. Taylor was concerned. See section 2792, Civ. Code. What is said in Stroud v. Thomas, 139 Cal. 274, 72 Pac. 1008, 96 Am. St. Rep. 111, as follows: "The contention of the appellant that a preexisting debt is not a sufficient consideration for the execution of a note, so far as the sureties thereon are concerned, where the obligation for the pre-existing debt is canceled upon the delivery of the new note, does not merit discussion. It is well settled that such a consideration is sufficient as a foundation for the promise of the sureties, as well as that of the principals" (citing cases)—is conclusive upon this question. The evidence here clearly showed "the substitution of a new obligation between the same parties, with intent to extinguish the old obligation" (Civ. Code, §§ 1530 and 1531).

[5] We are of the opinion that the conclusion of the trial court that no part of the original promissory note to secure which the policy was assigned in pledge has ever been paid cannot be held to be without sufficient support in the evidence. The claim of appellant in this connection is based entirely on the taking of the so-called renewal notes, and the surrender in each case of renewal of the old note. In Savings and Loan Society v Burnett, 106 Cal. 530, 39 Pac. 925, it is said:

> "It is the general rule that one executory contract does not extinguish another. It is also the rule that there must be an express agreement or understanding to that effect before another note, bill, or check extinguishes and satisfies the indebtedness evidenced by an earlier one. Without multiplying authorities upon these propositions, it is sufficient to refer to Comptoir D'Escompte v. Dresbach, 78 Cal. 15, 20 [20 Pac. 28, 30] where the California cases are collated."

In the case referred to it is said:

> "It has been repeatedly held by this court that the acceptance of a note for a debt does not discharge the debt unless expressly agreed to be payment; that in such case the right of action on the debt is suspended until the maturity of the note given, and suit may be brought on the original debt in case of the nonpayment of the accepted note (citing numerous cases). The language used in the opinions is, unless it is expressly agreed that the note is accepted as payment, it is not payment, and the debt is not extinguished."

In Welch v. Allington, 23 Cal. 322, this rule was applied; the court saying, among other things:

> "The law will not presume such an agreement, and it must be proved by the party relying upon it. The taking of the new note operated as an extension of the time of payment of the old note; and, as soon as that extended time had expired, the plaintiff had a right to bring his action upon the old note, if the amount was not then paid."

The mere fact that the old note was surrendered to the debtor at the time of receiving the new note was held to be insufficient to require a conclusion that there was such an agreement in both the case last cited and in Savings and Loan Society v. Burnett, 106 Cal. 529, 530, 39 Pac. 925.

In Sather Banking Co. v. Briggs, 138 Cal. 733, 72 Pac. 355; it was said:

> "The general rule is that the renewal of notes does not amount to payment. Savings Bank v. Central Market Co., 122 Cal. 33 [54 Pac. 273]. The presumption is that they were not so taken."

See, also, Merchants' Bank v. Bentel, decided December 3, 1913, 137 Pac. 25.

In the case at bar there was absolutely no evidence to show any agreement to the effect stated, other than the surrender of the old notes, and this, in the light of the evidence as to the circumstances of the giving of the new notes, was insufficient to require a conclusion that there was any agreement to the effect that the new notes were received by way of payment. Each of the new notes was apparently only a "renewal note," as found, given solely to avoid the bar of the statute of limitations, for the amount of principal and accrued interest then due.

[6] It is claimed that Mrs. Taylor was a mere surety in so far as the assigned policy was concerned, and that her property was released by the change in the original obligation for which the policy was assigned as security, effected by the taking of the renewal notes. The first of these renewal notes was given, as we have seen, on December 8, 1898, and was payable, "one day after date." The second was given on October 18, 1902, and, it will be assumed, was also payable "one day after date." We do not think it can be seriously questioned that she did stand in the position of a surety of a debtor with relation to the property assigned, and that any change in the contract of the principal which would discharge a surety would operate to release and discharge such property held as collateral. See Jones on Pledges & Collateral Securities, § 517a, and cases there cited; Valentine v. Banking Co., 133 Cal. 191, 195, 65 Pac. 381, 382; Sather Banking Co. v. Briggs, 138 Cal. 724, 729, 72 Pac. 352; Parke & Lacey Co. v. White River, etc., Co., 110 Cal. 658, 43 Pac. 202; O'Mara v. Nugent, 37 N. J. Eq. 326; section 2831, Civ. Code. The property assigned occupied the position of a surety or guarantor, "and anything which would discharge an individual surety or guarantor who was personally liable will, under similar circumstances, discharge such property." Valentine v. Banking Co., supra. "A surety is exonerated—1. In like manner with a guarantor." Civ. Code, subd. 1, § 2840. And section 2819, Civil Code, provides that:

> "A guarantor is exonerated, except so far as he may be indemnified by the principal, if by any act of the creditor, without the consent of the guarantor, the original obligation of the principal is altered in any respect, or the remedies or rights of the creditor against the principal, in respect thereto, in any way impaired or suspended."

While mere delay on the part of a creditor to proceed against the principal, or to enforce any other remedy, does not exonerate a guarantor (section 2823, Civ. Code), it is well settled that if he grants the debtor an extension of time within which to pay, under such circumstances as to impair or suspend his right to proceed against the debtor in accord with the terms of the original obligation, we have such an alteration of the original obligation as will release the surety, if the same is without his consent. See Tuohy v. Woods, 122 Cal. 665, 55 Pac. 683; Daneri v. Gazzola, 139 Cal. 416, 73 Pac. 179; First National Bank v. Harris, 7 Wash. 139, 34 Pac. 466; O'Mara v. Nugent, 37 N. J. Eq. 326. The taking of a new note payable at any specified time after the date is, at least, as we have seen, an extension of the time of payment to the time so specified (Welch v. Allington, supra; Koutz v. Vanclief, 55 Cal. 345), and suspends the right of the creditor to enforce his claim until that time. See, also, 7 Cyc. 875, 876, 891, 902. The fact that the extension is for one day only is immaterial. "If there was a consideration, the law will not attempt to measure the amount thereof." Whelan v. Swain, 132 Cal. 391, 64 Pac. 561. To what extent the surety is in fact injured is not a legitimate subject of inquiry. See Tuohy v. Woods, supra.

Plaintiffs' claim, based upon Dewees v. Osborne, 178 Ill. 39, 52 N. E. 942, that Mrs. Taylor was not a surety, but a principal acting through her husband as her agent, cannot be upheld in view of the findings of the trial court which, of course, are conclusive on them on this appeal by Mrs. Taylor. These findings show a plain case of simple suretyship so far as she was concerned, a debt of Mr. Taylor alone, the giving of a note therefor by Mr Taylor alone, and the execution and delivery of the assignment of the policy by Mr. and Mrs. Taylor "as security for the payment of said promissory note." In the case relied on by learned counsel, the agreement made at the time of the pledge by the husband clothed with ostensible authority to deal with the policy as he saw fit, contemplated all that was done, and the question was one to be determined by the law of agency. Whatever may be said as to the effect of the evidence in this case regarding the execution and delivery of the assignment, the findings show simply what we have stated, and we have no question of agency thereunder.

In response to Mrs. Taylor's claim in this regard, set up in her pleading denominated her "amended answer and amended cross-complaint," filed August 18, 1911, as well as to other claims made by her, plaintiffs interposed the defense that the claim was barred by certain provisions of our statute of limitations, viz.: Subdivision 1 of section 339 and section 343 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and the trial court found in accord with this defense. We may assume that section 343, Code of Civil Procedure, which prescribed a limitation of four years after the cause of action shall have accrued, is the provision of our statute of limitations applicable to such a case as this, the limitation in subdivision 1, section 339, Code of Civil Procedure, being only two years.

The first renewal note was given, as we have seen, on December 8, 1898, and the second on October 18, 1902. Obviously if Mrs. Taylor's rights because of the extension accrued at the time thereof, so that she might then have legally asserted the same, they became barred at least as early as December 8, 1902, and October 18, 1906, respectively.

The evidence shows without conflict that the insurance policy was delivered to Mr. Bridge at the time of the giving of the original note and the assignment of the policy absolute in its terms, and that it remained in his possession, he claiming the right to hold the same as security for the debt due his wife, until, after the death of Mr. Taylor, the insured, he made the claim against the insurance company. He then surrendered the policy to the insurance company.

No sufficient reason is suggested why Mrs. Taylor's right to recover the policy on account of the extensions of the time of payment of the original note did not accrue at the time of such extensions. Such extensions, according to the contention of her counsel, each at once released the policy, so far as she was concerned, from any claim under which it could legally be held by plaintiffs as security for the payment of her husband's debt. She was thenceforth entitled to assert her right in this behalf by action. During the full period prescribed by the statute of limitations and thereafter to the death of her husband, plaintiffs continued to hold the same under claim of right and adversely to her, with no claim whatever on her part that they were not entitled so to do. The trial court found, it is true, that she took no part in either of the renewals, "and had no knowledge thereof," and that "said renewals were made without her knowledge or consent." But we think that all this is entirely immaterial in so far as any question in connection with the statute of limitations is concerned. There is nothing in either the findings or the evidence to warrant the application of the rule discussed and applied is Lightner Mining Co. v. Lane, 161 Cal. 689, 120 Pac. 771, Ann. Cas. 1913C, 1093, to the effect that "a fraudulent concealment of the fact, upon the existence of which the cause of action accrues, is a good answer to the plea of the statute of limitations." There is nothing in this case to warrant a conclusion of anything in the nature of a fraudulent concealment. Ordinarily, of course, the time when the cause of action accrues marks the beginning of the running of the statute of limitations. There is nothing here to take the case from the operation of this general rule. We are of the opinion that the finding of the trial court to the effect that Mrs. Taylor's claim in this behalf is barred by certain provisions of the statute of limitations must be held to be sustained by the evidence.

[7] We see no force in the claim that the judgment is in violation of any provision of the federal Constitution. The claim of appellant in that connection appears to be substantially that the doctrine of Puckhaber v. Henry, supra, cannot be held applicable to this case without depriving her of vested rights, in that prior to that decision it was declared by our decisions that a pledgor of property could retake the same from the pledgee without paying the debt for which it was pledged as soon as the debt itself was barred by the statute of limitations; the lien of the pledge being extinguished by the lapse of the time which bars the principal obligation. Section 2911, Civ. Code. That a pledgee could not retain the pledged property after the lapse of such time was declared in Mutual L. Ins. Co. v. Pacific Fruit Co., 142 Cal. 477, 76 Pac. 67, and possibly in Conway v. Supreme Council, 131 Cal. 437, 63 Pac. 727, both of which cases were decided subsequent to the giving of the pledge here involved. Puckhaber v. Henry, supra, disapproving the former of these cases and distinguishing the latter, was decided December 2, 1907. There is no claim that any such rule was declared by any decision prior to Conway v. Supreme Council, supra. It is obvious therefore that there is no basis in fact for any claim that at the time the contract of pledge was entered into the doctrine announced in the cases referred to became a part of the contract of the parties, even if such a situation would have existed had the decisions referred to been made prior to the contract of pledge—a matter that we by no means concede. See Allen v. Allen, 95 Cal. 184, 30 Pac. 213, 16 L. R. A. 646; Alferitz v. Borgwardt, 126 Cal. 201, 58 Pac. 460. It is certainly clear that the doctrine of the cases just cited is applicable to the claim of learned counsel for Mrs. Taylor that she is entitled under the federal Constitution to prevail by reason of decisions of this court rendered subsequent to the making of the contract of pledge.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

BEATTY, C. J., does not participate in the foregoing.

PEOPLE v. BOSTIC. (Cr. 1850.)

1. Criminal Law (§ 274*)—Arraignment—Plea of Guilty—Withdrawal.

The trial court did not abuse the discretion vested in him by Pen. Code, § 1018, in refusing to permit defendant in a homicide case to withdraw his plea of guilty and substitute a plea of not guilty where, at the time of the arraignment, accused was fully advised by the court of his rights, and the plea of guilty was entered under circumstances which showed that accused was neither surprised nor cajoled into entering the plea of guilty.

2. Homicide (§ 237*)—Evidence—Sufficiency—Insanity.

In a homicide case, evidence held to sustain a finding by the court that there was no evidence that accused was insane at the time of the homicide.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. § 500; Dec. Dig. § 237.*]

3. Homicide (§ 18*)—Homicide in Commission of Robbery—Statutory Provisions.

Under Pen. Code, § 189, making a killing committed in the perpetration or attempt to perpetrate robbery murder in the first degree, any killing committed in the perpetration of robbery, though it be accidental, is murder in the first degree, and does not apply only to such a killing as would be included in the scheme of robbery and planned as a part of the execution of that crime.

4. Criminal Law (§ 456*)—Evidence—Insanity.

In a homicide case defended on the ground of insanity, the court properly permitted witnesses to testify that at various times defendant appeared rational.

5. Criminal Law (§ 641*)—Trial—Counsel for Accused.

Where accused, before arraignment in a homicide case, was told that the court was ready to appoint a legal adviser who would serve without compensation, there was a substantial compliance with Pen. Code, § 987, providing that accused is entitled to have the aid of counsel before arraignment, etc.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Gavin W. Craig, Judge.

John Bostic was convicted of murder in the first degree, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Gray, Barker & Bowen and Wheaton A. Gray, all of Los Angeles, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and George Beebe, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

MELVIN, J. The defendant was charged with the murder of one Horace E. Montague; the date of the commission of the crime being December 1, 1913, and the place the county of Los Angeles. He was captured in San Francisco about three weeks after the commission of the homicide and was taken to Los Angeles. On the trip southward he freely confessed his guilt to Mr. W. A. Hammel, sheriff of Los Angeles county, and to Captain T. H. Broadhead, an employé of the Southern Pacific Company. Subsequently he was preliminarily examined before a magistrate, was held to answer, and an information duly charging him with the crime of murder was filed by the district attorney of Los Angeles county. He was arraigned upon this information, declined the offer of the court to appoint counsel in his behalf, and entered a plea of "guilty." The court sentenced him to death. Subsequently his parents having learned of his arrest, and having employed counsel to represent him, a motion was made to set aside the judgment on the grounds that the court had taken no testimony, and had not fixed the degree of the crime. This motion was granted, and evidence was offered for the avowed purpose of aiding the court in determining the degree of the crime and its punishment. Another declared reason for offering this evidence was to enable the court, if the crime should be found to be murder of the first degree, to determine whether justice demanded the execution of the defendant or his imprisonment for life. While the court was busily engaged upon that inquiry, defendant's counsel made a motion that defendant be permitted to withdraw his plea of "guilty" and enter a plea of "not guilty." It was also suggested that the court should consider the testimony for the purpose of aiding in the determination of the question whether or not the defendant's then present condition demanded the submission to a jury of the question of his sanity at that time. After considering the evidence offered, which included a transcript of the testimony given at the preliminary examination and some additional testimony, the court denied defendant's motion, found the murder to be of the first degree, and pronounced upon defendant the judgment of death. Defendant appeals from the judgment, and from the order denying his motion to be permitted to withdraw the plea of "guilty," and to substitute therefor a plea of "not guilty."

The defendant boarded a south-bound passenger train of the Southern Pacific Company near El Monte in Los Angeles county on the evening of December 1, 1913, about 8:30 o'clock, and proceeded to rob eight people who were in the rear Pullman coach at the time he entered it. He was armed with a revolver, which he used to emphasize and enforce his demands for valuables. He wore no mask or other disguise. J. W. Compton, the Pullman conductor, testified that the defendant stood near the middle of the rear Pullman coach. As he started to pass defendant, whom he regarded as a passenger, the latter seized him, presented a pistol at his breast, ordered him to throw up his hands, and, when he had complied with the command, proceeded to rifle his pockets. The defendant next turned his attention to the passengers, taking valuables from three women and one man. The defendant then asked Robbins, a brakeman, where the train was, and the latter, besides giving the desired information, said that, unless he should give a signal, the train would stop there. Defendant ordered him to give the signal to go ahead, and Robbins went out onto the platform, where he signaled the engineer to stop. Thereupon the defendant went after the brakeman, called him a vile name, and said he had a good notion to blow Robbins' brains out. Robbins was compelled at the point of the revolver to give the signal for the train to proceed. Then defendant forced Robbins to re-enter the car and take a seat. He then said to Robbins, "I will take your watch just to learn you a lesson." This he proceeded to do, remarking, "I don't often do this," and reiterating the statement that his act was just to "learn" Robbins a lesson. At this moment Montague entered the car and walked down the aisle toward the place where defendant was standing. The defendant seized Mr. Montague with his left hand, pointed the revolver at the breast of that gentleman with his right hand, and said, "Throw up your hands." Montague replied, "What?" The command was repeated; but Montague caught at defendant's left wrist with his left hand, whereupon defendant drew his victim towards him and fired, mortally wounding Montague, who dropped his valise, turned, and ran up the aisle from a point near the end to about the center of the car, when a second shot was fired by the defendant in the direction of the fleeing man, but it did not strike him. He fell near the door of the car. The defendant remarked, "I quess one of them got him," and told the others in the car that what they had seen was only a "lesson" of what they would get if they made any move. He then forced Robbins to give the signal for the train to slow down, and, when it was progressing at the rate of about 15 miles an hour, defendant jumped off and escaped. Montague died before the train reached Los Angeles, which was about 30 minutes after the shooting. The other witnesses corroborated Compton in all essential particulars. Robbins, the trainman, told of defendant's entering the washroom at the end of the car where the witness and a Mr. Colen were relieved of their valuables by the robber. He then drove Robbins and Colen in front of him into the main body of the car. He next took some of Mrs. Colen's property, including a diamond ring, threatening to shoot her if she would not readily yield up her money and jewelry. But it is unnecessary to go into the details of Robbins' testimony as it did not differ in any essential point from that of Compton. His description of the actual encounter and the shooting of Montague was as follows:

> "He took my watch. Just a few seconds after Mr. Montague come in the front end of the car and walked through quickly, walked right up to the defendant. The defendant stopped him and grabbed him by the lapel of the vest or coat and demanded him to throw up his hands. Mr. Montague says, 'What?' He says, 'Throw up your hands.' Mr. Montague says, 'Not by a damn sight,' and dropped his grip he had in his right hand and made some move, I could not see, as Mr. Montague was standing between me and the defendant, back to me; but at the same time this move was made a shot was fired. Mr. Montague turned, run down the aisle, and when about half way down the defendant fired another shot. Q. In what direction? A. Towards Mr. Montague. Q. What did the defendant say, if anything? A. I heard him make a remark that one of them got him anyway. That is all the remark I heard him make. He stood there probably two minutes or a little more, did not say anything till he demanded me to go and stop the train till he got off. I went out and gave a stop signal. He stood on the platform and demanded me to stand on the other side from where he was. I stood over as far as I could. The gun was still pointed at me, and I asked him for my watch. The train then slowed down to about 15 miles an hour. The defendant jumped off."

[1, 2] The first contention of defendant's counsel is that the court abused its discretion in not granting the motion that defendant be permitted to withdraw his plea of guilty. He calls out attention to the fact that the defendant was not represented by counsel at the time his plea was entered, and insists that the proof of insanity should have raised such doubt in the mind of the judge as would have impelled him under his oath to submit the question of defendant's mental condition at the time of the homicide to a jury. The record shows, however, that upon the arraignment of the defendant the court carefully explained his rights to him. He was told that if he desired to be represented the court would appoint counsel who would act for him without compensation; that he was entitled to a trial in open court by a jury, and to the process of the court to procure witnesses to testify in his behalf.

The question of the mental condition of the defendant, and whether or not the evidence was such as to warrant the submission of that matter to a jury, was one addressed peculiarly to the conscience of the judge, as well as to his observation. He saw the defendant and the witnesses. He heard their testimony and was in a position to weigh it. The defendant's father, testified by affidavit and personally that the young man was "weak-minded, mentally incompetent, and in fact insane," basing his conclusions largely upon the son's habit of running away from home, upon his addiction to theft, and upon the frequent recurrence, from early childhood, of sullen spells during which the defendant would refuse for long periods to speak to any member of the family. Other witnesses gave similar testimony, based upon almost identical reasoning, that in the opinion of each of them the defendant was insane. Dr. Pepper, who had examined the defendant, and had gleaned as much of his history as possible from the young man's statements, and from other sources, including the report of the testimony taken at the preliminary examination, stated in reply to a long question containing a synopsis of the testimony, that, basing his conclusion upon the facts related to him, and upon the personal examination which he had given the defendant, it was his opinion that the latter was suffering from a condition of insanity which the doctor characterized as "aggravated kleptomania."

For the prosecution Drs. Orbison and Allen, who had examined the defendant, and had obtained as much of his family history as possible from the young man himself, each testified that defendant's mental condition was very good, and that he was not insane. Others testified that at various times, including the occasion of the robbery, defendant appeared rational.

Appellant's counsel cite People v. McCrory, 41 Cal. 461, in support of their belief that the court erred in denying their motion; but the facts in that case are so totally different from those presented in the one at bar that the cited authority does not support the position taken by counsel. In the McCrory Case the court had erroneously denied a motion for a continuance of the trial to the next term because of the absence of material witnesses. Rather than go to trial on the charge of murder without his witnesses, the defendant withdrew his plea of "not guilty" previously entered and pleaded "guilty" to murder of the second degree. The court refused to permit this plea to be withdrawn, and that was held to be an abuse of discretion.

In People v. Scott, 59 Cal. 341, the facts were also very different from those displayed by the record before us in this case. Scott had been declared insane by a jury after his plea of "guilty," and had been a patient in the insane asylum at Napa. Upon his discharge from that institution the court sentenced him after denying his motion for leave to withdraw his plea. The substance of the affidavits in support of the plea is not fully given in the opinion; but it does appear that they were numerous and "tended to show that the defendant had not been of sound mind for several years, and that he was at one time an inmate of the insane asylum at Jacksonville, Ill." It was held that "under the peculiar circumstances of the case" the court erred in refusing to permit the withdrawal of the plea.

It is asserted by counsel for the appellant that the lower court erred in announcing that there was no evidence of insanity in the case "in the teeth of the testimony of three disinterested witnesses that the boy was irresponsible and insane, the testimony of the father and brother to the same fact, and the testimony of a competent expert witness that in his opinion the boy was entirely irresponsible at the time he committed the crime." But the facts upon which these witnesses based their opinions were as consistent with sanity as with a disordered state of the mind. Some sane people steal. Some sane people have moody periods at times, and many sane boys run away from home. The expert witness who testified in defendant's behalf stated that when he examined defendant the young man was rational and normal, and that in the opinion of the witness he knew the difference between right and wrong. The physician's conclusion that when the train robbery occurred the defendant was afflicted with "aggravated kleptomania" was based upon facts, so far as the evidence shows, which merely revealed a lack of honesty on the part of the defendant. We cannot say that the judge who heard these witnesses was mistaken in asserting that there was no evidence of defendant's insanity.

Undoubtedly a court should permit a plea of "guilty" to be withdrawn, and one of "not guilty" to be substituted, where it properly appears that the former plea was ignorantly induced or was made through motives of hope or fear unduly operating upon the defendant's volition. People v. Miller, 114 Cal. 16, 45 Pac. 986. But where, as in this case, the plea of guilty was made and entered under circumstances which showed that the accused person was neither surprised nor cajoled, we cannot say that the discretion vested in the trial court under section 1018 of the Penal Code was abused. The court must be upheld in the exercise of such sound discretion, unless abuse of discretion is clearly shown. People v. Dabner, 153 Cal. 403, 95 Pac. 880.

[3] The murder was committed in the perpetration or attempt to perpetrate robbery, and was therefore murder of the first degree. Pen. Code, § 189. There was some contention in the briefs and at the oral argument of this case that this section meant to apply only to such a murder as would be included in the scheme of robbery and planned as a part of the execution of that crime. A mere statement of such a theory carries its refutation, for it must be apparent that without reference to the robbery such a murder would be a "willful, deliberate, and premeditated killing." In one of their briefs counsel, referring to defendant, use this language:

> "His evident purpose, whether he was sane or insane, was simply to accomplish robbery. He had no deliberate intention and design of taking human life. The taking of human life was forced upon him by the unwise resistance of Montague. And it may very well be that the actual killing of Montague was the result of the accidental discharge of the pistol in the course of the scuffle, which scuffle and resistance on the part of Montague appears to have taken place, according to the testimony of three disinterested witnesses."

Even if it be conceded that Montague was killed by an accidental discharge of the revolver which occurred during the struggle, the defendant would be guilty of murder of the first degree. The moment he entered that car with a deadly weapon in his hand, with the purpose of committing robbery, the law fixed upon him the intent which would make any killing in the perpetration of the robbery, or in the attempt to perpetrate it, a murder of the first degree. In such cases the law does not measure the delicate scruples of the robber with reference to shooting his victim. The law holds him highly guilty if he does kill, and it makes no difference whether he strikes down a man, as did Dabner and Siemsen, presumably upon the theory that "dead men tell no tales," or slays the brave man who resists, as did Montague. In either case he is a murderer subject to the finding of the jury upon trial, or of the court after a plea of "guilty," that he shall suffer death or imprisonment for life. But there was evidence which would abundantly justify the court in finding, not that the revolver exploded in the struggle, but that the defendant deliberately took Montague's life, because after the dying man was in full retreat the defendant sent a second bullet flying in his direction and then remarked that "one of them got him anyway." It was an atrocious crime, and we can perceive no reason why the court was not justified in pronouncing the sentence which was given.

[4] The court permitted certain witnesses to testify to the fact that at various times the defendant appeared rational. This was proper. People v. McCarthy, 115 Cal. 260, 46 Pac. 1073; People v. Manoogian, 141 Cal. 596, 75 Pac. 177.

[5] There was a substantial compliance with section 987 of the Penal Code when the defendant was taken into court for arraignment. While he was not informed in the exact language of the statute that he was entitled to have the aid of counsel "before being arraigned," he was told that the court was ready to appoint a legal adviser who would serve without compensation. He had not then been arraigned, and the court's readiness to appoint counsel then was sufficient notice to him that he was entitled, if he so wished, to the aid of counsel at all stages of the prosecution against him. The court explained with scrupulous care that he might have two days between arraignment and plea if he so desired. No advantage was taken of him, and he was given every fair opportunity allowed by statute for obtaining legal advice, and for time to deliberate upon the course to be pursued by him.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

SAN CHRISTINA INV. CO. v. CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO.

1. Municipal Corporations (§ 956*)—Charter—Construction.

The provision of San Francisco charter that the taxes should not exceed a certain rate, except in case of great necessity or emergency, when the limitation might be suspended, but that no increase should be valid unless authorized by ordinance passed by the unanimous vote of the supervisors and approved by the mayor, does not require a unanimous vote of all of the supervisors elected, and it is sufficient that all present vote in favor of a suspension of the limitation, for other sections of the charter showed that apt language was used when it was desired to distinguish between the supervisors present and the entire number.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 2010–2013; Dec. Dig. § 956.*]

2. Pleading (§§ 193, 205*)—Conclusions of Law.

A complaint to recover taxes paid under protest, on the ground that the levy, being in excess of the usual legal rate, was invalid, which alleged that no great emergency or necessity existed, so as to authorize any part of the extra tax levy, is good as against general demurrer, although subject to special demurrer as a legal conclusion.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 425, 428–435, 437–443, 491–493, 495, 496, 498–510; Dec. Dig. §§ 193, 205.*]

3. Municipal Corporations (§ 103*)—Power of Legislative Body — Review by Courts.

While the determination of a fact by a general legislative assembly is conclusive on the courts, the rule is otherwise with respect to inferior legislative tribunals, as the board of supervisors of a city and county, unless their determination is expressly made conclusive; and, though declared to be conclusive, their finding cannot bind a citizen whose property is affected thereby, unless he is at some stage in the proceeding given an opportunity to be heard on the question.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 219; Dec. Dig. § 103.*]

4. Municipal Corporations (§ 969*)—Legislative Assembly—Powers.

Under the charter of the city and county of San Francisco, providing that taxes should not exceed a certain rate, except in case of great necessity or emergency, and that no increase should be valid unless authorized by ordinance passed by the unanimous vote of the supervisors and approved by the mayor, which must recite the character of the necessity or emergency, the determination by the board of supervisors that a great emergency or necessity existed is not conclusive, and may be reviewed by the courts; the taxing power being always rigidly scrutinized.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 2068–2074; Dec. Dig. § 969.*]

5. Appeal and Error (§ 842*) — Review — Questions Reviewable.

Upon appeal from a judgment rendered upon the sustaining of a demurrer to a complaint seeking to recover taxes paid under protest on the ground that the special levy in excess of the usual rate, was not authorized by any great emergency or necessity, the question whether certain taxes were for emergencies or necessities will not be reviewed, being first one of fact for the trial court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3316–3330; Dec. Dig. § 842.*]

6. Municipal Corporations (§ 956*)—Legislative Assemblies—Taxation—Powers—"Emergency"—"Great."

Under the San Francisco charter, providing that in case of great emergency or necessity a limitation upon the tax rate should not apply, the "emergency," by which is meant an unforeseen occurrence or combination of circumstances calling for immediate action, as well as the necessity to be "great," must be of grave character and serious moment.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 3, p. 2361; vol. 4, p. 3162.]

7. Municipal Corporations (§ 974*)—Powers of Municipality—Charter.

No argument of hardship or inconvenience will justify a court in setting at naught limitations on the taxing power contained in a city's charter.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 2083–2086; Dec. Dig. § 974.*]

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by the San Christina Investment Company against the City and County of San Francisco. From judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Cushing & Cushing, of San Francisco, and J. P. Langhorne, amicus curiæ, of San Francisco, for appellant. Percy V. Long, City Atty., and Jesse H. Steinhart, Asst. City Atty., both of San Francisco, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. This is an action brought to recover taxes paid under protest for the asserted illegality and invalidity of the tax levy. A general demurrer to the complaint was sustained, and from the judgment which followed plaintiff appeals.

Chapter 1, art. 3, § 11, of the charter of the city and county of San Francisco contains a restriction upon the general grant of the taxing power to the municipality, which restriction is widely and popularly known as the "dollar limit." This section, excluding from its limitation certain defined taxes, declares that the annual levy "shall not exceed the rate of one dollar on each one hundred dollars valuation of the property assessed." Section 13 of the same article and chapter is as follows:

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

> "The limitation in section eleven of this chapter upon the rate of taxation shall not apply in case of any great necessity or emergency. In such case the limitation may be temporarily suspended so as to enable the supervisors to provide for such necessity or emergency. No increase shall be made in the rate of taxation authorized to be levied in any fiscal year, unless such increase be authorized by ordinance passed by the unanimous vote of the supervisors and approved by the mayor. The character of such necessity or emergency shall be recited in the ordinance authorizing such action, and be entered in the journal of the board. * * *"

In 1910, in preparing the tax levy for the fiscal years 1910-11, the supervisors, acting under the authority of section 13, passed two ordinances. Sections 1 and 2 of the first are as follows:

> "Section 1. It is hereby recited, determined and declared that a great necessity and emergency exists within the city and county of San Francisco, which requires that the limitation of taxation contained in section 11, chapter 1 of article III of the charter of said city and county be temporarily suspended, and that the character of such necessity and emergency is as follows, to wit: On the 18th day of April, 1906, a large number of the public buildings, and other structures, and much of the fire department equipment of said city and county were destroyed by fire, and on said day a large extent of the public sewers of said city and county were damaged and destroyed by earthquake; that a large extent of the public streets of said city and county were damaged by the combined effects of fire and earthquake; also there is danger that the bubonic plague, prevalent in 1907, may recur and provision should be made to prevent such recurrence; that it has been impossible to pave, repave and repair streets, reconstruct and repair sewers, construct and repair the public buildings destroyed and damaged as aforesaid in April, 1906, from the appropriations heretofore made, and the great necessity and emergency hereby declared to exist has not been adequately provided for by previous tax levies made by the board of supervisors.
> "Sec. 2. That by reason of the great necessity and emergency, herein set forth, large sums of money will be required to be expended by the city and county during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1911, for the paving, grading, repaving and repairing of streets, for the reconstruction and repair of sewers, construction of and repairs to public buildings, for construction and equipment of fire department buildings, for the purchase of lands for fire department buildings, for the reconstruction of, repairs to and equipment of school department buildings, for the construction and equipment of police department buildings, and for the purchase of lands for police department purposes, and for the continuation and enforcement of sanitary measures. That the large sums required for the aforesaid purposes cannot be obtained from the annual income and revenue of the city and county, and said necessary expenditures cannot be made without temporarily suspending the limitation upon the rate of taxation provided for in section 11 of chapter I of article III of the charter of said city and county."

The ordinance further declared that for the assigned reasons the provisions of section 11, supra, of the charter were therefore suspended, and an additional tax levy of 29 cents upon the $100 was authorized and declared necessary; the moneys derived from such tax being segregated for named purposes.

The second ordinance formally levied the tax. The purposes and amounts were thus set forth:

For paving, repaving, grading and repairs to streets, for reconstruction of and repairs to sewers, and for construction and repairs to public buildings and other structures, except school buildings.....	22 cents
For construction and equipment of fire department buildings, and for purchase of lands for fire department purposes	2½ cents
For reconstruction and repairs to and equipment of school department buildings	2 cents
For construction and equipment of police department buildings, and for purchase of lands for police department purposes	2 cents
For continuance of sanitary measures	½ cents.

The plaintiff in its protest and in its complaint presented three grounds of attack against the validity of the tax levy under this ordinance, which may be thus stated: (a) The ordinance suspending the operation of section 11 was not passed in accordance with the requirements of the charter; (b) no "great necessity or emergency" justifying the suspension of section 11 in fact existed; and (c) a large part, if not all, of the revenue to be raised by the levy was, upon the face of the ordinance, to be devoted to objects and purposes which were not emergency or necessity purposes. These questions may be taken up in the order indicated, for clearly, if the ordinance was not legally passed, there is an end at once put to the whole controversy.

[1] (a) Appellant here contends that the people of San Francisco, in adopting their charter, and the Legislature, in ratifying it, limited the power of the board of supervisors with great rigidity to the "dollar limit," and authorized the suspension of this limit and the levying of an additional tax with extreme reluctance and with equal care. It could be done not even in the case of necessity or emergency, but only in the case of a great necessity or emergency, and then it could be done only "by the unanimous vote of the supervisors," which should be construed under these considerations to mean the unanimous vote of all the supervisors. It is argued that if the word "supervisors" as here used is to be interpreted as synonymous with "board of supervisors" under chapter 1, art. 20, § 1, of the charter, which declares that the legislative power of the city and county is vested in a body designated the board of supervisors, but that "such body is also designated in this charter, the supervisors," it would amount to a declaration that such an emergency tax could be laid and levied by a bare quorum of the board—by ten members—whereas by inspection of other charter provisions it will be seen that in matters of far less consequence a greater number of votes is required. Thus to pass an ordinance over the mayor's veto requires "the affirmative vote of not less than fourteen members." Chapter 1, art. 1, § 16. The vote of the same number is required to extend the time on a contract or to authorize the purchase of property for public works. Chapter 1, art. 6, § 21; chapter 4, art. 6, § 6. Fifteen votes are required to lease school property. Chapter 4, art. 7, § 11. To grant a franchise the vote of three-fourths of all the members of the board is required, or 14, and to pass a franchise over the mayor's veto a vote of five-sixths of all the supervisors is required—a vote of 15. Chapter 2, art. 2, § 6; subdivision 6, § 36. To pay any money out of the urgency necessity fund a five-sixths vote of all the members is required. Chapter 1, art. 3, § 8. But these citations rather destroy than confirm appellant's contention. It becomes apparent that the charter in these particulars was framed with careful attention to the language employed, and that in every other instance there can be no ambiguity or doubt as to the actual number of votes required to accomplish a given purpose. We find, moreover, that in every instance save one the phrase "the supervisors," is used interchangeably in meaning with "board of supervisors," as the charter itself expressly declares it will do. The one exception to that is found in article 2, c. 2, § 36, subd. 6, which declares:

> "It shall require a vote of five-sixths of all the supervisors to pass an ordinance, notwithstanding the objections of the mayor."

There can be no doubt whatsoever of the meaning of this language, and there can be no successful answer to the declaration of the respondent that, if in the section under consideration the charter had meant the unanimous vote of all the supervisors, it would have said so, as it did say in the less important section just quoted. Moreover, good and sufficient reasons appear why the charter framers deemed it wise not to require the unanimous vote of all of the supervisors. Those reasons at once occur to the mind. Their action was to be called forth, and could properly be called forth, only in case of great necessity or emergency. It might well be that in such a case it would be difficult, if not impossible, to assemble all of the members of the board, and a perilous and perhaps calamitous delay might result. Upon the other hand, the interests of the taxpayers were amply guarded by the provision that the suspension could not take place except by the unanimous vote of all present. Therefore, if the attempted suspension was, in fact, unwarranted, the voice of one member of the board raised in protest and voting in the negative would defeat the scheme. Indeed, it is the single instance presented by the charter where one dissenting vote will block legislation. Wherefore, it appearing from the complaint itself that 17 out of the 18 supervisors (all of the board who were actually present) voted for the ordinance, and there being no dissenting vote, the ordinance was duty adopted within the meaning and provisions of the charter, and the demurrer to the complaint on that ground was properly sustained.

[2, 3] (b) Herein appellant contends that the existence or nonexistence of a great necessity or emergency justifying the temporary suspension of the dollar limit is a question of fact; that a finding of the existence of this fact is a prerequisite to the right of the supervisors to suspend the limit, but that their determination in this respect is not final, and is subject to review by the courts. The position of respondent is that the finding of the board of supervisors, entered upon the journal of the board, is conclusive upon all courts. In this connection respondent also advances a minor argument, to the effect that appellant fails sufficiently to deny the existence of the great necessity or emergency; its denial being couched in the following language:

> "That no great emergency or necessity existed so as to authorize all or any part of said extra tax levy."

It is asserted by respondent, and with force, that this is but the pleading of a legal conclusion. Unquestionably, if a special demurrer had been directed to this imperfection in the complaint, the point would have been well taken. But against a general demurrer it will be held, as it was held in Eva v. Andersen (Cal.) 137 Pac. 16, that the allegation is sufficient.

Returning to the principal proposition now under consideration, respondent's position is that the supervisors were empowered to make a determination of the existence or nonexistence of the necessity; that their determination here made was a legislative determination, and that it is fundamental that such determinations upon questions of fact are not subject to judicial review. The cases which respondent cites in support of this proposition are cases where the determination was by the general Legislature. Where an act of the Legislature is brought up for review, the rule is that announced by respondent. The principle is this: The legislative determination of a fact is conclusive upon the courts. Where evidence is required to be taken it will be conclusively presumed that the Legislature acted after the taking of such evidence, and, even if a special finding of fact be required, the legislative enactment will be construed to contain such finding by implication. The question has received recent consideration from this court in People v. Sacramento Drainage District, 155 Cal. 373, 386, 103 Pac. 207. In Stevenson v. Colgan, 91 Cal. 649, 27 Pac. 1089, 14 L. R. A. 459, 25 Am. St. Rep. 230, in the discussion of this question and of the dignity which attaches to the legislative determination, it is said:

> "This view seems to be sustained by the decisions of the highest courts of other states, and is in harmony with the central idea of the Constitution in prescribing the independence and equality of the three great departments of the state."

But neither the reasoning nor the rule applies to the acts of inferior legislative tribunals. As to them it may be said, generally speaking, that, when the power or jurisdiction of such an inferior board, body, court, or other tribunal is made to depend upon the existence of a fact, its determination of the fact is not conclusive, unless declared to be so in express terms or by necessary implication. And, if so declared to be conclusive, the declaration or finding can operate to bind the citizen whose property is affected thereby only in the event that at some stage of the proceedings he shall have been afforded an opportunity to be heard on the question; in short, shall have had his day in court. Otherwise there is a clear taking of property without due process of law. For it is of the essence of due process of law in such cases that a man shall be accorded the right and opportunity to be heard and to be heard effectively at some stage of the proceedings before he is deprived of his property or property rights. So we find that the principle which accords the great dignity of conclusiveness to determinations of the general Legislature (and it is these determinations which respondent cites in support of its position) is not only not applied to the proceedings of inferior legislative tribunals, but is distinctly held to be nonapplicable. Thus in Waterworks v. San Francisco, 82 Cal. 286, 22 Pac. 910, 1046, 6 L. R. A. 756, 16 Am. St. Rep. 116, it is said:

> "We are not inclined to the doctrine asserted by the appellant in this case, that every subordinate body of officers to whom the Legislature delegates what may be regarded as legislative power thereby becomes a part of the legislative branch of the state government, and beyond judicial control."

And in Davis v. Mayor of New York, 1 Duer (N. Y.) 451 (affirmed in People v. Sturtevant, 9 N. Y. 263, 59 Am. Dec. 536), it is said:

> "The doctrine, exactly as stated, may be true when applied to the Legislature of the state, which, as a co-ordinate branch of the government, representing and exercising in its sphere the sovereignty of the people, is, for political reasons, of manifest force, wholly exempt in all its proceedings from any legal process or judicial control; but the doctrine is not, nor is any portion of it, true, when applied to a subordinate municipal body, which, although clothed to some extent with legislative, and even political, powers, is yet, in the exercise of all its powers, just as subject to the authority and control of courts of justice, to legal process, legal restraint, and legal correction as any other body or person, natural or artificial."

The rule of decision holding that the determination of a municipality of the necessity or expediency of exercising the right of eminent domain against a given piece of land is conclusive upon the courts is neither in conflict with nor an exception to the principle we have been discussing: First, because the exercise of the right of eminent domain is essentially a political question, and not judicial (Dillon, Mun. Corp. [5th Ed.] § 1036); and, second, because the property owner is in no sense legally injured by such determination, since he receives full value for his property thus taken for a public use. We are here dealing with the taxing power, proceedings in which are always in invitum—a power which, when exercised under delegated authority by a municipal corporation, is always subject to rigid scrutiny, first, to determine whether the power actually exists; and, second, to determine whether it has been exercised under the limitations imposed. For, says Sutherland, treating of acts delegating the power of taxation:

> "Acts of this kind are construed with great strictness. Two concurring principles leading to strict construction apply. Such acts affect arbitrarily private property, and are grants of power." 2 Lewis' Sutherland, Stat. Cons. § 541.

See, also, Douglass v. Mayor of Placerville, 18 Cal. 643; Wallace v. Mayor of San Jose, 29 Cal. 181; Wichmann v. City of Placerville, 147 Cal. 162, 81 Pac. 537.

Finally, upon this proposition, reference may be made to the consideration given to it by the Supreme Court of Washington in two cases. Green v. Okanogan County, 60 Wash. 309, 111 Pac. 226, 114 Pac. 457, and Stern v. Spokane, 60 Wash. 325, 111 Pac. 231. In the first of these cases the law forbade the letting of a contract without competitive bidding, "except in case of an emergency." Under this provision the court examined into the facts, and made its determination contrary to that of the supervisors of Okanogan county that the emergency did not exist, and that competitive bids were therefore required. In the second case the charter of Spokane contained the provision dispensing with competitive bidding "if the mayor and city council shall by resolution declare an emergency to exist." The mayor and city council did so declare, and the court expressed its inability to review that declaration in the following language:

> "That which the Legislature can give, it can take away; and, while we agree with counsel for appellant that, if the action of the council in declaring an emergency to exist be upheld, it practically nullifies those provisions of the charter which were designed to insure open competition in the matter of letting contracts for public works, we must nevertheless hold that it can be no concern of the courts if it does. If the Legislature passes a wholesome law, and at the same time creates a weapon to strike it down, it is still within the limits of its constitutional authority, as much so as if it had repealed an existing statute by express enactment. It is so in this case. The charter does not say that time may be dispensed with if an emergency exist, thus leaving the court free to inquire into the fact, but it says that the council shall have the power under any state of facts to declare an emergency. * * * This case is to be distinguished from Green v. Okanogan County (just decided) 60 Wash. 309, 111 Pac. 226, wherein we held that no emergency existed which would warrant the board of county commissioners in letting a contract without inviting open competition. The provision of the law there construed (Laws 1903, p. 226, § 15) is that all work shall be let to the lowest bidder, 'except in case of emergency'; but no authority is given the board of county commissioners to declare the emergency as a matter of legislative discretion, thus leaving the court free to inquire into the facts."

[4] In the light of these fundamental principles we come to the immediate question: Does the charter of San Francisco in terms or by necessary implication make the determination of the supervisors as to the existence of a great emergency or necessity conclusive? Manifestly it does not. The language of the charter is not that the dollar limit may be suspended upon the declaration of the supervisors that a great emergency or necessity exists. It is that this limit may be suspended "in case of [the existence of] any great necessity or emergency." Moreover, and as persuasive to this view, even were it not so plain as it appears, is the added fact that the supervisors are required to spread upon the journal "the character of such necessity or emergency." If their determination was to be conclusive, this recital in their journal would be meaningless. It can have significance and value only in contemplation that the determination of the board is subject to review. It is therefore concluded that the complaint in this regard states a cause of action, and the general demurrer to it was improperly sustained.

[5] (c) Appellant analyzes and tabulates the tax levy as follows:

Paving and grading streets is included with other purposes for which, in all, $1,112,000 was to be raised by a levy of....................	22 cents
Purchasing lands for fire department purposes was included with other purposes for which in all, $127,500 was to be raised by a levy of....	2½ cents
Purchasing lands for police department purposes was included with other purposes for which, in all, the sum of $102,000 was to be raised by a levy of.............	2 cents
Making a total of $1,351,500, which was to be raised by a levy of....	26½ cents

Appellant contends: First, that some of the purposes are clearly not emergency or necessity purposes; and that they are so commingled and intermingled in the levy with other purposes, which may conceivably be emergency or necessity purposes, as to render invalid the tabulated 26½ cents of the 29 cents levy. This question, however, calls for first consideration by the trial court.

[6] We need here go no further than to say that by the use of the adjective "great" the charter plainly means a necessity or emergency of grave character and serious moment. Webster's International Dictionary defines "emergency" as:

"An unforeseen occurrence or combination of circumstances which calls for an immediate action or remedy; pressing necessity; exigency."

This definition is approved in People v. Lee Wah, 71 Cal. 80, 11 Pac. 851. It is the meaning of the word that obtains in the mind of the lawyer as well as in the mind of the layman. In was not in contemplation that the supervisors could foster and nurse such an emergency so as to spread their taxing power over an undetermined number of years. As little was it designed that under the head of emergency or necessity should be imposed taxes not bearing forcefully and directly on the relief, cure, or prevention of this emergency or necessity. Recalling once more to mind the fact that the exercising of the taxing power, for the reasons already given, is subject to strict construction, the trial court will scrutinize the items presented: First, to determine whether or not the great emergency or necessity, within the meaning of the charter, existed at the time of the levy; and second, whether, if it be found that such emergency or necessity did, in fact, exist, any of the items in the levy do not fairly come within the purport and scope of such emergency levy.

[7] And, finally, it must be said that no argument of hardship or inconvenience will justify a court in setting at naught the written terms of a city's charter, even at the instance of the city's officials. As was said by this court in Connelly v. City of San Francisco, 164 Cal. 101, 127 Pac. 834:

"An inconvenience to the city does not justify the despoiling of its tax payers."

If these large revenues sought to be raised by the city do not fairly come within the purview of an emergency tax measure, it is for the city to meet the desired end either by the issuance of bonds or by an amendment to its charter. It is not for the courts themselves to amend this charter by striking therefrom any of its salutary and protective provisions.

The judgment appealed from is therefore reversed, with directions to overrule the demurrer and permit defendant to plead.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. P. Wood, Judge.

Action by Harry H. Moody and wife against the Southern Pacific Company. From a judgment of dismissal, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Crouch & Crouch, of Los Angeles, for appellants. J. W. McKinley, of Los Angeles (W. R. Millar, and A. W. Ashburn, both of Los Angeles, of counsel), for respondent.

SHAW, J. This case was transferred to the District Court of Appeal, and therein, upon an opinion by Mr. Justice James, the judgment was reversed. Thereupon this court vacated that decision and tranferred the cause to the Supreme Court. Upon further consideration we are satisfied with the reasoning and conclusion of the learned justice of the District Court and adopt his opinion as the opinion of this court. It is as follows:

This action was brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been suffered by the plaintiff Claire Moody through the negligence of defendant corporation in the management of a train upon which the said plaintiff was a passenger. The negligent acts were alleged to have been committed on the 22d day of May, 1907, and the complaint in the action was filed on January 2, 1912. Defendant interposed a demurrer to plaintiffs' complaint, setting up, first, the general ground that sufficient facts were not stated to constitute a cause of action, and the further ground that the alleged cause of action was barred by the provisions of sections 337, 338, 339, and 340 of the Code of Civil Procedure. This demurrer was sustained by the court, and, no amended complaint being filed within the time allowed, judgment of dismissal was entered, from which judgment this appeal is taken.

Harry H. Moody, the coplaintiff of Claire Moody, was the husband of the latter, and the preliminary portion of the complaint contained the following allegation: "That, during all times herein mentioned, plaintiffs, Harry H. Moody and Claire Moody, were, and still are, husband and wife; and during all times mentioned, and ever since said times, plaintiffs have lived together." The complaint sufficiently stated a cause of action, as is admitted by counsel for respondents; the respondents' sole contention being that the judgment of the court was correct because the statute of limitations had interposed to bar a right of recovery. Appellants answer this contention with the argument that the husband was a necessary party to this action, and that, such being the case, plaintiff Claire Moody, as a married woman, was entitled to the benefit of the provisions of subdivision 4 of section 352 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The section referred to, in that part which is material to a consideration of this question, reads as follows: "If a person entitled to bring an action, mentioned in chapter three of this title, be, at the time the cause of action accrued: * * * (4) A married woman, and her husband be a necessary party with her in commencing such action, the time of such disability is not a part of the time limited for the commencement of the action."

Under the common law, where, upon marriage, the legal rights of a woman were suspended, the statute of limitations for her protection was also suspended and not allowed to run against any cause of action which might have been enforced by her except for the disability of marriage. In more modern times, the wife having been freed from many of the common-law disabilities arising from her marriage, the Legislatures have to a corresponding extent provided that the statute of limitations may be made to run against her. Wood on Limitations, § 240.

[1] In this state, in so far as a married woman is entitled to bring an action without joining her husband, all limitations as to the time of commencement of such action may be urged against her suit. Where, however, the husband is a necessary party with her, she is deemed to be under disability as to the commencement of the action and the limitation of time cannot be urged.

[2] It has been settled by our Supreme Court that, in an action brought for damages by reason of personal injuries caused to the wife, the husband is a necessary party, as is also the wife. McKune v. Santa Clara V. M. & L. Co., 110 Cal. 480, 42 Pac. 980, and cases therein cited.

[3] In the decision in that case it is pointed out that while the husband may have a separate action which he is entitled to maintain in his own name for damages which are caused to him by reason of his wife's injuries, such as the loss of her service and medical and other expenses incurred, for those damages which are purely personal to the wife, such as her pain and suffering, etc., the wife is a necessary party.

[4] These two causes of action, it is also held, cannot be joined and must be made the subject of separate suits. Counsel for respondents cite the cases of Martin v. Southern Pacific Co., 130 Cal. 285, 62 Pac. 515, and Basler v. Sacramento Gas & Electric Co., 158 Cal. 514, 111 Pac. 530, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 642, and contend that the conclusions expressed in these decisions on the point here urged are at variance with the holding in the McKune Case, supra. A close examination of the decisions cited will show that they contain no statement of the law contrary to the expressions occurring in the McKune Case.

The order sustaining the demurrer to plaintiffs' complaint, under the statute and authorities cited, seems to have been improperly made.

The rehearing was granted chiefly for the purpose of again considering the previous decisions of this court upon the subject.

[5] In this state all property acquired by a husband or wife during marriage, and while they are living together, is community property, except that which is acquired by gift, devise, or descent. At common law, property acquired by either spouse during marriage, otherwise than by gift, devise, or descent to the wife, was the separate property of the husband.

Although at common law the cause of action for the wife's suffering was the separate property of the husband, it was settled that the wife was a necessary party to the suit; the reasoning being, as the authorities express it, that she was the "meritorious cause of action," and that, in case of his death pending the suit, the cause of action would survive to her. 10 Ency. Pl. & Pr. 205; Schouler on Husband and Wife, § 142. It did not descend to her, as does the community property in this state; it remained to her as the survivor and she could continue the prosecution of the action in her own name after his death. Id. The early decisions in this state declared that the wife was a necessary party to the action. Sheldon v. S. S. Uncle Sam, 18 Cal. 526, 79 Am. Dec. 193; Matthew v. C. P. R. R., 63 Cal. 450; Tell v. Gibson, 66 Cal. 247, 5 Pac. 223. These decisions were based on the decisions at common law, but did not mention the fact that the right of action in this state was community property. In McFadden v. Santa Ana, etc., Co., 87 Cal. 464, 25 Pac. 681, 11 L. R. A. 252, the question arose whether the contributory negligence of the husband would bar a recovery in such an action. It was for the first time held that the right of action was community property, inuring directly to the benefit of the husband, and that, as he could not be allowed to benefit from his own wrong, his contributory negligence would defeat the action. Ever since this decision the courts have held it to be community property, but, following the common-law rule, they have also uniformly declared that the wife is a necessary party to an action for its recovery. Neale v. Depot Ry. Co., 94 Cal. 429, 29 Pac. 954; McKune v. Santa Clara, etc., Co., supra; Paine v. San Bernardino, etc., Co., 143 Cal. 658, 77 Pac. 659; Gomez v. Scanlan, 155 Cal. 530, 102 Pac. 12; Gomez v. Scanlan, 2 Cal. App. 579, 84 Pac. 50; Justis v. Atchison, etc., Co., 12 Cal. App. 642, 108 Pac. 328. In Lamb v. Harbaugh, 105 Cal. 691, 39 Pac. 56, and Williams v. Casebeer, 126 Cal. 82, 58 Pac. 376, the court decided that the wife could not sue alone for such injuries.

We are now asked to overrule these decisions. The argument is that the right of action is community property, of which the husband has sole control and power of disposition; that even the title thereto is vested in him so that upon his death the title goes to the wife by descent and not by survivorship (Civ. Code, § 1402); that there is no ground for any distinction between this right and other community property; and that consequently an action upon it should be governed by the Code rule that "every action must be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest" (Code Civ. Proc. § 367), whereupon it would follow that the husband is the only proper party plaintiff in such an action. The reasoning is forceful, but the rule has been followed so long and so often that it should be considered settled. The proposition that, although the right of action is community property, yet the wife is a necessary party in this particular class of cases is no more illogical than the rule at common law that the wife must join, though the right was the separate property of the husband. The reasons for the decisions under the common law are applicable to the case where the right is community property, as fully and completely as to the case where it is the husband's separate property. The remedy for any hardships or anomalies resulting from this long-settled rule rests with the Legislature.

[7] It may be remarked that it has acted in the matter by the amendment of 1913 (St. 1913, p. 217) to section 370, Code of Civil Procedure, whereby the wife may sue alone in such actions. This amendment was enacted after this action was begun, and it does not affect this case.

The judgment is reversed.

QUIETING TITLE (§ 54*) — COSTS — STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1022, providing that costs are allowed of course to plaintiff on a judgment in his favor in an action for the recovery of real property, and section 1024, providing that costs must be allowed to defendant on a judgment in his favor in a similar action, a judgment in a suit to quiet title, which adjudges that plaintiff is the owner in fee simple and entitled to the possession of a part of the land in controversy, and that defendant is the owner in fee simple entitled to the possession of the remainder, carries costs in favor of both parties as a matter of right.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Cruz County; Lucas F. Smith, Judge.

Action by the F. A. Hihn Company against the City of Santa Cruz and another. From an order striking out plaintiff's bill of costs, but refusing to strike out defendants' bill of costs, plaintiff appeals. Reversed in part.

Charles B. Younger, of Santa Cruz, for appellant. Netherton & Torchiana, of Santa Cruz, for respondents.

LENNON, P. J. This is an appeal from the order of the lower court whereby the defendants' motion to strike out plaintiff's bill of costs was granted, and the plaintiff's motion to strike out the defendants' bill of costs was denied. The action out of which the claimed costs arose was one to quiet plaintiff's title to certain land in the city of Santa Cruz. The motion to strike out plaintiff's bill of costs was made and granted solely upon the ground:

> "That the plaintiff did not recover judgment in said action, and that the defendants recovered judgment in said action for all of the land to which said defendants or either of them claim any right or title."

Each of the defendants by appropriate denials in their respective answers put in issue the plaintiff's ownership of all or any portion of the land described in the complaint. Upon the issue thus raised, the case was tried by the court, and resulted in a judgment favorable in part to both the plaintiff and the defendants; that is to say, the trial court found and adjudged that the plaintiff was the owner in fee simple and entitled to the possession of a specified portion of the land in controversy, and that the defendant city of Santa Cruz was the owner in fee simple, entitled to and in the possession of the remainder of such land. In addition the trial court found and adjudged that the defendant Union Traction Company was the owner of and in the possession of a certain right of way along and upon that portion of the land in controversy adjudged to be the property of the defendant city of Santa Cruz. The judgment carried an award of costs to each defendant, but none to the plaintiff.

The motion to strike out plaintiff's bill of costs should have been denied. The action, as stated, was one to quiet title to real property, and the judgment, to the extent that it affirmed plaintiff's title to a portion of the land in controversy, was favorable to the plaintiff. Therefore the plaintiff as well as the defendants was entitled to costs as a matter of right. Code Civ. Proc. 1022, 1024; Schmidt v. Klotz, 130 Cal. 223, 62 Pac. 470; Sierra Union v. Wolff, 144 Cal. 430, 77 Pac. 1038; Hoyt v. Hart, 149 Cal. 722, 87 Pac. 569.

The order appealed from, in so far as it purports to strike out the plaintiff's bill of costs, is reversed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; H. Z. Austin, Judge.

Action by the Morton Gas Engine Company against the California Seeded Raisin Company, in which defendant filed a petition to set aside certain execution sales. From an order sustaining plaintiff's demurrer to the petition, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

L. L. Cory, of Fresno, for appellant. F. C. Huebner, of Albia, Iowa, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from an order sustaining respondent's demurrer to a petition of the appellants for an order setting aside certain sales of personal property under several executions.

The facts as disclosed by the petition are briefly these: In March, 1910, the Morton Gas Engine Company commenced this action against the California Seeded Raisin Company, a corporation, to recover a debt amounting to $384.25. The summons was regularly issued and served upon Newton B. Converse, the president of the defendant corporation. It is averred that Converse was acting in collusion with the plaintiff in respect to said action, in pursuance of which he not only permitted a judgment by default to be entered against the defendant, but also concealed the fact of the institution and pendency of the action from the knowledge of his fellow officials until some time after the entry of such judgment. It is further averred that an execution was issued upon such judgment, and levied upon certain specific personal property of the defendant, which was of the alleged value of $1,200, and which property was thereafter sold under such execution to the plaintiff for the sum of $100, who immediately transferred the same to said Converse for a like sum; that said Converse also purchased from the plaintiff the deficiency judgment, and proceeded to have two other executions successively issued thereon and levied upon other personal property of the appellant, which property was also sold at successive execution sales, and bought in either by said Converse or by some person acting for him, at sums very much below the real value of the property. It is averred that Converse acted fraudulently throughout these several proceedings, and that they are therefore void, and that he and his successors in the apparent ownership of these several pieces of personal property hold the same as trustees for appellant.

The prayer of the petition is that all of the acts and things done by said Converse in the course of these proceedings be held to be fraudulent and void, and that said sales and each of them be set aside, and that the petitioner have general relief.

To this petition filed in the original action, and being in effect a motion to quash these executions and set aside the sales thereunder, a demurrer was presented, and, after hearing, sustained by the trial court; and, from the order sustaining such demurrer, this appeal has been taken.

[1] The first question raised upon the appeal is whether the judgment alleged to have been procured through the collusion of Converse, the president of the defendant corporation, can be assailed in this form of proceeding. It is not contended that the judgment is other than a voidable judgment, and it affirmatively appears from the petition that the other officials of the corporation became apprised of its existence, and of the facts which would have entitled them to have sought relief from it in some proper proceeding, within a short time after its entry. The rule would seem to be well settled that, upon a motion to set aside an execution, the voidable judgment upon which the execution has been issued cannot be assailed; and this for the reason that the law has provided a number of specific and appropriate remedies against voidable judgments of which this is not one, and has also provided that the grounds upon which executions issued upon voidable judgments and sales thereunder may be attacked are those infirmities which arise after the judgment and out of the issuance of the writ and its attempted enforcement. Freeman on Executions (3d Ed.) §§ 305–309.

[2] The judgment being thus beyond assault in this proceeding, we turn to the petition to see on what grounds the executions issued upon it were assailed. The petitioner makes no specific attack upon the regularity in form of the several writs, but avers generally and upon information and belief that the sales made thereunder "were not made or held pursuant to any of the provisions of section 694 of the Code of Civil Procedure."

[3] This must be held to be a mere conclusion of the pleader, and hence an insufficient averment to put in issue any specific infirmity in the writ itself, or in the procedure attending its execution and the sales thereunder. The only specific charge which the pleader makes is to be found in averments showing that Newton B. Converse, either directly or indirectly, became the purchaser of the several items of personal property in question at such execution sales, and for sums much below the real value of such property; but, since the regularity of these sales has not been sufficiently attacked, we can see no reason in law why Newton B. Converse, even though he was president of the defendant corporation, could not be a bidder for and a purchaser of its property at such regularly conducted sales, however far the sum bid might be below the real value of the property. What relation of trust such a purchaser would occupy toward the defendant corporation in respect to the property so purchased is another question; but it would seem to require no citation of authorities to sustain a holding that this latter question is one which cannot be presented upon a motion to set aside executions and sales not otherwise shown to be irregular, but only in an appropriate proceeding in equity to establish and enforce the trust.

The order is affirmed.

Ex parte PARRA. (Cr. 258.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 14, 1914. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court June 13, 1914.)

1. FISH (§ 8*)—POWER TO PROTECT AND REGULATE—STATUTE—CONSTITUTIONALITY.

Under Const. art. 4, § 25½, giving to the Legislature power to enact laws "for the protection of fish and game," the Legislature could enact Act March 13, 1909 (St. 1909, p. 302), and Act March 16, 1913 (St. 1913, p. 985), imposing a license fee of $10 per annum for the privilege of fishing in the waters of the state; such license fee being reasonable.

2. FISH (§ 9*)—POWER TO PROTECT AND REGULATE—STATUTE—CONSTITUTIONALITY.

Acts March 13, 1909 (St. 1909, p. 302), and Act March 16, 1913 (St. 1913, p. 985), imposing a license fee of $10 per annum for the privilege of fishing in the waters of the state, is not repugnant to Const. art. 1, § 25, declaring that the people shall have the right to fish upon public lands and in the waters thereof, and prohibiting the transfer of such land by the state without a reservation of such right, and also any law to be passed making it a crime for the people to so fish, etc.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fish, Cent. Dig. §§ 17, 18; Dec. Dig. § 9.*]

Petition by A. Parra for a writ of habeas corpus. Writ denied.

John R. Cronin, of Benicia, for petitioner. R. D. Duke, of San Francisco, and Malcolm C. Glenn, of Sacramento, for respondents.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Petitioner was arrested on March 14, 1914, in Solano county, for engaging in the vocation of fishing for profit in the public waters of this state, to wit, in the straits of Carquinez, in said county, without having first obtained a license therefor as required by the act of the Legislature approved March 13, 1909 (Stats. 1909, p. 302), and the act approved March 16, 1913 (Stats. 1913, p. 985), being an act amendatory of section 3 of the said act of March 13, 1909, "by spreading out in said waters and placing therein a certain net known as a salmon net for the purpose of taking and catching salmon from the said waters."

The sufficiency of the complaint, or warrant of arrest, is not disputed. The claim of petitioner is:

> "That he has the right to engage in the vocation of fishing for profit (or for pleasure) without the payment of any license therefor, and that this right is secured to him by virtue of the provisions of section 25, art. 1, of the Constitution of the state."

This section was adopted in 1910, and reads as follows:

> "The people shall have the right to fish upon and from the public lands of the state and in the waters thereof, excepting upon lands set aside for fish hatcheries, and no land owned by the state shall ever be sold or transferred without reserving to the people the absolute right to fish thereupon; and no law shall ever be passed making it a crime for the people to enter upon the public lands within this state for the purpose of fishing in any water containing fish that have been planted therein by the state; provided, that the Legislature may by statute, provide for the season when and the conditions under which the different species of fish may be taken."

This section must be read in connection with section 25½, art. 4, adopted in 1902; for the two sections do not in any wise conflict with each other. This section reads:

> "The Legislature may provide for the division of the state into fish and game districts, and may enact such laws for the protection of fish and game therein as it may deem appropriate to the respective districts."

The act of 1909 is entitled:

> "An act to regulate the vocation of fishing, and to provide therefrom revenue for the propagation, restoration and preservation of fish in the waters of the state of California."

Section 3 provides for the issuance of licenses for the privilege of fishing and the amount to be paid for each year. The act of 1913 is amendatory of section 3 of the act of 1909, and fixes the license fee at $10 per annum.

Petitioner's contention is that, by the adoption of the constitutional amendment of 1910, now section 25, art. 1, the act of 1909 relating to license fees for fishermen became null and void, and of necessity the like fate befell the amendment of section 3 of the amendatory act of 1913. We quote from petitioner's brief so much as fairly states his position, preserving his italics:

> "It is contended by and on behalf of petitioner that with the adoption of the constitutional amendment in 1910, now section 25 of article 1 of our state Constitution, that the act of 1909 relating to license fees for fishermen became null and void, and that, of necessity, the act of 1913, amendatory of section 3 of the act of 1909, is null and void, as being in direct conflict with the provisions of section 25, art. 1 of our state Constitution. The only portion of that part of our state Constitution which gives to the Legislature any power in the matter of regulating the business or pleasure of fishing is contained in the proviso 'that the Legislature may by statute, provide for the season when and the conditions under which the different species of fish may be taken.' There is no question here as to the right of the Legislature to provide for the 'season,' as that is quite clear. Then the entire question hinges on what was meant by the words 'and the conditions under which the different species of fish may be taken.' The word 'conditions' is qualified by the words that follow it, 'under which the different species of fish may be taken,' which, it is contended, clearly refer to such physical conditions connected with the taking of the fish, such as the size of the net, the size of the fish, the prevention of the use of explosives, and other kindred conditions under which the different species of fish may be taken. Without this proviso, the Legislature would be inhibited from making any regulation save and except the question of the length of the season. To give to the proviso, as used in and in connection with the whole of section 25, the construction that thereby the Legislature might impose a license fee (which might be prohibitive in its nature and which is even now prohibitive to some) would tend to frustrate and nullify the express declaration contained in that part of our state Constitution which says that 'no law shall ever be passed making it a crime for the people to enter upon the public lands within this state for the purpose of fishing in any water containing fish that have been planted therein by the state.' "

[1] By section 25½, art. 4, power is given to the Legislature to "enact * * * laws for the protection of fish and game * * * as it may deem appropriate for the respective districts" into which the state may be divided; and by section 25, art. 1, "the Legislature may by statute, provide for the season when and the conditions under which the different species of fish may be taken." If, as is contended, the clause last quoted refers only "to such physical conditions connected with the taking of the fish, such as the size of the net, the size of the fish, the prevention of the use of explosives, and other kindred conditions under which the different species of fish may be taken," we yet have section 25½, art. 4, which gives the power to the Legislature to enact such laws as it may deem appropriate "for the protection of fish and game" in the state. We need not therefore concern ourselves particularly as to what was intended by the later provision if the imposition of a license to fish for profit can be upheld as "appropriate" for the "protection of fish." We venture to say, however, that the principal object of section 25, article 1, was to preserve to the people the right to fish upon the public lands of the state and to require that grants of land by the state should not be made "without reserving to the people the absolute right to fish thereupon."

[2] The question of the power of the state to control or regulate the taking of fish and game and their preservation for the benefit of the people at large has been the subject of many decisions, to only a few of which need we advert.

> "So far as we are aware, it has never been judicially denied that the government, under its police powers, may make regulations for the preservation of game and fish, restricting their taking and molestation to certain seasons of the year, although laws to this effect, it is believed, have been in force in many of the older states since the organization of the federal government. * * * The ownership being in the people of the state, the repository of the sovereign authority, and no individual having any property rights to be affected, it necessarily results that the Legislature, as the representative of the people of the state, may withhold or grant to individuals the right to hunt and kill game or qualify or restrict, as, in the opinions of its members, will best subserve the public welfare. Stated in other language, to hunt and kill game is a boon or privilege, granted either expressly or impliedly by the sovereign authority, not a right inherent in each individual, and consequently nothing is taken away from the individual when he is denied the privilege at stated seasons of hunting and killing game. It is perhaps accurate to say that the ownership of the sovereign authority is in trust for all the people of the state, and hence by implication it is the duty of the Legislature to enact such laws as will best preserve the subject of the trust and secure its beneficial use in the future to the people of the state. But, in any view, the question of the individual enjoyment is one of public policy and not of private right."

It was held, in State v. Hume, 52 Or. 1, 6, 95 Pac. 808, 810, that migratory fish in the navigable waters of a state, like game within its borders, are classed as animals, feræ naturæ, the title to which, so far as title can be asserted before possession, is in the state in trust for all its citizens, and that the Legislature may enact such laws as tend to protect the species from injury by human means and from extinction by exhaustive methods of capture. In Smith v. State, 155 Ind. 611, 613, 58 N. E. 1044, 1045, 51 L. R. A. 404, 406, it was said:

> "The individual has no natural right to take game, or to acquire property in it, and all the right he possesses or can possess in this respect is granted him by the state."

In State v. Hume it was further said:

> "The unrestricted taking from navigable streams, of fish that are valuable for food usually causes their extermination, to prevent which, and to afford time and opportunity for > an increase of the species, laws have been passed limiting the time and manner, or temporarily prohibiting, the catching of them, which enactments have been upheld as legitimate exercise of the police power employed by a state to protect the welfare of all its citizens."

Similar views were expressed in Sherwood v. Stephens, 13 Idaho, 399, 90 Pac. 345. In Morgan v. Commonwealth, 98 Va. 812, 814, 35 S. E. 448, 449, a license tax for the privilege of fishing in the waters belonging to the state was upheld, as not in violation of the state or national Constitution.

"If," said the court, "the state has a right to require a license tax of merchants and others engaging in business upon their own capital, it certainly has the right to require a license tax of those * * * carrying on their business, as do the fishermen mentioned in the statute."

In State v. Hanlon, 77 Ohio St. 19, 29, 82 N. E. 663, 664, it was said:

> "In the present case the section under review is one of the sections of an act entitled 'An act for the further and better protection of fish and game.' If the true purpose and object of this act is expressed in its title, as would seem apparent from a consideration of the other provisions of said section, one of which is, 'All fees required to be paid hereunder shall be paid to the president of the commissioners of fish and game, and by him paid into the state treasury to the credit of a fund, which is hereby appropriated, for the purpose of propagating, protecting and preserving the fish in the waters of Lake Erie,' then certainly the imposition, for such purpose, of a license fee upon all persons who engage in the business of fishing with nets in the waters of Lake Erie is a proper exercise of legislative power."

Of the police power, Freund on Police Power, p. 19, says:

> "The police power is the power to restrain common rights of liberty to property. When it is sought to exercise rights which are not common or fundamental, still more when special privileges are asked, the state may grant the required permit or license upon such conditions as it pleases, without observing the limitations which otherwise hedge about the exercise of the police power."

The restrictions upon the right to fish and pursue game are given among other "conspicuous illustrations" of the exercise of power respecting cases of qualified property.

That the imposition of a license tax of $10 per annum for the privilege of fishing in the waters of the state for profit is a reasonable tax we are satisfied. The food fishes caught in those waters have an annual value running into millions of dollars, and furnish the means of livelihood to thousands of our citizens. Large sums are expended annually by the state to maintain the propagation of our food fishes and to prevent the decrease of the supply. It is but fair that those who profit by these laudable and paternal efforts of the state should contribute something towards their cost, and this license tax is, from the nature of the business, the only tax which can be imposed to aid in the protection of this important industry.

We think also that the imposition of this license has a tendency to protect the fish and prevent their extermination, and the Constitution expressly authorizes the Legislature to "enact laws for the protection of fish." Section 25½, art. 4.

The writ is denied.

APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 622*)—RECORD—TRANSCRIPT—TIME OF FILING.

Under Court Rule 2 (119 Pac. ix), providing that where a party appealing from a judgment had given notice of motion for new trial before perfecting the appeal the time within which he shall file a bill of exceptions or statement shall not begin to run until the motion has been decided or the proceeding therefor dismissed, the time for filing a transcript does not begin to run until denial of motion for new trial made prior to the perfecting of an appeal, and the mere fact of a delay of about 15 months in disposing of the motion does not justify the dismissal of the appeal for failure to file any transcript prior thereto, in the absence of any showing that the appeal was not made in good faith.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. P. Wood, Judge.

Action by R. M. Baker against the Eilers Music Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Motion to dismiss appeal denied.

L. M. Fall, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Frank Bryant, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. The only grounds presented which require discussion in ruling upon this motion to dismiss the appeal of plaintiff from the judgment are that the appellant has failed to file any transcript within the time allowed by law, and has failed for 15 months to prosecute the appeal. The judgment was entered on October 18, 1912, and notice of appeal was filed in the office of the clerk of the superior court on December 16, 1912. At all times from November 2, 1912, until March 5, 1914, there was pending a motion for a new trial of the action, and, incidental thereto, the settlement of a proposed bill of exceptions. On March 5, 1914, the court below disallowed the bill of exceptions and denied the motion for a new trial.

Rule 2 (119 Pac. ix) of this court, after stating the general rule requiring that a transcript be served and filed by the appellant in a civil action within 40 days after the appeal is perfected, says:

> "If a proceeding is pending for the settlement of a bill of exceptions or statement which may be used in support of such appeal, the time aforesaid shall not begin to run until the settled and authenticated statement or a bill of exceptions has been filed. When a party appealing from a judgment has given notice of motion for a new trial before perfecting said appeal, the time aforesaid shall not begin to run until the motion for a new trial has been decided, or the proceeding therefor dismissed."

We need not take into consideration the reasons for the delay which occurred in the court below in the proceedings relating to the motion for a new trial. The respondent has not shown by the record any facts establishing its claim that the appeal is not made in good faith, and we are deciding this matter without reference to the affidavit filed by appellant's attorney. According to the plain language of the rule, as applied to the facts shown in the clerk's certificate filed herein, the time for filing the transcript did not begin to run until March 5, 1914. We have examined the decisions referred to by respondent, which relate to motions to dismiss appeals on account of failure to file transcript, where it appeared that the appellant did not take steps within a reasonable time to secure the settlement of a bill of exceptions. In those cases there was not pending any motion for a new trial, and the facts showing an unreasonable delay or practical abandonment of the proceedings for settlement of bill of exceptions were clearly apparent on the record. The cases referred to are: Depeaux v. Peck, 118 Cal. 522, 50 Pac. 682; Moultrie v. Tarpio, 147 Cal. 376, 81 Pac. 1112.

The motion to dismiss the appeal is denied.

HOOD v. MELROSE, City Recorder. (Civ. 1498.)

1. Municipal Corporations (§ 601*)—Buildings — Regulation — Construction — Ordinance.

A city ordinance provided for the appointment of a building inspector who was authorized to issue permits for the construction, repair, and removal of buildings, section 2 making it unlawful for any person to erect, alter, or remove any such structure or building exceeding $20 in cost without a permit. Section 19 declared that it should be unlawful for any person within the city, except on a written permit granted by the board, and then only at the place specified in such permit, to erect any tent, tenthouse, cloth or shake house, etc. Held, that section 19 prohibited the erection or removal of a shake house without a permit obtained from a board of trustees without reference to the cost of the structure.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 1333; Dec. Dig. § 601.*]

2. Criminal Law (§ 1032*)—Review—Certiorari—Scope—Objections Below—Necessity.

Where no demurrer was interposed to a complaint on the ground that it charged the offense in the disjunctive, such objection could not be taken advantage of by certiorari.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 2627, 2628, 2642; Dec. Dig. § 1032.*]

3. Municipal Corporations (§ 112*)—Ordinances—Title.

An objection that a city ordinance was unconstitutional, in that more than one purpose was expressed in the title, was unsustainable, where a dual purpose expressed in the title of an ordinance contravened no provision of the city's charter.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 258–262; Dec. Dig. § 112.*]

4. Municipal Corporations (§ 112*)—City Ordinances—Subjects.

A constitutional provision that acts of the Legislature shall embrace but one subject does not apply to city ordinances.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 258–262; Dec. Dig. § 112.*]

5. Municipal Corporations (§ 601*)—City Ordinances—Building Ordinance—Reasonableness.

In the absence of an attack on the reasonableness of a city building ordinance prohibiting certain erections without a permit of the board of trustees, a contention that the ordinance enabled the board to prevent altogether the erection of such structures by refusing to grant all permits therefor was unsustainable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 1333; Dec. Dig. § 601.*]

6. Criminal Law (§ 1014*) — Certiorari — Scope of Remedy—Appeal.

Where petitioner was proceeded against in a recorder's court and convicted of violating a city ordinance and appealed to the superior court, as he was authorized to do, where the judgment was affirmed, he had the plain and adequate remedy of appeal, and hence was not entitled to a further review of the proceedings in the District Court of Appeal by certiorari under Code Civ. Proc. § 1068, providing that a writ of review may be granted only when a tribunal, board, or officer, exercising judicial functions, has exceeded its jurisdiction and there is no appeal or other plain, speedy, and adequate remedy, and this though the superior court is not the court of last resort.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 25, 71; Dec. Dig. § 1014.*]

Application for writ of review by William O. Hood against George C. Melrose, Recorder of the City of Tropico. Writ dismissed.

Frederick M. Hall, of Casa Verdugo, and Frank L. Muhleman and Wirt C. Smith, both of Los Angeles, for petitioner. Frederick Baker, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. In response to a writ of certiorari issued by this court and directed to respondent as recorder of the city of Tropico, the proceedings had and taken in the recorder's court presided over by respondent in a certain action, wherein petitioner was convicted of the violation of a city ordinance, have been transmitted to this court for review.

The city of Tropico is a municipal corporation of the sixth class, empowered, among other things:

> (1) "To pass ordinances not in conflict with the constitution and laws of this state, or of the United States." (16) "To establish and maintain fire limits and regulate building and construction and removal of buildings within the municipality."

Pursuant to such power the board of trustees adopted an ordinance prescribing certain rules and regulations for control in the construction and removal of buildings, and fixing a penalty for the violation thereof. This ordinance provided for the appointment of a building inspector, who was authorized to issue permits for the construction, repair, and removal of buildings, upon the applicant therefor complying with the rules and regulations prescribed by the ordinance; and by section 2 thereof declared it unlawful for any person to commence or proceed with the erection, alteration, removal, etc., of any such structure or building exceeding twenty dollars in cost, unless a permit so to do be first obtained from said building inspector. Section 19 of the ordinance further provided:

> "It is hereby declared to be unlawful for any person, firm or corporation, within the limits of the city of Tropico, except upon a written permit granted by the board of trustees of the city of Tropico, and then only at the place specified in such permit, to build, construct or erect any tent, tenthouse, cloth or shake house, cloth or shake building or structure, or California house, or repair the same or to construct any addition thereto, or to remove any such tent, tenthouse, cloth or shake house, building or other structure, to any location in said city of Tropico, or to cloth or paper, in whole or in part, any room except such room be first ceiled with board and such cloth be tightly stretched thereon; or to construct or extend through the walls, windows or roofs of any building or structure, a stovepipe or tiling, for use as a chimney or flue."

On July 21, 1913, a complaint was filed in the recorder's court charging petitioner with the violation of said ordinance in that he did "move and construct, or attempt to move and construct, a building, to wit, a shake house upon lot No. 1, tract 2137, corner of Glendale avenue and Moore avenue, in violation of the said ordinance No. 44, of the said city of Tropico, without first procuring a permit from the said city of Tropico to move and construct said building." Upon trial, petitioner was convicted and adjudged to pay a fine, or, in default thereof, suffer imprisonment in jail. On appeal to the superior court, and prior to the issuance of this writ, the judgment was affirmed.

[1-5] Petitioner attacks the proceedings upon several grounds: First. He insists the complaint fails to charge a public offense in that it is not alleged that the cost of the removal or construction exceeded the sum of $20, in which case only, as provided by section 2 of the ordinance, was a permit required. The offense charged, however, is the construction of a "shake house," a permit for the erection of which the building inspector had no power to issue. Since section 19 of the ordinance prohibits the erection or removal of such structures, without regard to the value thereof, unless a permit be obtained from the board of trustees, the complaint charged an offense under the provisions of section 19. Second. Petitioner attacks the sufficiency of the complaint by reason of the fact that it is uncertain in that it charges the offense in the disjunctive. Conceding this to be true, no demurrer was interposed upon such ground, which defect in no event is available in this proceeding. Ex parte Jackson, 143 Cal. 564, 77 Pac. 457. Third. Finally, petitioner insists the ordinance is unconstitutional in that more than one purpose is expressed in its title. A dual purpose expressed in the title of the ordinance contravenes no charter provision, and "the constitutional provision that acts of the Legislature shall embrace but one subject has no application to municipal ordinances." Ex parte Haskell, 112 Cal. 412, 44 Pac. 725, 32 L. R. A. 527. Nor, in the absence of an attack upon the reasonableness of the ordinance as affecting petitioner, is there any merit in the contention that it enables the board of trustees to prevent altogether the erection of the structures specified in said section 19, by refusing to grant permits therefor. That it might do so admits of no doubt. In re Newell, 2 Cal. App. 767, 84 Pac. 226.

It is also urged that since such structures may be erected only in case a permit therefor be obtained from the board, which in the exercise of its discretion it may, unguided by any fixed rule, grant or refuse, the ordinance empowers the board to act arbitrarily, favor one individual as against another, and without cause refuse to grant such permit. The charter in express terms empowers the board of trustees "to regulate building and construction and the removal of buildings within the municipality"; and "it is a well-recognized rule of statutory construction that a general grant of power, unaccompanied by specific directions as to the manner in which the power is to be exercised, implies the right and duty to adopt and employ such means and methods as may be reasonably necessary to a proper exercise of the power." Laurelle v. Bush, 17 Cal. App. 409, 119 Pac. 953, and authorities cited. In the case of Ex parte Fiske, 72 Cal. 125, 13 Pac. 310, the court upheld the validity of an ordinance which prohibited the repair of wooden buildings within the fire limits, unless permission so to do was obtained from the fire wardens, and in discussing the question the court said:

> "It is clear, however, that a literal compliance with a regulation prohibiting the repairing of a wooden building might work, in some instances, useless hardships. The repair of a leaking roof or broken window would be necessary to the comfort and health of a family, without enhancing the danger which the framers of the ordinance sought to provide against; and repairs of a more extensive character might be made to particular houses, standing in particular localities, without increasing the fire risks. And it is equally clear that no general rule could be established beforehand that would meet the emergencies of individual cases."

This language is particularly applicable to the case at bar. For the purpose of effectually carrying out the powers conferred, the board could prohibit altogether the erection of tent and shake houses which, by reason of their inflammable character, might enhance the danger of fires. Instances, however, might arise where, by reason of location or otherwise, such structures could be erected without danger or detriment to the public interest, and where the denial of a permit might work great and unnecessary hardship; hence no general rule could be established that would meet the emergencies of individual cases. While there exists apparent conflict of authority, this view finds support in numerous cases. Ex parte Fiske, supra; In re Flaherty, 105 Cal. 558, 38 Pac. 981, 27 L. R. A. 529; Ex parte Luening, 3 Cal. App. 76, 84 Pac. 445; Sawyer v. Davis, 136 Mass. 239, 49 Am. Rep. 27. In the Flaherty Case it is said:

> "In dealing with this and similar questions—such as repairs of wooden buildings within fire limits, carrying concealed weapons, using public buildings and grounds, * * * our federal, state, and municipal governments have always recognized the practical impossibility of providing in advance for proper exceptional cases, and the necessity of giving to a public officer some discretion in the premises. * * * Laws are not made upon the theory of the total depravity of those who are elected to administer them; and the presumption is that municipal officers will not use these small powers villainously and for the purposes of oppression and mischief."

It is to be noted that in most of the cases wherein the question is involved the power to grant or withhold a permit was delegated to subordinate officers, while in the case at bar the board itself retains and exercises the power of passing upon each application for a permit. Moreover, since the board might absolutely prohibit the erection of such structures, it is difficult to understand how petitioner is injured by the possibility of the board permitting him to do that which it could prohibit. Inhabitants v. Kennard et al., 151 Mass. 563, 24 N. E. 860.

[6] Thus far we have treated the case upon its merits. Conceding, however, that petitioner has just cause for complaint, his remedy is not by writ of certiorari. Under section 1068, Code of Civil Procedure, a writ of review may be granted only in those cases where a tribunal, board, or officer, exercising judicial functions, has exceeded its jurisdiction and there is no appeal, nor, in the judgment of the court, any plain, speedy, and adequate remedy. Petitioner not only had the right of appeal from the judgment rendered by the recorder's court, but, as shown by his petition, did appeal to the superior court, where the case was tried and the judgment affirmed. The fact that the superior court is not the court of last resort is immaterial. It is a court of general common-law jurisdiction which might have issued a writ of certiorari in this case (Const. art. 6, § 5), and whose appellate jurisdiction extends to all cases arising in justices' and other inferior courts in their respective counties. Having the right of appeal to the superior court, petitioner is not entitled to a writ of review issued out of this court. Tucker v. Justice's Court, 120 Cal. 512, 52 Pac. 808; Grant et al. v. Justice's Court, 1 Cal. App. 383, 82 Pac. 263; Bennett v. Wallace, 43 Cal. 25; Wittman v. Police Court, 145 Cal. 474, 78 Pac. 1052; Valentine v. Police Court, 141 Cal. 616, 75 Pac. 336; People v. Shepard, 28 Cal. 115; Times-Mirror Co. v. Superior Court, 15 Cal. App. 515, 115 Pac. 248; La Due v. Forbes, 19 Cal. App. 124, 124 Pac. 867. While some of these cases involved civil actions, the rule applicable to the question is the same. Says the Supreme Court in discussing a like question:

> "This court has never recognized the right of a petitioner to a writ of certiorari to review the judgment of a justice's court after appeal taken and determined in the superior court." Olcese v. Justice's Court, 156 Cal. 82, 103 Pac. 317.

It is true that in the case of Denninger v. Recorder's Court, 145 Cal. 629, 79 Pac. 360, the court, basing the statement upon the fact that the jurisdiction of a recorder's court is limited in character, said:

> "So that if the complaint upon which a defendant is arrested and tried fails to allege facts constituting one of the offenses to which its jurisdiction is confined, a judgment of conviction may be reviewed and annulled upon certiorari."

The point, however, that in such case certiorari will not lie for the reason that the aggrieved party has a remedy by appeal, does not appear to have been urged as a ground for its refusal; and for this reason, in view of the numerous cases holding the contrary, it should not be deemed an authority upon the question. Neither can the case of Mill v. Brown, 31 Utah, 473, 88 Pac. 609, 120 Am. St. Rep. 935, cited by petitioner, be deemed an authority in support of his contention, for the reason that the Utah statute expressly provides that a case arising in an inferior court from which an appeal lies to the superior court, may, nevertheless, where it involves the constitutionality of an ordinance or statute, be further appealed to the Supreme Court.

The writ of certiorari heretofore granted is dismissed.

LOWE v. LOS ANGELES SUBURBAN GAS CO. et al. (Civ. 1477.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. April 22, 1914. On Rehearing, May 22, 1914; Denied by Supreme Court June 20, 1914.)

1. Corporations (§ 298*)—Meetings of Directors—Notice—Evidence.

The testimony of two directors of a corporation that they received no notice of a meeting of the board of directors was sufficient to show that no written notice was given.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1292–1317, 1319; Dec. Dig. § 298.*]

2. Corporations (§ 298*)—Meetings of Directors—Necessity of Notice.

Under Civ. Code, § 320, declaring that when no provision is made in the by-laws of a corporation for regular meetings of the directors all meetings must be called by special notice in writing to each director, where the by-laws name the day for regular meetings, but not the hour of the day, notice must be given.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1292–1317, 1319; Dec. Dig. § 298.*]

3. Corporations (§ 194*)—Stockholders' Meeting—Necessity of Notice.

Where a stockholders' meeting was held without the giving of notice to stockholders, its validity depended on whether it was held with the written consent of all the stockholders or whether all the stockholders were present.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 734–743; Dec. Dig. § 194.*]

4. Corporations (§ 316*)—Directors—Authority—Personal Intent.

A director cannot participate in any action of the board of directors of a corporation authorizing a contract or the performance of an act for his own benefit, nor be counted as a part of a quorum of the board for the purposes of any such action.

5. Corporations (§ 425*)—Bonds—Estoppel to Deny Validity.

A corporation, after having accepted and appropriated to its own uses the full value of bonds, was estopped to dispute their validity because of the want of proper notices of the directors' meetings at which their issuance was authorized.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1697–1701, 1705; Dec. Dig. § 425.*]

6. Corporations (§ 482*)—Action on Bonds—Estoppel—Necessity of Pleading.

In an action against a corporation to foreclose a trust deed executed by the corporation to secure bonds, the defense being lack of due authorization, plaintiff could introduce evidence raising an estoppel without having pleaded it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1870, 1877–1888; Dec. Dig. § 482.*]

7. Principal and Agent (§ 177*)—Notice to Agent—Scope of Agency.

Where a director of a corporation was the agent of a third party for the purchase of bonds of the corporation, notice to such agent and director of the invalidity of the proceedings for the issuance of the bonds was not imputable to his principal; he receiving such notice in his capacity as director, and not as agent.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Principal and Agent, Cent. Dig. §§ 670–679; Dec. Dig. § 177.*]

8. Corporations (§ 482*) — Actions — Evidence—Sufficiency—Notice of Directors' Meeting.

In an action against a corporation to foreclose a trust deed executed to secure bonds, evidence held to sustain findings that notices of the directors' meetings at which the bonds were authorized were given, and that there were quorums present.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1870, 1877–1888; Dec. Dig. § 482.*]

9. Corporations (§ 477*)—Bonds and Trust Deed—One Transaction.

Bonds issued by a corporation and a trust deed executed to secure them, the bonds containing full recitals showing the execution and record of the trust deed, were all a part of one transaction, so that any estoppel to deny the validity of the bonds applied also to the trust deed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1857–1863, 1865–1869; Dec. Dig. § 477.*]

10. Corporations (§ 473*)—Trust Deed—Failure of Trustee to Act.

A trust deed executed by a corporation to secure bonds provided that on default in interest the principal should, at the election of the trustee, become due, and made it the duty of the trustee to take such action as the holder of one-fourth of the outstanding bonds should request upon such holder agreeing to indemnify the trustee. Held, that the rights of a bondholder should not be allowed to fail by the refusal of the trustee to act, but the court should put itself in the place of the trustee; the situation calling for the application of the maxim, "That which ought to have been done is to be regarded as done, in favor of him to whom, and against him from whom, performance is due."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1842–1853, 1855; Dec. Dig. § 473.*]

On Rehearing.

11. Corporations (§ 473*)—Trust Deeds—Failure of Trustee to Act.

A provision in a trust deed, given by a corporation to secure bonds, prohibiting any bondholder from enforcing any provision thereof until the trustee named therein, after a written request, had refused, was equivalent to a statement that after such refusal the bondholders could proceed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1842–1853, 1855; Dec. Dig. § 473.*]

Oscar A. Tripett, W. N. Goodwin, and Schweitzer & Hutton, all of Los Angeles, for appellants. Porter & Sutton, H. M. Barstow, and Lynn Helm, all of Los Angeles, and W. H. Chickering, of San Francisco, for respondents.

CONREY, P. J. This action was filed by William G. Gallagher, as plaintiff, for the purpose of foreclosing upon a trust deed alleged to have been executed by Los Angeles Suburban Gas Company, a corporation, to secure the payment of certain bonds alleged to have been executed by said corporation. Leon P. Lowe, having succeeded to such rights as the plaintiff possessed in the subject-matter of the action, said Leon P. Lowe was substituted as plaintiff instead of William G. Gallagher. The defendant Caroline W. Dobbins filed a cross-complaint alleging ownership by her of 100 bonds of the same issue, and prayed for foreclosure of the same trust deed above mentioned. The court having determined that the Los Angeles Suburban Gas Company received no consideration for the bonds held by the plaintiff, and that it did receive consideration for those held by the cross-complainant, judgment was entered herein against the plaintiff and a decree of foreclosure in favor of the cross-complainant for the amounts due on said bonds. Appeals from the judgment and from an order denying a motion for new trial are now prosecuted by the plaintiff and by the defendants Los Angeles Suburban Gas Company, People's Gas Company, and the People's Gas & Coke Company.

On the 2d day of August, 1901, a certain contract was entered into between Los Angeles Safe Deposit & Trust Company, a corporation, party of the first part, T. S. C. Lowe, party of the second part, and Caroline W. Dobbins and Thaddeus Lowe, parties of the third part. By that contract Mrs. Dobbins and Thaddeus Lowe agreed to purchase land in the city of Los Angeles and erect thereon a gas and coke plant, and that afterwards they would transfer said property to said Los Angeles Suburban Gas Company. In consideration of said property it was agreed, among other things, that there should be delivered to the said parties of the third part first mortgage bonds of said company equivalent in amount at par to the sums by them actually expended in the purchase of said land and construction of said plant. On the 7th day of November, 1901, and thereafter during the period of the transactions here under review, all of the stock of the Los Angeles Suburban Gas Company was owned by Los Angeles Safe Deposit & Trust Company, except that T. S. C. Lowe, L. P. Lowe, Thaddeus Lowe, S. C. Lowe, and Lynn Helm owned one share each; these five persons being the directors of the corporation. On November 7, 1901, there was held what purported to be a regular meeting of the board of directors, at which (according to the minutes) four directors were present; L. P. Lowe being absent. The by-laws of the corporation provided for regular meetings of the board of directors to be held on that day of the month, but did not specify the hour of the day. As hereinafter noted, it is claimed that no notice in writing of the holding of that meeting had been given to the directors. By resolution adopted at that meeting, it was ordered that a meeting of the stockholders be held at a specified hour on November 14, 1901, for the purpose of considering and authorizing a bonded indebtedness of the corporation in the sum of $300,000, and the said meeting of the board of directors was adjourned to meet immediately after said proposed meeting of stockholders. On November 14, 1901, there was held a purported meeting of the stockholders, which, according to the minutes, was at the place where the board of directors usually meet, and pursuant to a call of the board of directors, and by consent of the stockholders thereinafter set forth. The names of the stockholders thereinafter set forth were T. S. C. Lowe, Thaddeus Lowe, and Los Angeles Safe Deposit & Trust Company, and it was further recited that all of the stock of the company was represented (and that T. S. C. Lowe, L. P. Lowe, Thaddeus Lowe, and Lynn Helm were present) at the meeting. A resolution was passed purporting to authorize the creation of said indebtedness and bonds in the sum of $300,000. Immediately after the adjournment of said stockholders' meeting the board of directors reassembled pursuant to adjournment, and the minutes show that all of the directors were present. At this meeting a resolution was offered and declared to have been adopted, whereby, pursuant to said resolution of the meeting of the stockholders and consent of all of the stockholders, it was ordered that bonds in a form therein set forth be issued by the corporation representing said proposed indebtedness, and the California Bank of Los Angeles, Cal., was, by a separate resolution, selected and chosen trustee for the holder of said bonds, and provision was therein made for the execution by the Los Angeles Suburban Gas Company to said California Bank of an instrument mortgaging the property of the corporation to secure the payment of said bonds. The trust deed was executed in due form, and recorded on the 12th day of February, 1903.

On the 4th day of December, 1902, according to the minutes of the Los Angeles Suburban Gas Company, at a regular meeting of the board of directors at which four directors were present and S. C. Lowe was absent, a resolution was offered by Thaddeus Lowe and seconded by L. P. Lowe, and was adopted, wherein recitals were made referring to said contract of August 2, 1901, and declaring that the parties of the third part of said contract had purchased certain real property in the city of Los Angeles, and had erected on said premises a coke and gas plant complete in accordance with the terms of said contract, and had done certain other things therein mentioned, and were now ready to convey to this company, or a party designated by it, the said land and coke and gas works, etc., and accept the bonds of this company therefor, and it was resolved that this company accept the conveyance from the said Caroline W. Dobbins and Thaddeus Lowe of said property therein mentioned, and that the president and secretary of this company be authorized to deliver to said Caroline W. Dobbins and Thaddeus Lowe bonds as therein described, as authorized by this company on the 14th day of November, 1901.

On the 12th day of February, 1903, there was filed with the clerk of the county of Los Angeles a purported certificate of creation of bonded indebtedness of the Los Angeles Suburban Gas Company, signed by T. S. C. Lowe as chairman and Lynn Helm as secretary of the stockholders' meeting before mentioned, and also signed by the above-mentioned five directors. A certified copy of the said certificate was also at about the same time filed in the office of the secretary of state. In April, 1903, Mrs. Dobbins executed and delivered to the Los Angeles Suburban Gas Company a deed in accordance with said contract, and a bill of sale was also executed and delivered by Mrs. Dobbins and Thaddeus Lowe to the same corporation covering certain other property, and thereby completing the performance of said contract of August 2, 1901, as to those matters on the part of the parties of the third part therein. Upon the evidence of these records, together with other records and testimony not necessary to state more extensively at this moment, the court found in favor of the cross-complainant upon the issues presented with respect to the allegation that the proceedings above noted were actual and valid proceedings of the corporation by its board of directors and by its stockholders and by its president and secretary respectively; and that said bonds, being unpaid, were valid obligations of the corporation secured by said mortgage or deed of trust; and that the cross-complainant was entitled to decree as entered herein.

It is contended by the defendants and appellants that the evidence is insufficient to support these findings.

[1, 2] L. P. Lowe testified that he was not present at the meeting of the board of directors on November 7, 1901, and S. C. Lowe testified that he was not present. As above noted, the minutes of the meeting show the absence of L. P. Lowe and the presence of S. C. Lowe. The certificate of creation of bonded indebtedness, which was signed, as above stated, by all of the directors, recites that the meeting was regularly called and held, and shows the presence of four directors; L. P. Lowe being absent. It therefore appears from the evidence, without any contradiction of the fact, that at this directors' meeting at least one director was absent. The testimony of two directors that they did not receive any notice would be sufficient to show that no notice in writing had been given to the directors of the holding of said meeting, unless we can say that the court was entitled to base a contrary finding upon the presumption that a meeting thus held was regularly called, and upon the recital in the certificate of bonded indebtedness that said meeting was "regularly called." If the purported meeting of November 7th was not a valid meeting of the board of directors, the same defect applies to the adjourned session of that meeting on November 14th, unless the court could base a contrary finding upon a like presumption as before and the recital in said certificate of bonded indebtedness that all of the directors of the company were present at the directors' meeting of November 14th. The principal point upon which the appellants are able to rely in support of their claim that a notice of the meeting was necessary grows out of the fact that the by-laws do not name the hour of the day upon which the meeting should be held. Section 320 of the Civil Code declares that:

> "When no provision is made in the by-laws for regular meetings of the directors * * * all meetings must be called by special notice in writing, to be given to each director. * * *"

Where the by-laws name the day for regular meetings, but do not name the hour of the day, notice must be given. Thompson v. Williams, 76 Cal. 154, 18 Pac. 153, 9 Am. St. Rep. 187; San Buenaventura Mfg. Co. v. Vassault, 50 Cal. 537.

[3] The meeting of stockholders on November 14, 1901, was held without the giving of notice to stockholders, and its validity must depend upon the showing either that it was held with the written consent of all of the stockholders, or that all of the stockholders were present. L. P. Lowe and S. C. Lowe testify that they did not sign the consent to holding said stockholders' meeting; that they had no notice of a stockholders' meeting being held at that time; and that they were not present. The minutes of that meeting recite that they were present, and the certificate of bonded indebtedness which they afterwards signed recites that the meeting was held with their consent in writing. These two witnesses are not contradicted by the direct testimony of any witness.

[4] The meeting of the board of directors on December 4, 1902, purporting to be a regular meeting of the board of directors, was held without showing by any record in the minutes the giving of any notice to the members of the board, and the minutes show that one director (S. C. Lowe) was absent.

L. P. Lowe also testified that he was not present at that meeting and his testimony is undisputed, except by the minutes of said meeting. If L. P. Lowe and S. C. Lowe were both absent, then there were only three directors present, and no quorum could be present without counting Thaddeus Lowe as one of the three. The appellants contend that this fact destroys the validity of the resolution passed at that meeting directing the delivery of the bonds in question "to said Caroline W. Dobbins and Thaddeus Lowe." The rule is correctly stated by appellants that a director cannot participate in action of the board of directors of a corporation authorizing a contract or the performance of an act for his own benefit, nor be counted as part of a quorum of the board for the purposes of any such action by the board. Wickersham v. Crittenden, 93 Cal. 29, 30, 28 Pac. 788; Pacific, etc., Works v. Smith, 145 Cal. 352, 78 Pac. 550, 104 Am. St. Rep. 42. The said resolution cannot be accepted as any part of the authority for the delivery of said bonds, if Thaddeus Lowe was interested therein. It clearly appears, however, according to the testimony of Mrs. Dobbins, that, although he was a party named with Mrs. Dobbins in the contract of August 2, 1901, yet, in fact, Mrs. Dobbins with her own money paid the entire cost of the property that was conveyed to the Los Angeles Suburban Gas Company in consideration of these bonds, and the bonds were issued to her. In other words, the contract was so performed, as to consideration actually paid, that the bonds were the property of the cross-complainant alone. This is necessarily implied in the facts found and is sustained by the evidence.

The proceedings which were necessary for the creation of a bonded indebtedness by a corporation at the time of these transactions are contained in section 359 of the Civil Code, as amended in 1893. The form of these proceedings as conducted by the Los Angeles Suburban Gas Company and shown in its minutes and in said certificate is not objected to by appellants. The force of the objection is directed entirely against the validity of the meetings themselves and for the reasons which have been specified.

[5] Assuming now, for the moment, that for want of proper notices the meetings of November 7 and November 14, 1901, were not legally called meetings of the corporation or of its board of directors, we are met by the suggestion that the corporation is not entitled to take advantage of these defects and repudiate the bonds after having accepted and appropriated to its own uses full value thereof, paid out by the cross-complainant, for its benefit, and the proceeds delivered to it. The appellants deny that the deed and bill of sale above mentioned were delivered to the Los Angeles Suburban Gas Company. The trial court found as a fact that they were delivered, and, although there is a conflict in the evidence, the finding is amply sustained by the testimony given. We therefore assume as a settled fact that the consideration was received.

In McKee v. Title Insurance & Trust Co., 159 Cal. 206, 220, 113 Pac. 140, 146, objection was made on behalf of the creditors of Wentworth Hotel Company, a corporation, that the requirements of section 359 of the Civil Code had not been complied with in the proceedings leading to the issuance of bonds of the corporation. The bonds had been issued without obtaining consent of two-thirds of the stockholders, and without filing any certificate of creation of bonded indebtedness, and, in fact, no attempt had been made to comply with section 359 of the Civil Code; but the corporation had received a valuable consideration for the bonds. The court, after stating that a construction which would make such bonds void in the hands of a holder for value at the instance of other creditors would be against equity and justice and should not be favored, called attention to the fact that in section 359 there is no provision that bonds not issued in conformity therewith shall be void either in favor of creditors or at all.

> "So far as such original issue is concerned, the proceedings were evidently intended only as a protection to the stockholders against such issue without the consent of those having a two-thirds interest, and not for the protection of creditors. No stockholder is here asserting any right or making any objection. The assignee in insolvency represents the interests of the creditors only. He is not suing on behalf of the stockholders or in their interest, and there being no fraud, he stands in the shoes of the corporation with regard to the bonds. The corporation has received the money obtained by means of the bonds, and has applied it to the payment of its debts and the completion of the hotel. The money has thus inured to the benefit of the corporation and its stockholders and of the general creditors also, since it has unquestionably given a substantial value to a structure which would otherwise be comparatively worthless. The corporation is therefore estopped to dispute the validity of the bonds, and the creditors are likewise bound thereby. The real point of the objection is that the manner of issuing the bonds was so defective that the transaction was ultra vires and void, notwithstanding that the corporation received and holds the benefits thereof. In regard to a similar claim the New York Court of Appeals said: 'That kind of plunder which holds on to the property but pleads ultra vires against the obligation to pay for it, has no recognition or support in the laws of this state.' Seymour v. Association, 144 N. Y. 333, 39 N. E. 365, 26 L. R. A. 859. The following cases declare that neither the corporation nor its creditors can, under like circumstances to those here existing and under similar provisions of the law, maintain such an attack on bonds irregularly issued, and that the provisions of such laws are for the protection of stockholders only"—citing cases.

[6, 7] Appellants offer two principal reasons why they say that the cross-complaint cannot rely upon an estoppel in this case. The first objection is that no estoppel was pleaded by the cross-complaint. At the trial cross-complainant introduced evidence sufficient to establish a prima facie case. If she had rested there, and if the defendants here appealing had then introduced evidence showing lack of due authorization, the cross-complainant might then have presented evidence to raise an equitable barrier against defendants' proof of want of authority, and might have done this without pleading an estoppel. The fact that in the trial of this case the plaintiff, after establishing her prima facie case, introduced the other evidence in anticipation of the defense of want of authority, does not affect the merits of the case, nor change the rule applicable with respect to pleading. Blood v. La Serena L. & W. Co., 113 Cal. 221, 229, 41 Pac. 1017, 45 Pac. 252. Next it is asserted that estoppel cannot be relied upon because deceit is an essential element in estoppel and the cross-complainant had actual notice of the fact that, as appellants claim, the execution of said bonds was never duly authorized. The record shows that Thaddeus Lowe was the agent of cross-complainant with respect to the business transacted under said contract of August 2, 1901. At the same time he was a director of the corporation. Personally Mrs. Dobbins did not acquire any knowledge of the details of action or attempted action by the corporation. Under such circumstances, it would not be equitable to enforce against cross-complainant the consequences resulting from the legal rule that knowledge on the part of her agent is to be imputed to her as his principal. The scope of his agency seems to have been extended only to the business of assisting her in the performance of her part of the contract wherein she purchased lands and improved the same and conveyed the property to the corporation. His presence at the meetings of the board of directors and of the stockholders of the corporation was in his capacity as a stockholder or as a member of the board of directors and charged with a trust in favor of the corporation. If, under those circumstances, the corporation accepted a valuable consideration from her, and secured her acceptance of its bonds, the directors of the corporation must be presumed to have known of the alleged invalidity of those proceedings, and the knowledge of Thaddeus Lowe was primarily his knowledge as such director. If, under such circumstances, he concealed the facts from his principal Mrs. Dobbins his other principal (the Los Angeles Suburban Gas Company) should not be permitted to take advantage of that concealment. This position is further established by the fact that the corporation, by the act of all of its directors, including Thaddeus Lowe, certified to the facts relied upon by Mrs. Dobbins when she accepted the bonds and delivered the consideration therefor.

[8] We now return to the matter of the notices given and the question of validity of the meetings held. The finding of fact, that there was a stockholders' meeting, and that there were directors' meetings, at the times above mentioned, implies that notice in writing had been given of the directors' meetings, and that written consent had been given by all of the stockholders for the holding of the stockholders' meeting. In our opinion, the court was entitled to find that these notices were given. Beginning with the presumption of regularity of the proceedings shown in the minutes kept by the secretary of the corporation, the court was not bound to believe contrary testimony of the witnesses L. P. Lowe and S. C. Lowe, in the face of their own written certificate, which contradicted their testimony. There being thus a conflict in the evidence, we base our conclusion upon the facts as found by the court. A like result must follow upon the question as to the number of directors present at the directors' meeting of December 4, 1902. On the one hand we have the official record of the corporation in its minutes, which show the presence of four directors, as against the testimony of one of those four directors, given nine years later, that he was not present at the meeting.

[10] Finally, it is claimed by appellants that the decree entered herein is erroneous in this, that it orders that the mortgaged property be sold for satisfaction of the principal, as well as for the due and unpaid interest upon the bonds. This argument is based upon the provision of the trust deed that, if for a specified length of time default be made in the payment of interest coupons, the whole amount of the principal, etc., shall, at the election of the trustee, be deemed immediately due and payable; and, since the trustee has never made such election and has never instituted any proceeding to foreclose, it is insisted that the remedy of the holder of the bonds is limited to the right to have the property, or so much of it, sold as is required for the satisfaction of accrued and unpaid interest installments. If the trust deed contained no other provision for advancing the maturity of the entire obligation than that above mentioned, the contention of appellants probably would have to be sustained. But it further appears from the mortgage that, under circumstances like those which have arisen in this case and after the holder of one-fourth of the bonds at that time outstanding and unpaid shall have tendered to the trustee satisfactory indemnity against loss, expense, and liability that may be incurred by it in so doing, it shall be the duty of the trustee to take such action pursuant to the terms of the trust deed as the party or parties tendering the indemnity may in writing request. After the default had taken place and the necessary space of time had passed, the cross-complainant, she being the holder of all of the legally outstanding bonds of this issue, made written demand upon the trustee that it immediately elect to consider the whole amount of principal and interest of said bonds to be due and payable, and that it institute proper proceedings to foreclose said mortgage or deed of trust, or to sell the property thereby conveyed or mortgaged, under the power of sale therein contained, and in said writing offered to protect and indemnify the trustee in such manner as it might require against loss, expense, and damage by reason of such foreclosure and sale. The trustee indorsed on said notice a refusal to comply with the demand and request thus made. Under these circumstances, the rights of the bondholder should not be allowed to fail by reason of the refusal or omission of the trustee to perform its duty. The court should put itself in the place of the trustee, and, on demand of the bondholder, should exercise its power to enforce those rights. The situation is one calling for the application of the maxim:

> "That which ought to have been done is to be regarded as done, in favor of him to whom, and against him from whom, performance is due." Civ. Code, § 3529; Beverly v. Blackwood, 102 Cal. 83, 36 Pac. 378; Cutter v. Burroughs, 100 Me. 379, 387, 61 Atl. 767.

With respect to the plaintiff in the case, the evidence is sufficient to sustain the finding that the Los Angeles Suburban Gas Company received no consideration for the bonds held by the plaintiff. The only evidence tending to show a consideration came in the form of statements by the witness L. P. Lowe, whose cross-examination showed that the facts were not within his personal knowledge, and the court very properly struck out the answers thus given. There is other evidence indicating absence of any consideration.

The judgment and the order denying the motions of appellants for a new trial herein are affirmed.

We concur: JAMES, J.; SHAW, J.

On Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. The appellants Los Angeles Suburban Gas Company, People's Gas Company, and People's Gas & Coke Company have filed their petition for a rehearing of this cause in the Second District Court of Appeal.

[11] The argument presented relates to that part of the decree of foreclosure which permits a sale to enforce payment of the principal of the bonds as well as the accrued interest thereon. In addition to the fact that (under circumstances outlined in the opinion heretofore filed) the trust deed made it the trustee's duty "to take such action pursuant to the terms of this trust deed as the party or parties tendering the indemnity may in writing request," we find that paragraph 12 of the trust deed provides as follows:

> "No bondholder or bondholders shall take any proceedings to enforce the provisions hereof until he shall have requested the trustee in writing to take proceedings and shall have tendered to the trustee satisfactory indemnity as hereinbefore provided, and the trustee shall have refused or neglected after the lapse of a reasonable time to take such proceedings."

The words above quoted are equivalent to a statement that after such request and refusal the bondholders referred to may proceed in some appropriate manner to enforce the provisions of the trust deed. We think that the right to enforce the provisions of the trust deed included the right to enforce payment of the entire debt, and that this right passed to the bondholders complying with the conditions stated when the trustee refused to proceed as requested.

The petition for rehearing is denied.

JAQUES et al. v. BOARD OF SUP'RS OF YUBA COUNTY et al. (Civ. 1154.)

1. DRAINS (§ 13*)—RECLAMATION DISTRICT—DE FACTO ORGANIZATION—"DE FACTO CORPORATION"—"DE FACTO."

Where there was an attempt to organize a reclamation district under the laws relating to the organization of such districts, and such district for four years claimed to be and acted as a reclamation district, it was, regardless of the legality of its organization, a de facto corporation; a corporation being a de facto corporation when a number of persons have organized and acted as a corporation, conducting their affairs by the methods and through the officers usually employed by corporations, assuming the appearance of the counterfeit presentment of a legal corporate body, "de facto" meaning "of fact," "indeed," "in point of fact," "actually," "really."

Judgment on demurrer for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

See, also, 22 Cal. App. 627, 135 Pac. 686.

C. W. Eastin, of San Francisco, for appellants. E. T. Manwell, of Marysville, for respondent Board of Sup'rs. A. H. Hewitt, of Yuba City, and J. E. Ebert, of Marysville, for respondent Reclamation Dist. No. 784.

BURNETT, J. This was an application for a writ of review to annul the proceedings of the board of supervisors of Yuba county relating to the organization of reclamation district No. 784. The defendants appeared and demurred to the petition or complaint upon the grounds, among others, that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and that the plaintiffs have not the legal capacity to sue; it appearing that plaintiffs, as individuals, are seeking to attack the validity of the organization and legal existence of a reclamation district, a public or quasi public corporation. Subsequently motions to dismiss the action were made by defendants. After hearing the matter the court rendered its decision sustaining the demurrers and dismissing the action, and the appeal is from the judgment entered in pursuance of said decision.

Several contentions are made by appellants and argued with much force, learning, and ability, but it is deemed necessary to consider only one point, as that is decisive of the controversy.

[1] In the complaint it is alleged:

> "That it is claimed and asserted and at all times since on or about May 6, 1908, it has been claimed and asserted by reclamation district No. 784, defendants herein, that said reclamation district became a public or quasi public corporation and reclamation district on or about the 6th day of May, 1908, under and by virtue of the petition and other proceedings and papers hereinafter mentioned. * * * That said reclamation district No. 784 claims to be, and as hereinafter alleged has for some time last past acted as, and now is acting as, a reclamation district, and claims that certain lands, including the lands of plaintiff herein mentioned, are situated within and comprise the territory of said reclamation district."

The complaint was filed December 2, 1912, and it thus appears that for more than four years the said district had claimed and asserted that it was a reclamation district, and for some time prior to the filing of the complaint it had acted and is still acting as a reclamation district.

Regardless, then, of the legality of its organization, it is, without question, according to the allegations of the complaint, what is familiarly known as a de facto corporation. A corporation is recognized as de facto:

> "When a number of persons have organized and acted as a corporation, have conducted their affairs, to some extent at least, by the methods and through the officers usually employed by corporations, and have assumed the appearance, at least, of the counterfeit presentment of a legal corporate body." Martin v. Deetz, 102 Cal. 55, 36 Pac. 368, 41 Am. St. Rep. 151.

> "De facto means in law, as well as elsewhere, of fact; in deed; in point of fact; actually; really." McCahon v. Leavenworth County Com'rs, 8 Kan. 437.

In Tulare Irrigation District v. Shepard, 185 U. S. 1, 22 Sup. Ct. 531, 46 L. Ed. 773, the United States Supreme Court held that, to constitute a de facto corporation, there are three requisites:

> "(1) A charter or general law under which such a corporation as it purports to be might lawfully be organized; (2) an attempt to organize thereunder; and (3) the actual user of the corporate franchise."

[2] The existence of these three requisites clearly appears in the complaint before us. In fact, it is difficult to conceive how they could be more emphatically presented. We take judicial notice, of course, of the general law under which reclamation districts may be organized, and "the attempt to organize" and "the actual user of the corporate franchise" are expressly averred.

[3] But, whatever expressions to the contrary may appear in some of the decisions, it must be deemed settled now in this state that the legal right of such corporation to exist and exercise its corporate powers can be inquired into and determined only by the state in quo warranto proceedings.

In Williams v. Board of Supervisors, 65 Cal. 160, 3 Pac. 667, it appears that Henry Hebb, an owner of lands included in an organized swamp land district, applied to the supervisors to have his land segregated and made a new and independent district, under the provisions of the act of April 15, 1880 (St. 1880 [Code Amdts.] p. 61), amendatory of section 3481 of the Political Code. A protest was filed by Williams, the respondent, who was a landowner in the district. The board granted the petition of Hebb. Williams procured a writ of review from the superior court, and upon a hearing the action of the board was annulled. From the judgment an appeal was taken. The Supreme Court said:

> "The order of a board of supervisors, creating a district for the reclamation of swamp land, is an act of legislation, in the exercise of the taxing or police power of the state, which is not reviewable upon certiorari. Bixler v. County of Sacramento, 59 Cal. 700. The writ of certiorari is, as a remedy, only available for the review of an act judicial in its character."

The judgment was therefore reversed.

In Keech v. Joplin, 157 Cal. 1, 106 Pac. 222, the appeal was from a judgment in mandamus directing the defendant to pay to plaintiff the sum of $500 out of the money in his hands as county treasurer belonging to the general fund of the Newbert protective district, in satisfaction of a warrant for that sum issued to the plaintiff by the directors of said district. Upon the trial the defendant offered to prove that the signers to the original petition for the organization of the district did not own a majority of the lands of the district but only a little over one-third thereof. This proof was offered for the purpose of having the district declared invalid. The main objection presented here to the validity of the organization of the district, it may be stated, is likewise that the petition for the establishment of the district was signed by the owners of less than one-half of the land. The Supreme Court, in the Keech Case, supra, in discussing the ruling of the lower court in excluding the offered evidence, said:

"We do not think it necessary to determine what effect such proof would have upon the validity of the district, or whether it would be admissible in any collateral attack thereon. The present action is an action against the treasurer of the county to compel the payment of a claim. The evidence abundantly shows that the district has been organized and that it has been acting as a district. In other words, that it is a de facto district. It is a public corporation of a similar character to irrigation districts and reclamation districts. The law is well settled that the validity of the organization of such a district cannot be questioned by private individuals, but only in a proceeding in quo warranto at the suit of the state. Quint v. Hoffman, 103 Cal. 506 [37 Pac. 514, 777]; Reclamation District v. Turner, 104 Cal. 335 [37 Pac. 1038]."

In Metcalf v. Merritt, 14 Cal. App. 244, 111 Pac. 505, it was held, as stated in the syllabus:

"A reclamation district is a public, as distinguished from a private, corporation. It acts as a state agency, invested with certain limited powers, and restricted to the doing of a particular work, public in its nature," and "the existence of public corporations can only be called in question by the power from which they derive their right to be."

This question received careful consideration in the case of Reclamation District No. 765 v. McPhee, 13 Cal. App. 383, 109 Pac. 1106. Therein it is said:

"In our former opinion we held that the board of supervisors was without jurisdiction to create the district, for the reason that there was a failure to publish the petition for its organization for the statutory period; and further that the validity of the organization could be attacked in this action. Since the opinion was filed, the decision of the Supreme Court in Keech v. Joplin, 157 Cal. 1 [106 Pac. 222], has been called to our attention, which, it is claimed, holds that the organization of the district can only be questioned by quo warranto."

After considering anew the sufficiency of the said publication, the opinion proceeds to the discussion of the question:

"Could the validity of the corporation be attacked in this proceeding?"

The decisions of the Supreme Court were reviewed and the conclusion reached that, in the absence of fraud, quo warranto was the exclusive remedy. A petition for rehearing was filed in the Supreme Court but denied therein. In other words, the position of respondent was approved that an exclusive remedy was afforded by section 803 of the Code of Civil Procedure, providing that:

"An action may be brought by the Attorney General, in the name of the people of this state, upon his own information, or upon a complaint of a private party, against any person who usurps, intrudes into, or unlawfully holds or exercises any public office, civil or military, or any franchise, or against any corporation, either de jure or de facto, which usurps, intrudes into, or unlawfully holds or exercises any franchise, within this state. And the Attorney General must bring the action, whenever he has any reason to believe that any such office or franchise has been usurped, intruded into, or unlawfully held or exercised by any person, or when he is directed to do so by the Governor."

We must assume, of course, that the Attorney General will do his duty and that appellants will have no difficulty in obtaining redress by the method thus pointed out, if there be merit in their contention.

The foregoing cases seem to set this decisive question at rest, and no further discussion is called for.

The judgment is affirmed.

CITY OF VENICE v. LAWRENCE, City Treasurer. (Civ. 1493.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. April 17, 1914.)

1. Municipal Corporations (§ 935*)—Bonds—Proceedings—Irregularity — Curative Act.

All irregularities in proceedings for the issuance of city bonds which the Legislature in the first instance could have dispensed with were cured by Act April 4, 1913 (St. 1913, p. 14), providing that, where any municipal corporation has taken proceedings to issue and sell bonds, all such acts and proceedings leading up to and including the issuance of the bonds if they have previously been sold and all such acts previously had though the bonds had not yet been sold were legalized, ratified, and confirmed, etc.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 1951; Dec. Dig. § 935.*]

2. Municipal Corporations (§ 918*)—Bond Issue — Validity — Incurring Indebtedness.

Where a notice of election to authorize a bond issue specified that the election was to vote bonds in the sum of $20,000 to construct an outfall sewer, the estimated cost of which was $20,000, it sufficiently stated that it was proposed to "incur an indebtedness" of that sum for such purpose.

3. Municipal Corporations (§ 935*)—Bonds—Issuance—Date.

Under Act April 4, 1913 (St. 1913, p. 15) § 3, validating certain city bonds, but declaring that the act should not legalize any bonds sold for less than par, nor those the issuance of which had not received the assent of two-thirds of the qualified electors, nor those maturing more than 40 years from the date of issue, the date of the bonds was immaterial so long as they did not run longer than 40 years.

4. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 929*)—BONDS—EFFECT—TIME.

A municipal bond takes effect only on delivery and bears interest from that date, and not from the date of issue.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 1942; Dec. Dig. § 929.*]

5. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 927*)—BONDS—ISSUE—REFUSAL TO SIGN—GROUNDS.

A city treasurer had no authority to refuse to sign a municipal bond, on the ground that the board of trustees might violate their duty by selling the bond for less than par.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 1940; Dec. Dig. § 927.*]

Petition by the City of Venice against J. B. Lawrence, Jr., City Treasurer, for mandamus to compel him to sign certain municipal bonds. Alternative writ made peremptory.

Byron C. Hanna, of Los Angeles, for petitioner. Crouch & Crouch, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Original application for a writ of mandate to be directed to the respondent requiring him, as treasurer of the city of Venice, to sign a certain municipal bond in the sum of $500; it being one of 40 bonds of like denomination voted by the electors of said city for the purpose of constructing an outfall sewer.

It appears from the petition, all the allegations of which are admitted by a general demurrer interposed thereto, that on January 22, 1912, the board of trustees of the city of Venice duly adopted a resolution, approved by its president, whereby it determined that public interest and necessity demanded the acquisition and construction of a garbage incinerating plant, the cost of which was $23,000, and the construction of an extension to the sewer outfall pipe, the cost of which was $20,000, the cost of which improvements it was declared would be "too great to be paid out of the annual income and revenue of the city of Venice." The resolution contained the following:

> "The proceedings for the incurring of said indebtedness and the issuance and sale of bonds thereunder be conducted in accordance with the provisions of an act of the Legislature of the state of California entitled 'An act authorizing the incurring of indebtedness by cities, towns and municipal corporations for municipal purposes, and regulating the acquisition, the construction and completion thereof' (which act became a law under constitutional provisions without the Governor's approval, February 25, 1901), and in accordance with the provisions of section 866 of an act of the Legislature of the state of California entitled 'An act to provide for the organization, incorporation and government of municipal corporations,' approved March 13, 1883, and all acts in addition thereto and amendatory thereof."

On February 19, 1912, an ordinance was duly adopted calling a special election to be held on April 4, 1912, for the purpose of submitting to the qualified electors of said city the proposition of issuing the bonds and reciting the purposes so embodied in the resolution, for which the indebtedness evidenced by the bonds was to be incurred, and providing, as to the outfall sewer bonds here involved, that they should be of the denomination of $500 each, and bear 5 per cent. interest, one of said bonds to be made payable on the 1st day of February of each year after the date of their issue. The election was duly and regularly held, and more than two-thirds of the electors voting at the election voted in favor of the proposition.

The only grounds upon which respondent seeks to justify his action in refusing to sign the bond presented for his signature as city treasurer are: First. That it was stated in the resolution and ordinance that the proceedings for the issuance of the bonds would be conducted in accordance with two separate acts providing for cities incurring indebtedness in the making of public improvements, the provisions of which acts are inconsistent each with the other, in that, among other things, one authorizes the incurring of an indebtedness only when the estimated cost of the improvements exceeds the ordinary annual income and revenue of the municipality, while the other authorizes the incurring of such indebtedness only in case the amount is in excess of the money in the treasury applicable to the payment thereof; in one the payment of the bonds may extend over a period of 40 years, while in the other the time is restricted to 20 years. Second. That the proposed issuance of the bond is unauthorized, in that the board of trustees did not, as required, determine the cost of constructing the improvement to be "too great to be paid out of the ordinary annual income and revenue of the municipality." This claim is based upon the fact that the resolution included, not only the construction of an outfall sewer at a cost of $20,000, but the acquisition of a garbage incinerating plant at a cost of $23,000; and the determination was not as to each improvement separately, but declared that the combined cost of the two improvements was "too great to be paid out of the annual income and revenue of the city," omitting the word "ordinary." Third. The omission of a sufficient statement in the ordinance as to the amount of the indebtedness which it was proposed to incur in the construction of the improvement. Fourth. That no authority exists for antedating the bonds. The ordinance passed by the board of trustees, pursuant to the authority given, provided that the bonds should be dated as of February 1, 1912, and bear interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum. Fifth. Under the terms of the ordinance the bonds are to extend over a period of more than 40 years from their date.

thority upon the board to issue the bonds may be conceded. Whether of sufficient import to render the proceedings invalid by reason of noncompliance with the statutory provisions under and pursuant to which they were conducted is immaterial, for the reason that, in our opinion, such defects, in so far as material, were cured by an act of the Legislature entitled "An act to validate municipal bonds, and to provide for the levy and collection of taxes to pay the principal and interest on such bonds," approved April 4, 1913 (St. 1913, p. 14). Section 1 of this act provides:

> "Where in any municipal corporation, proceedings have been taken for the purpose of issuing and selling bonds of such municipal corporation, * * * all such acts and proceedings leading up to and including the issuance of such bonds, if they have heretofore been sold, and all such acts and proceedings heretofore had, although the bonds are not yet sold, are hereby legalized, ratified, confirmed and declared validated to all intents and purposes, and the power of said municipal corporation and of the legislative body thereof, to issue such bonds, is hereby ratified, confirmed and declared, * * * and the bonds hereafter sold shall be, the legal and binding obligation of and against the municipal corporation. * * *"

Section 3 of the act provides:

> "This act shall not operate to legalize any bonds which have been sold for less than par, nor to legalize any bonds the issuance of which has not received the assent of two-thirds of the qualified electors of such municipal corporation, voting at an election held for the purpose of determining whether such indebtedness should be incurred, nor to legalize any bonds which mature at a date more than forty years from the time of their issuance."

It has been repeatedly held that the Legislature may validate past transactions when it could in advance, without contravening constitutional provisions, have authorized the proceedings taken as a precedent condition to the exercise of municipal power in issuing bonds. In other words, as to all steps which the Legislature could, in the first instance, have dispensed with, it may by retroactive statute declare the taking thereof unnecessary. See 2 Dillon on Municipal Corporations (5th Ed.) § 948; City of Redlands v. Brook, 151 Cal. 474, 91 Pac. 150.

[2] Indeed, counsel for respondent, notwithstanding the irregularity in the proceedings, concedes the act quoted as sufficient to validate the bonds, except that he contends the notice of the election failed to state the amount of the proposed indebtedness, by reason whereof there was a failure to comply with section 18 of article 11 of the Constitution, which prohibits the incurring of "any indebtedness or liability in any manner or for any purpose, * * * without the assent of two-thirds of the qualified electors thereof, voting at an election to be held for that purpose." And while he concedes that the purpose, as specified in the notice of election, was to vote bonds in the sum of $20,000 of the denomination of $500 each for the purpose of constructing an outfall sewer, he insists that the notice did not state in express terms that it was proposed to incur an indebtedness of said sum for such purpose. There is no merit in the contention. The notice recited that the estimated cost of the improvement was the sum of $20,000, and the election was called, as stated in the proceedings, for the purpose of submitting "to the qualified electors of said city the propositions of incurring the said several indebtednesses (that of $23,000 for a garbage plant, and $20,000 for the sewer) for the said several purposes * * * set forth in this resolution." Moreover, as was said in City of Oxnard v. Bellah, 21 Cal. App. 33, 130 Pac. 701, where a similar point was urged:

> "It is clear that the authority to issue bonds evidencing a debt was submitted, and that the voters directed the issuance thereof, the effect of which would be to create and establish an indebtedness; and it should follow that a proposition to issue bonds evidencing a new and independent indebtedness is a proposition to incur an indebtedness, and comes within the purview of the statute which provides that the proposition of incurring a debt for the purposes set forth in said resolution, and no question other than the incurring of an indebtedness for the purpose, shall be submitted."

[3-5] Pursuant to the power conferred, the board of trustees adopted an ordinance authorizing the issuance of the bonds, and whereby it was provided that they should be dated February 1, 1912. Respondent insists that thus dating the bonds rendered them illegal, for the reason that they would bear interest from a date prior to that upon which the election was held, whereby authority to issue them was conferred upon the board. The date of the bond is immaterial; the only restriction being that it shall not extend over a period of 40 years. Like a note, the bond would only take effect upon delivery and bear interest from such date. Collins v. Driscoll, 69 Cal. 550, 11 Pac. 244; Bither v. Christensen, 1 Cal. App. 90, 81 Pac. 670. Moreover, it appears that the bond in question is sold at par and accrued interest. However this may be, the city treasurer cannot justify his refusal to sign the bond upon the ground that the board of trustees may violate their duty by selling the bond for less than par.

We are of the opinion that the defects and irregularities in the procedure, to which respondent has directed our attention, and by reason of which he has refused to sign the bond here involved, are cured by the validating act above referred to.

The alternative writ of mandate should therefore be made peremptory, and it is so ordered.

PINNEY & BOYLE CO. v. LOS ANGELES GAS & ELECTRIC CORPORATION.

1. Electricity (§ 11*)—Police Power—Regulation of Rates.

Whether the production of an article is a public service utility depends upon the duty undertaken upon behalf of and owed to the public or some defined portion of it, rather than the use to which the article is put, and the furnishing of electricity to the inhabitants of a city was not exempt from municipal regulation when furnished for power purposes.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Electricity, Dec. Dig. § 11.*]

2. Municipal Corporations (§ 625*)—Police Power—Reasonableness of Ordinances.

Ordinances which are unreasonable and oppressive in their attempted exercise of the police power will be declared void.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1378, 1379; Dec. Dig. § 625.*]

3. Electricity (§ 11*)—Police Power—Regulation of Rates.

An ordinance fixing the rate for furnishing electricity was not invalid because it prevented agreements for a lower rate, as one of the primary objects of rate regulation is to prevent discrimination, and, while a public utility is bound by the prescribed rate, an individual is not unless he accepts the service or commodity, after which he cannot contest the reasonableness of the rate.

4. Constitutional Law (§ 242*)—Electricity (§ 11*)—Regulation of Electric Rates —Equal Protection of Laws.

An ordinance fixing the rate for furnishing electricity for a term of one year, passed after consumers had been given an opportunity to be heard, did not deprive a consumer of the equal protection of the law because it provided that no change should be made in the rate during such term, unless upon an application for a reduction thereof by the producer, as the consumer had an opportunity to be heard, a definite time could be fixed within which the rate could not be changed, and the provision for a reduction of rate upon the application of the producer was as clearly designed for the benefit of the consumer as the producer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. § 691; Dec. Dig. § 242;* Electricity, Dec. Dig. § 11.*]

5. Electricity (§ 11*) — Contract — Construction and Operation—Law as Part of Contract.

A contract between a producer and consumer of electricity as to the rate will be conclusively presumed to have been entered into in contemplation of the power of the proper public authorities to fix the rates, so that it was not violated by the producer's charging a higher rate subsequently prescribed by the municipality.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; N. P. Conrey, Judge.

Action by the Pinney & Boyle Company against the Los Angeles Gas & Electric Corporation. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

John D. Pope, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Wm. A. Cheney, Herbert J. Goudge, Le Roy M. Edwards, and Paul Overton, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Plaintiff is a corporation which in the conduct of its business uses electrical power to operate its machinery. Plaintiff entered into a contract with the defendant to furnish electricity to be so used. Defendant is a public service corporation engaged, as its name implies, in furnishing gas and electricity to the inhabitants of the city of Los Angeles. During the life of this private contract between the parties litigant the city of Los Angeles regulated and prescribed the rates which defendant, with other public utilities, was permitted to charge for the electricity supplied and the service rendered to consumers. This rate was a higher rate than that fixed by the agreement of plaintiff and defendant. Plaintiff refused to pay the higher rate, insisting that the limit of its liability was the price fixed by contract. Defendant declined to furnish electricity excepting at the rate prescribed by the ordinance of the city of Los Angeles. This litigation followed. Judgment was given in favor of the defendant, and plaintiff appeals.

The propositions advanced on appeal may be thus summarized: (1) That furnishing electricity for power to be used as plaintiff was using it in its private business is not the performance of a public service which can be regulated by the municipality but is a private use governed solely by convention and agreement of the parties; (2) that the particular ordinance is unreasonable and therefore invalid; (3) that the provision of the ordinance making the maximum and minimum rate the same and at the same time denying consumers the right which it gives to the producer to apply for a change or reduction of rate is unconstitutional and void.

[1] 1. The contention advanced by appellant under this head may be summarily disposed of. Its position is, in effect, that it is the use which the consumer makes of the commodity furnished which constitutes the test as to whether or not the regulatory powers of boards and commissions in dealing with public utilities may be invoked. Such, however, is not the test. Generally speaking, the public utility can and does have no interest in or control over the commodity which it furnishes when it has passed into the possession of the consumer. It is the duty which the purveyor or producer has undertaken to perform on behalf of and so owes to the public generally, or to any defined portion of it, as the purveyor of a commodity, or as an agency in the performance of a service, which stamps the purveyor or the agency as being a public service utility. Of course, it is true that if A. has erected a power plant and has agreed to sell a portion of his electricity to his neighbor B., he is not devoting his property to a public service. But if A. shall have erected his power plant and shall have offered to sell his power to the whole or a defined portion of the community, he is, to that extent, devoting his property to a public use and has brought it within the regulatory police powers of the state. This we conceive to be not only fundamentally true, but is the declared view of this court in Clark v. City of Los Angeles, 160 Cal. 30, 116 Pac. 722.

No question can exist as to the power of the city of Los Angeles in the matter of the regulation of such public service corporations. It is expressly conferred by article 1, § 2, subd. 30, of the charter of the city of Los Angeles. (Amend. March 25, 1911.)

[2, 3] 2. Under this head appellant asserts the indisputable proposition that courts will declare void ordinances which are unreasonable and oppressive in their attempted exercise of the police power. We need not refer to the cases which are cited, since no one of them deals with the rate-fixing and regulation. Appellant asserts, however, that the only reasonable use of the police power in the matter of rate-fixing is to establish the maximum charge which the public utility may make, leaving it open to the public utility by agreement to fix a less charge for an individual consumer. The untenableness of this position, however, must become apparent when a moment's consideration is given to the fact that one of the primary and most important objects to be attained by rate regulation is the prevention of discrimination. It must be quite clear that to hold that the rate-fixing power goes no farther than to name an amount beyond which a charge may not be made leaves the utmost room for abuse by way of favoritism and discrimination within that limit. It is, in practical effect, a denial of the existence of the rate-fixing power itself. Moreover, while the public utility is bound to render the service or furnish the commodity, an individual member of the public is not compelled to accept the service or use the commodity. If he does so, it is conclusively held that his act is an acceptance of the rate fixed and that he may not thereafter contest the reasonableness of the rate. Brooklyn Union Gas Co. v. City of New York, 188 N. Y. 334, 81 N. E. 141, 15 L. R. A. (N. S.) 763, 117 Am. St. Rep. 868; Griffith v. Vicksburg Waterworks Co., 88 Miss. 371, 40 South. 1011, 8 Ann. Cas. 1130. This salutary rule applies with peculiar force to the condition existing in Los Angeles, where the charter itself provides that any person interested in the rate-fixing may file his objections and be given a hearing thereon before final action. Charter of Los Angeles, § 155, subd. 2; amend. of 1911.

[4] 3. Under the third proposition appellant contends that section 5 of the ordinance is unconstitutional. That section provides as follows:

"It shall be unlawful for any person, firm or corporation * * * to charge, demand, collect or receive any rate or compensation for electric current for lighting or power purposes supplied * * * to the city of Los Angeles, or to any inhabitant thereof, less than the rates fixed by this ordinance, unless an application for a reduction in such rate is made by the person, firm or corporation so supplying such electric current for lighting or power purposes and the consent of the board of public utilities thereto is obtained, in the manner hereinafter provided."

The argument is that the provision allowing the public service utility to apply for a reduction of rates during the life of the ordinance and denying that right to the consumer is clearly discriminatory and a denial to the consumer of the equal protection of the law. Herein reliance is placed upon the decision of Saratoga Springs v. Saratoga Gas Co., 191 N. Y. 123, 83 N. E. 693, 18 L. R. A. (N. S.) 713, 14 Ann. Cas. 606. The statute under consideration in that action empowered a commission to fix the maximum price to be charged for gas or electricity in the municipality for a term of three years "and until, after the expiration of such term, such commission shall, upon complaint as provided in this section, again fix the price of such gas or electricity."

> "No opportunity or right," says the opinion, "is given to the corporation to apply, at the end of three years or at any time thereafter, for a new adjustment of the rates. That right is limited solely to the municipal officials or consumers."

The Court of Appeals of New York held that such a statute so fixing the rate for a fixed period of three years and for an indefinite period thereafter, which rate could not be modified or disturbed at the instance of the producer, denied to such producer the equal protection of the law. Appellant argues that the ordinance here under consideration presents the exact converse of this proposition; that it allows the purveyor to make application for reduction within the year's life of the ordinance, but denies that right to the consumer. But the cases are in no real sense parallel, as will appear not only on principle, but from a further consideration of the New York decision. In this case is presented an ordinance fixing the rate for the defined and limited period of one year. Every consumer has been given an opportunity to be heard before the rate was fixed and the right or privilege, whichever it may be called, that is accorded to the public service utility within the year, is a right or privilege making clearly for the benefit of the consumer himself, since that right or privilege is limited to a request for a reduction of the rate, which reduction, if granted, would benefit and not injure every consumer. The New York case, however, was a case where by statute the rate was fixed for an indefinite period of time with no right whatsoever to the public utility to be heard upon application for any modification of the rate. The New York Court of Appeals found no difficulty in upholding the law in so far as it denied the gas company the right to be heard in the matter of refixing the rates for the fixed period of three years. It was the denial of the right to be heard for the indefinite period thereafter, with the right, however, to the consumer so to be heard, which was held to be a denial of the equal protection of the law.

> "For," says that court, "we have no difficulty in upholding the provision that the rate would remain as established for the term of three years. It is urged that circumstances might so alter that before the expiration of the three years a rate which was reasonable at the time it was established would become unreasonable. This is possible. Nevertheless we think the Legislature was justified in enacting some period of repose during which the rate should remain stable."

To sum up on this matter, therefore, it may be said in conclusion that the period of stability and repose fixed by this ordinance is one year. The consumer had an opportunity to be heard before the rate was finally fixed. The provision allowing the public utility to petition for a reduction of the rate is one as clearly designed for the benefit of the consumer as of the company itself. No want of equal protection of the law is here shown. Quite different would be the case if the company were allowed to petition for an increase of rate during the life of the ordinance without an opportunity to the consumer to be heard upon the question of its maintenance or reduction. It appears clear therefore that the contention that the appellant is denied the equal protection of the law under the charter and ordinance here under consideration is unfounded.

[5] A word perhaps should be added touching the asserted violation of the provision of the contract between the company and plaintiff by the enforcement of the terms of the regulatory ordinance. Upon this it is sufficient to say that it will be conclusively presumed that the parties contracted in contemplation of the power of the proper board or tribunal to fix rates in every case where such power exists and may have been thereafter legally exercised. Louisville & Nashville R. R. Co. v. Mottley, 219 U. S. 467, 31 Sup. Ct. 265, 55 L. Ed. 297, 34 L. R. A. (N. S.) 671; City of Seattle v. Hurst, 50 Wash. 424, 97 Pac. 454, 18 L. R. A. (N. For these reasons the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

1. Specific Performance (§ 68*)—Contracts Enforceable — Sale of Personal Property.

The presumption created by Civ. Code, § 3387, that the breach of a contract of sale of personalty can be adequately compensated by damages, so that equity will not decree specific performance, is a disputable one, and, where facts show that pecuniary compensation will not afford adequate relief, specific performance will in a proper case be enforced.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. § 199; Dec. Dig. § 68.*]

2. Specific Performance (§ 70*)—Contracts Enforceable — Sale of Personal Property.

Where a contract to sell stock of an oil company was made when the company had no property except land, in which oil had not been discovered, and the value of the land was speculative, so that the stock had no market value, and its value could be ascertained only on the discovery of oil in the land, and in the land adjacent thereto, and the stock was owned and controlled by but few persons, and none of it was for sale, the buyer was entitled to specific performance, because of inadequacy of the remedy at law for breach of contract.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. § 203; Dec. Dig. § 70.*]

3. Specific Performance (§ 51*)—Contracts Enforceable—Sale of Personal Property—Validity of Contract.

A contract for the sale of corporate stock to be paid for by canceling the seller's debts and advancing part of the price to meet expected obligations of the seller, which he otherwise could not pay, will be specifically enforced as against the objection that it is unfair, where it appears that no advantage was taken of the seller's necessities, and the value placed on the stock was agreed on by both parties.

4. Specific Performance (§ 30*)—Contracts Enforceable—Certainty of Contracts.

A contract for the sale of corporate stock, which fixes the price, and which provides that the sum due from the seller to the buyer shall be applied on the price, and which declares that the buyer assumes one-half of the seller's indebtedness to a third person, and that the balance of the price shall be deposited subject to call, for the payment of future assessments, and that, in consideration of performance by the buyer, the seller will deliver the stock when released from a pledge to the third person, is sufficiently certain to justify specific performance, though there have been no assessments, for the deposit is due when delivery of the stock is offered, or by the terms of the contract should be offered.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. §§ 83–85; Dec. Dig. § 30.*]

5. Sales (§ 82*) — Contracts — Payment of Price.

One who buys personal property at an agreed price agrees by implication, under Civ. Code, § 1728, to pay the price, and, where no time of payment is agreed on, he must, as required by section 1784, pay at the time of delivery, and, where the time of delivery is postponed until the occurrence of some act to be done by the seller, the time of payment, if not otherwise provided for, is postponed to the time of delivery.

6. Specific Performance (§ 70*)—Contracts Enforceable — Sale of Stock — Payment of Price.

A contract of sale of corporate stock for a specified price, which recites that the seller "agrees to sell" and the buyer "agrees to buy," and which provides that the debt due from the seller to the buyer shall be applied on the price, and that the buyer agrees to assume one-half of the seller's debt to a third person and deposit the balance to meet future assessments, and that a part of the stock shall be delivered when the debt to the third person shall have been paid out of dividends received from the stock, provided that, if the dividends are insufficient to pay the debt within 18 months, the seller agrees to deliver the stock, is but an executory contract of sale, binding the buyer to pay one-half of the debt to the third person, which cannot be reduced by dividends, and the payment becomes due at the time of the delivery of the stock, and so construed the contract is sufficiently certain to support a decree of specific performance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. § 203; Dec. Dig. § 70.*]

7. Specific Performance (§ 114*) — Complaint—Sufficiency.

A complaint for specific performance of a contract to sell corporate stock, which alleges that plaintiff has duly and faithfully complied with and performed the provisions of the contract on his part, sufficiently alleges performance under Code Civ. Proc. § 457, of the conditions precedent to a recovery, especially where it further alleges a formal tender of the amount unpaid on the contract and a readiness and willingness to pay all sums due on delivery of the stock.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. §§ 356–370, 372; Dec. Dig. § 114.*]

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; Paul W. Bennett, Judge.

Action by F. C. Gilfallan against M. J. Gilfallan. From a judgment for defendant rendered after sustaining a demurrer to the amended complaint, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

L. L. Cory, of Fresno, for appellant. Rowen Irwin, of Bakersfield, and Lamberson & Lamberson and James M. Burke, all of Visalia, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The plaintiff appeals from the judgment in favor of the defendant, given after sustaining a demurrer to plaintiff's amended complaint. The object of the action was to obtain specific performance of a contract whereby the defendant agreed to sell to the plaintiff 50,000 shares of stock of the Paraffine Oil Company, a corporation. The oil company was made a party to the action, but it did not appear, and the judgment runs in favor of M. J. Gilfallan alone.

ance of a contract to sell personal property. It is true, as is declared in section 3387, Civil Code, that there is a presumption that the breach of an agreement to transfer personal property can be adequately relieved by pecuniary compensation, and that the general rule is that where adequate pecuniary compensation can be made specific performance will not be enforced and the party will be confined to his remedy at law for damages. But it is well settled in this state that the aforesaid presumption is a disputable one and that, where facts are alleged showing that pecuniary compensation will not afford adequate relief, the objection that an adequate remedy at law exists is removed and specific performance will, in proper cases, be enforced. Treasurer v. Commercial M. Co., 23 Cal. 391; McLaughlin v. Piatti, 27 Cal. 463; Senter v. Davis, 38 Cal. 459; Fleishman v. Woods, 135 Cal. 260, 67 Pac. 276; Wait v. Kern River M. Co., 157 Cal. 23, 106 Pac. 98; Sherwood v. Wallin, 1 Cal. App. 536, 82 Pac. 566.

[2] Here the complaint alleges that, at the time of the execution of the contract, the corporation had no property except 40 acres of oil land; that no oil had then been discovered thereon, and its value was speculative and uncertain; that the stock of the company consisted of 300,000 shares of the face value of one dollar each, of which defendant owned 100,000 shares; that the stock had no actual or market value, and its value could be ascertained only on the discovery of oil in the land and in land adjacent thereto; that at the time the action was begun the stock had no fixed, certain, or reasonable market value; that it was owned and controlled by but a few persons; that none of it was for sale; that its value was fluctuating and uncertain, and dependent upon the condition of the oil market from time to time and the development of said land and adjacent lands; and that plaintiff cannot elsewhere obtain the amount of stock agreed to be sold to him by the contract, for any considerable portion thereof. These circumstances remove the aforesaid presumption and bring the case within the rule declared in Treasurer v. Commercial Co., supra, where the court said:

> "In the peculiar condition of business and mining operations in this state, where numerous mining and other corporations are in existence, whose stock is often of fluctuating and uncertain value, and where certain kinds of stock have a peculiar value to those acquainted with their affairs, where the market value of stocks, if any they have, is often difficult to substantiate by competent evidence, and where the risk of the personal responsibility of individuals and corporations is so great, courts should be liberal in extending the full, adequate, and complete relief afforded by a decree of specific performance."

The showing is sufficient to justify specific performance, so far as this objection is concerned.

[3] 2. It is next claimed that the contract is unfair. In view of the allegations of the complaint, we do not think this proposition can be maintained. The plaintiff had previously loaned to the defendant $5,000 to enable her to pay her share of the cost and expenses of acquiring the oil land afterwards transferred to the corporation and comprising its entire assets, and to pay assessments previously made upon her shares of said stock. This debt had not been repaid to him. She had also borrowed $5,149.10 from one Minor and had pledged to him 60,000 shares of her stock as security for that debt, which also was then unpaid. The corporation was engaged in drilling a well for the development of the land. It was, it is alleged, not known whether the oil land would turn out to be valuable or valueless. The defendant had no means of her own, and she feared that she would be unable to meet future assessments on her stock and would consequently lose it all. She urgently requested plaintiff to buy one-half of her stock on the terms stated in the contract, and she was fully cognizant of all the facts above stated. The parties at that time estimated the value of the stock at 20 cents a share, which made the stock sold amount to a little less than the price stated in the contract. This being the situation of the parties, the agreement, in effect, was that the plaintiff would buy the 50,000 shares at the price of $10,074.55, to be paid by canceling the defendant's debt of $5,000 owing to him, by his payment of $2,574.55, being one-half of her debt to Minor, and by his payment of $2,500 in cash, delivery of 150 shares of the stock to be made at once, and the remaining 49,850 shares to be delivered as soon as the Minor debt was paid by dividends received upon the stock, or at the expiration of 18 months if the dividends did not sooner discharge said debt, and that in the meantime the sum of $2,500 was to be deposited to defendant's credit for her use in payment of any future assessments on the stock, if any should occur. There appears to be nothing unfair in a purchase of stock at the value placed upon it by both parties to be paid for by canceling the seller's present debts and by advancing part of the price to meet expected obligations of the seller which she otherwise could not pay. No advantage appears to have been taken of her necessities, and we are satisfied that the contract cannot be deemed unfair in the sense here contended.

[4] 3. It is further claimed that the contract itself is so uncertain that it is incapable of performance. This uncertainty is asserted to be in regard to the price to be paid and the time and manner of payment. It is necessary here to set out the contract in full. It is as follows:

> "This agreement, made and entered into this twenty-seventh day of October, 1908, by and between M. J. Gilfallan, of Bakersfield, Kern county, California, and F. C. Gilfallan, of Ebenezer, New York, witnesseth: That whereas, M. J. Gilfallan is the owner of one hundred thousand (100,000), shares of the capital stock of the Paraffine Oil Company, situated in the Midway district, Kern county, California, the estimated value of said stock being twenty thousand dollars ($20,000); and whereas, the said F. C. Gilfallan, has advanced to the said M. J. Gilfallan, at her special instance and request the sum of three thousand dollars ($3,000.00), and for other good and valuable considerations hereinafter set forth, the said M. J. Gilfallan agrees to sell to, and the said F. C. Gilfallan agrees to buy fifty thousand (50,000) shares of said Paraffine Oil stock from said M. J. Gilfallan, for the sum of ten thousand and seventy-four dollars and fifty-five cents ($10,074.55), said stock to be delivered to F. C. Gilfallan and to be paid for by him as follows:

"In addition to the sum of three thousand dollars ($3,000.00) already advanced to M. J. Gilfallan by F. C. Gilfallan, and the acknowledgment of an indebtedness of the further sum of two thousand dollars ($2,000) due the said F. C. Gilfallan from M. J. Gilfallan which said indebtedness shall be applied as a two thousand dollar ($2,000.00) payment on the purchase price of said stock. The said F. C. Gilfallan hereby further agrees to assume and pay one-half of the sum of five thousand one hundred and forty-nine dollars and ten cents ($5,149.10) (or the sum of $2,574.55), now due and owing to T. H. Minor from M. J. Gilfallan, under and by virtue of that certain agreement made and entered into by the said T. H. Minor and M. J. Gilfallan, and dated at Bakersfield, California, on August 13, 1907, and supplemented by an agreement between the same parties made on the eighteenth day of June, 1908, and to deposit the further sum of two thousand five hundred dollars ($2,500.00) to the credit of M. J. Gilfallan, and subject to her call, for the payment of future assessments which may be placed against said stock, and in consideration of the performance of the above covenants on the part of said F. C. Gilfallan, the said M. J. Gilfallan hereby agrees to deliver to the said F. C. Gilfallan one hundred and fifty (150) shares of said Paraffine Oil stock, at the time of the signing of this agreement, and to deliver to the said F. C. Gilfallan the remainder of said one-half of said stock (or 49,850 shares), when the said indebtedness of five thousand one hundred and forty-nine dollars and ten cents ($5,149.10) due to T. H. Minor, as above set forth, shall have been paid out of the dividends being received from said stock, and the said T. H. Minor shall have returned to the said M. J. Gilfallan the 60,000 shares of Paraffine Oil stock held by him as collateral security for the payment of said sum of five thousand one hundred and forty-nine dollars and ten cents ($5,149.10) as evidenced by the above mentioned agreements heretofore made and entered into between T. H. Minor and M. J. Gilfallan. It is understood and agreed between the parties to this agreement that should the dividends now being paid on said 100,000 shares of stock, and now being applied to pay off the indebtedness of $5,149.10 due to T. H. Minor from M. J. Gilfallan be insufficient to pay off the said indebtedness within the period of eighteen months from this date, then the said M. J. Gilfallan agrees to immediately deliver the above mentioned 49,850 shares of said Paraffine stock to F. C. Gilfallan. It is further understood and agreed that all the covenants of this agreement shall bind the heirs and assigns of the respective parties."

[5] There is no uncertainty as to the price to be paid. It is clearly stated to be $10,074.55. The manner of payment is in part fixed by the contract and in part left to implication of law. Considering the two together, there is no uncertainty. The $5,000 due from defendant to plaintiff was to be applied upon the price. Plaintiff expressly agreed to assume and pay $2,574.55, being one-half of the Minor debt under the terms of defendant's contract with Minor. This left $2,500 of the price, for the payment of which the contract made no provision. The deposit to her call was not declared to be a payment, but a deposit in trust for a specific purpose; that is, to meet future assessments. There having been no future assessments, the trust was left without any object. This, however, leaves no fatal uncertainty with respect to the payment of this remainder. Where one buys personal property at an agreed price, he, by implication of law, agrees to pay the price, and, if no time of payment is agreed upon, the law fixes the time of delivery as the time of payment. Civ. Code, §§ 1728, 1784; Cole v. Swanston, 1 Cal. 54, 52 Am. Dec. 288; Blackwood v. Cutting Co., 76 Cal. 215, 18 Pac. 248, 9 Am. St. Rep. 199; Veerkamp v. Hulburd, 58 Cal. 230, 41 Am. Rep. 265; Armsby Co. v. Blum, 137 Cal. 556, 70 Pac. 669. And if the time of delivery is postponed until the occurrence of some act to be done by the seller, the time of payment, if not otherwise provided for, will be postponed, by implication of law, to the time of such delivery. 2 Mechem on Sales, §§ 1407, 1408, 1409. This rule obviously applies to cases where the time of payment of part of the price is specifically fixed and the time of the payment of the remainder is left unprovided for. The payment of this $2,500 was therefore due when delivery of the stock was offered, or by the terms of the contract should have been offered.

The statement immediately succeeding the provision for the deposit, that "in consideration of the performance of the above covenants" the defendant agreed to deliver the stock as soon as it was released from the pledge, is not inconsistent with this construction. That clause refers only to the delivery of the stock. It does not affect the implied promise to pay on such delivery the part of the price then remaining unpaid.

[6] Greater difficulty is found in ascertaining from the agreement and attending circumstances the intention of the parties with regard to the payment of one-half of the Minor debt. This sum of $2,574.55 is necessary to make up the agreed price. The agreement to assume and pay it is clear, distinct, and entirely unqualified. It is not made to depend upon the circumstance, also appearing in the contract, that the dividends to be paid on the 100,000 shares of stock were to be applied to pay that debt. The fact that such dividends were to be so applied appears by way of recital in the clause specifying the time of delivery of the 50,000 shares sold to plaintiff. 10,000 shares of the 50,000 sold to plaintiff were in Minor's custody under the pledge and could not be delivered, absolutely, until they were redeemed. Recognizing this, the contract provided that the entire delivery, except of 150 shares, should await such redemption, unless the time should run beyond eighteen months, in which case delivery was to be made at the expiration of that time. The defendant's argument is that the recital that the remainder of the stock sold should be delivered when the $5,149.10 due Minor "shall have been paid out of the dividends being received from said stock," and the subsequent reference to "the dividends now being paid on said 100,000 shares of stock and now being applied to pay off" the debt to Minor, are, in effect an agreement that if the dividends proved to be sufficient to pay that debt, the price to be paid by plaintiff was to be abated in the sum of $2,574.55; in other words, that one-half of the dividends were to inure to the benefit of the plaintiff in the payment of the price, and that this is so contradictory of the previous express agreement that it renders the contract uncertain and consequently unenforceable. We do not think these recitals were so intended, or that, when considered in connection with the context, the circumstances stated, and the law on the subject, they should be so construed. The contract contains no statement that the plaintiff was to participate in the stock dividends prior to the delivery of the stock, or that he was to have any interest therein. Neither does it provide that title to the stock is to pass to him before delivery. In form it is not an executed agreement effecting a present sale of the property, but is an executory agreement to sell; the expression being that the defendant "agrees to sell" and that the plaintiff "agrees to buy." The buyer would not be legally entitled to dividends upon the stock in the absence of any agreement to that effect, until the legal title to the stock had passed to him. Upon an executory agreement to buy and sell personal property, title does not pass to the buyer until delivery is made to him or is due to him and is offered to be made, unless there is something in the contract specifying or implying a different intention, which is not the case here. Civ. Code, § 1141; Hallidie v. Sutter Street R. Co., 63 Cal. 576; 35 Cyc. 275. The dividends paid to the pledgee would therefore inure entirely to the benefit of the defendant, in whom title was vested, and they would operate as a payment by her alone upon the debt to Minor. In contemplation of law, the plaintiff would not have paid anything on the Minor debt by virtue of these dividends. He would still remain bound by the terms of the contract to pay one-half of the amount thereof to defendant as a part of the agreed price. Under the rule mentioned in discussing the $2,500 payment, this payment of one-half of the Minor debt by the plaintiff would become due and payable at the time of the delivery of the stock, since there is no provision for its payment at any other time. The payment thereof by the dividends made performance of the contract immediately possible and removed all uncertainty both as to the amount the plaintiff was to pay and as to the time and manner of such payment.

[7] A further objection is made that the complaint does not show performance on the part of the plaintiff sufficient to entitle him to demand performance of the defendant. The complaint contains the allegation that the plaintiff has duly and faithfully complied with and performed each and all of the provisions of said contract on his part to be kept and performed. Under section 457, Code of Civil Procedure, this is a sufficient allegation of the performance of all the conditions precedent. The complaint further alleges a formal tender to the defendant of the full amount unpaid upon the contract and a readiness and willingness to pay all sums due upon delivery of the stock. These allegations we think sufficient to answer the objection. The court erred in sustaining the demurrer.

The judgment is reversed.

KOHN v. SACRAMENTO ELECTRIC, GAS & RY. CO. et al. (Sac. 2051.)

1. CORPORATIONS (§ 472*)—BONDS—NEGOTIABILITY.

While Civ. Code, § 3095, enumerates bonds as a class of negotiable instruments, bonds payable to bearer, which recited that they were secured by a mortgage, which was made a part thereof, and which provided a complicated scheme for foreclosure, and that the trustee and bondholders should look solely to the assets secured by the mortgage, which should not embrace claims enforceable by creditors against stockholders, directors, or officers of the corporation issuing the bonds, are not negotiable, for section 3093 provides that negotiable instruments must not contain any contract other than those permitted by the provisions of the chapter of which it is a part, and section 3088, which is a part of that chapter, declares that a negotiable instrument must be made payable in money only, and without any condition not certain of fulfillment except that it may provide for the payment of attorney's fees and costs of suit; and bonds are governed by the same rules as notes.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1837, 1839, 1841; Dec. Dig. § 472.*]

2. CORPORATIONS (§ 247*)—STOCKHOLDERS—LIABILITY.

A stockholder's liability may be waived by contract.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 983-997; Dec. Dig. § 247.*]

3. CUSTOMS AND USAGES (§ 10*)—EFFECT.

Custom, while important in assisting in the interpretation of statutes, cannot overcome the positive provisions of statutes.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Customs and Usages, Cent. Dig. §§ 11-21, 35-39; Dec. Dig. § 10.*]

4. ASSIGNMENTS (§§ 23, 100*)—EFFECT.

Under the direct provisions of Civ. Code, § 1459, a nonnegotiable written contract for the payment of money or property may be transferred by indorsement as negotiable instruments, but the assignee takes it subject to all equities and defenses in favor of the maker against the assignor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Assignments, Cent. Dig. §§ 40, 41, 177, 180; Dec. Dig. §§ 23, 100.*]

5. Corporations (§ 473*)—Bonds—Purchasers—Notice.

A purchaser of bonds is bound to take notice of all the recitals therein.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1842–1853, 1855; Dec. Dig. § 473.*]

6. Corporations (§ 425*)—Bonds—Validity—Equitable Estoppel.

Where a defendant, upon issuing bonds secured by a mortgage, which was referred to and made a part of the bonds, delivered a number to a trustee for the purpose of retiring other bonds, and an officer of the trustee wrongfully obtained possession and sold them to purchasers, who made no inquiry as to his right, defendant is not estopped to set up their invalidity, where they were not negotiable, though payable to bearer, for the officer was not given possession of the bonds by defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1697–1701, 1705; Dec. Dig. § 425.*]

7. Corporations (§ 472*)—Bonds—Negotiability.

The fact that an officer of the corporation issuing bonds believed them to be negotiable will not render them negotiable, where they were not so according to their terms.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; C. N. Post, Judge.

Action by Isaack Kohn against the Sacramento Electric, Gas & Railway Company and others and the Mutual Savings Bank and another, which cross-complained. From a judgment for plaintiff and cross-complainants, the first-named defendants appeal. Reversed.

Wm. B. Bosley, of San Francisco, L. T. Hatfield, of Sacramento, and Morrison & Brobeck and Morrison, Dunne & Brobeck, all of San Francisco, for appellants. D. Freidenrich, Gavin McNab, B. M. Aikins, George W. Mordecai, Oliver B. Wyman, J. C. McKinstry, D. C. Murphy, and Lilienthal, McKinstry & Raymond, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

MELVIN, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff and certain cross-complainants in an action based upon bonds and interest coupons of the Sacramento Electric, Gas & Railway Company secured by a mortgage upon the real and personal property of said corporation. California Gas & Electric Corporation and Pacific Gas & Electric Company were made defendants because they successively acquired the interests of the Sacramento Electric, Gas & Railway Company; the California Gas & Electric Corporation having been also absorbed by the Pacific Company. The interests of the two respondent banks and of the plaintiff, Mr. Kohn, are practically identical; all depending upon possession and ownership of bonds and coupons. The Mercantile Trust Company appears as the successor of California Safe Deposit & Trust Company, an insolvent corporation, of which the Mercantile has become the trustee.

There is no substantial dispute regarding the facts. Sacramento Electric, Gas & Railway Company issued 2,500 bonds of the par value of $1,000 each, and they each had semiannual interest coupons attached. Concurrently with the execution of these bonds and to secure their payment, the Sacramento Company executed and delivered to the California Safe Deposit & Trust Company a trust mortgage, hypothecating certain street railways, franchises, lands, and other property. Indorsed upon each of 2,070 of these bonds, bearing serial numbers from 1 to 2,070, was a certificate by said California Safe Deposit & Trust Company that such bond was one of the aforesaid 2,500 bonds secured by the mortgage therein mentioned. Pursuant to the provisions contained in said trust mortgage, 1,805 of said bonds, bearing serial numbers from 1 to 1,805, were duly issued and sold. Two hundred and sixty-five of said bonds, bearing serial numbers from 1,806 to 2,070, both numbers included, were delivered to said California Safe Deposit & Trust Company, as trustee, upon a special trust for the purpose of retiring 315 outstanding bonds of the Central Electric Railway Company which had been absorbed by the Sacramento Company. J. Dalzell Brown, an officer of the California Safe Deposit & Trust Company, feloniously took 65 of these bonds from said corporation, and through the offices of Allen Griffiths obtained certain loans nominally for said Griffiths, but really for Brown's benefit. In this way $25,000 were paid by the plaintiff Isaack Kohn upon the security of 25 of these bonds and coupons which Brown had thus dishonestly obtained. Twenty of the bonds were deposited with the Western National Bank of San Francisco to secure a loan of $17,500 borrowed by Griffiths for and by direction of Brown, and the remaining 20 bonds were delivered to the Mutual Savings Bank as collateral security for another loan to Griffiths for Brown. None of this borrowed money ever was credited in any manner to the Sacramento Electric, Gas & Railway Company or to any of the appellants. When Mr. Kohn accepted the bonds from Griffiths, he made no investigation regarding them except that he asked Griffiths if the bonds were his own or the property of a banking corporation of which Griffiths was an officer. Griffiths replied that the bonds were his own. Neither of the other respondents made any inquiry regarding the bonds at or before the time of taking said securities. To them Griffiths represented, as he did to Kohn, that he owned the bonds. To the respondents from time to time he paid interest upon the promissory notes which he had given them and received the coupons for accrued interest up to and including November 1, 1907. At the time this action was commenced, there were due to the respondents from Griffiths upon his promissory notes the following sums: To respondent Kohn $25,000, with interest from October 22, 1907; to respondent Western National Bank $12,500, with interest from September 30, 1907; and to respondent Mutual Savings Bank $14,500, with interest from October 29, 1907. About May 1, 1908, the respondents demanded payment upon the 65 bonds held by them as collateral security for the notes of Griffiths, and payment was refused by the Sacramento Electric, Gas & Railway Company. In 1908, and before the commencement of this action, Mercantile Trust Company of San Francisco was appointed trustee under the trust mortgage, succeeding California Safe Deposit & Trust Company, which had been declared insolvent. In 1908 Sacramento Electric, Gas & Railway Company notified respondents that the bonds had been feloniously taken from the custody of the California Safe Deposit & Trust Company. The respondents proceeded to foreclose the pledges made by Griffiths and bought in the bonds themselves at the foreclosure sale. The court found, however, that they were pledgees, not owners. The court also found that, "at all times mentioned herein, the bonds and coupons thereto attached, of the kind issued as aforesaid, by Sacramento Electric, Gas & Railway Company, when certified to by the trustee under the trust mortgage or deed of trust, are and were treated and dealt in as negotiable instruments by the mercantile world generally and more particularly by bankers and bond buyers and such is and has at all times been the usage of the mercantile world in California"; that it was the intent of the Sacramento Electric, Gas & Railway Company that the bonds and coupons should be negotiable; that said corporation always so considered them; and that respondents had each acted with reliance upon the representations contained in the bonds and coupons and upon the said usage of the mercantile world. The superior court's conclusions of law were that the bonds are negotiable instruments; that respondents hold them as pledges subject to the amounts owed by Griffiths to respondents; that the Mercantile Trust Company is entitled to the possession of the said bonds, subject only to the lien of the pledges upon which they are held by the respondents; that each of the appellants has the right to redeem the bonds by paying to respondents the amount still owed to the latter by Griffiths on his promissory notes; that respondents are entitled to the foreclosure of the trust mortgage to enforce payment of all coupons and bonds, unless appellants shall exercise their right to redeem; and that appellants are entitled to judgment for the surrender and delivery of the 65 bonds and interest coupons upon effecting redemption from the said lien.

The bonds and coupons are upon their faces payable to bearer. It is set forth upon the bonds that the payment of principal and interest is secured by a mortgage, the date of which is given, and the names of the mortgagor and the trustee are given, as well as a general reference to the mortgaged property. Each bond also contains the following statement: "This bond is issued subject to all the provisions contained in said mortgage." The bond contains a provision that upon default in the payment of interest or default in the payment of taxes or of any agreement or promise set forth in the mortgage, if such default or defaults continue for the time specified in the mortgage, the principal of the bond shall, at the option of the trustee or the holders of a majority of the outstanding bonds, become immediately due and payable. By the terms of the mortgage itself similar optional rights of declaring the principal due, after default, are given, and the mortgage gives to the holders of 80 per cent. of the outstanding bonds the optional right to waive "any default on the part of the electric company."

[1-5] It is the contention of appellants that the bonds being supported by a mortgage containing conditions not certain of fulfillment and notice of the mortgage, and its conditions appearing upon the bonds and coupons themselves, the bonds are not and cannot be negotiable instruments. In other words, appellants rely upon the rule announced in Meyer v. Weber, 133 Cal. 685, 65 Pac. 1110, and emphasized in later decisions, notably National Hardwood Co. v. Sherwood, 165 Cal. 5, 130 Pac. 881, that a note secured by a mortgage on land, both being executed at the same time as part of one transaction, is not negotiable in law, even if negotiable in form, where the purchaser takes it with knowledge of the existence of the mortgage. It is the belief of counsel for appellants that bonds come under the same rule. Both promissory notes and bonds are listed by the Code as among the six classes of negotiable instruments (Civ. Code, § 3095); yet a promissory note loses its negotiability when conditions not certain of fulfillment are introduced into it. Civ. Code, § 3088. There is no essential difference between the two kinds of instruments, and we see no escape from the logic of the position of appellants that a bond like a note, if dependent upon a mortgage, is subject to all equitable defenses against a holder with notice. The bonds sued upon are payable, not upon the general credit of the maker (Civ. Code, § 3088), but out of a specific fund, for it is provided that neither the trustee nor any bondholder shall have recourse to any personal, statutory, or constitutional liability against any stockholder, director, or officer of the Sacramento Electric, Gas &

Railway Company; that the trustee or bondholder shall look for payment "solely to the coporate assets and franchises of the mortgagor"; and that these assets shall not embrace claims enforceable by creditors, a receiver, or the mortgagor itself against a stockholder, director, or officer of that corporation or against a stockholder by reason of any alleged insufficiency in the payment for shares of stock. Such provisions are at war with the idea of negotiability. It is argued that this part of the contract absolving stockholders from individual liability is unconstitutional, but we are of the opinion that a stockholder's liability may be waived by contract. Wells v. Black, 117 Cal. 161, 48 Pac. 1090, 37 L. R. A. 619, 59 Am. St. Rep. 162.

It is argued that bonds have been so long treated as negotiable instruments that the courts must respect the custom of the country and must make the letter of the statutes bend to it. Custom is often very important, it is true, in assisting courts to interpret statutes properly, but it never overcomes the positive provisions of statutes. Section 3093 of the Civil Code provides that a negotiable instrument must not contain any contract other than such as are permitted by the sections of title 15, c. 1, art. 1, of that Code. The bonds here considered are not negotiable under the law merchant, in view of that test. There are many expressions in statutes and opinions to the effect that bonds are now generally treated as negotiable instruments, but many of these statements have reference to the abolition of the old distinction between sealed and unsealed instruments. In Comstock v. Breed, 12 Cal. 288, it was declared that the old unmeaning distinction between sealed and unsealed instruments had been determined by statute, and that it was "the design of the Legislature to place bonds and notes on the same footing in respect to defenses." It is true that the old common-law rule with reference to assignability of things in action has long since been abrogated and has been succeeded by one more liberal, which, while it permits securities to pass from hand to hand in business transactions, does not make them negotiable to the extent of cutting off the equities of their makers. Section 1459 of the Civil Code thus formulates the modern rule:

> "A nonnegotiable written contract for the payment of money or personal property may be transferred by indorsement, in like manner with negotiable instruments. Such indorsement shall transfer all the rights of the assignor under the instrument to the assignee, subject to all equities and defenses existing in favor of the maker at the time of the indorsement."

Certificates of mining stock and controller's warrants pass readily from hand to hand by assignment; yet the transferee takes them subject to all legal and equitable defenses. Barstow v. Savage Mining Co., 64 Cal. 392, 1 Pac. 349, 49 Am. Rep. 705; Craig v. Hesperia Land & Water Co., 113 Cal. 13, 45 Pac. 10, 35 L. R. A. 306, 54 Am. St. Rep. 316; National Bank of D. O. Mills & Co. v. Herold, 74 Cal. 606, 16 Pac. 507, 5 Am. St. Rep. 476; Wall v. Monroe, 103 U. S. 77, 26 L. Ed. 430. It has been decided by the Supreme Court of the United States that purchasers of municipal bonds are bound to take notice of all of the recitals therein. McClure v. Township of Oxford, 94 U. S. 432, 24 L. Ed. 129. There seems to be no good reason why bonds should be placed in a class governed by different principles than those applicable to notes.

Counsel for the appellants cite with confidence the case of McClelland v. Norfolk Southern R. R. Co., 110 N. Y. 471, 18 N. E. 237, 1 L. R. A. 299, 6 Am. St. Rep. 397. That case greatly resembled the one at bar. It was a suit on certain coupons, to which an equitable defense was interposed. The bonds from which the coupons were cut showed that they depended upon a certain mortgage, and the mortgage contained provision for declaring the principal of the bonds due in case of certain defaults, or for postponing all payments of interest or waiving any default upon the option of a majority in interest of the holders of the bonds. The court stated the general rule that bonds payable to bearer are deemed negotiable, but declared that when such instruments contain special stipulations, and the payment of them is subject to contingencies not within the control of the holders, they lose their character as negotiable instruments and are open to any defense existing as between the original parties to the instrument. With the reasoning of the opinion in that case we fully agree. Respondents insist that the later case of Hibbs v. Brown, 190 N. Y. 172, 82 N. E. 1108, virtually overruled McClelland v. Norfolk Southern R. R. Co., but an examination of that case shows that it is not at all in conflict with the earlier decision. It was held that the authorization in the mortgage for the waiver of default in the payment of interest coupons only related to and controlled procedure under the trust indenture itself for the purpose of enforcing payment of coupons and did not for any other purpose work or permit a postponement of the time of payment. It was also held in that case that the bonds had been issued upon the general credit of the corporation, and that the exemption of the stockholders from individual liability did not render the other assets of the corporation a special fund and thus make the bonds nonnegotiable. That case also announces the rule that courts may not override the terms of a statute when finally interpreted, and we feel committed to the interpretation of the pertinent sections of the Civil Code as given in Meyer v. Weber, supra, National Hardwood Co. v. Sherwood, supra, and Taylor v. Jones, 165 Cal. 111, 131 Pac. 114.

[6] If the bonds had been stolen from the

vaults of the Sacramento Company and negotiated, that company would have a complete defense against the holder. But respondents insist that, having intrusted the California Safe Deposit & Trust Company with the bonds under circumstances clothing that company with apparent power of complete disposition thereof, the Sacramento Electric, Gas & Railway Company is estopped to deny the authority of an officer of that company to dispose of them. There are many authorities supporting the doctrine that, where one of two innocent persons must suffer, the loss should be borne by the one whose conduct made possible the fraud or crime by which the other was deceived. The very recent case of National Safe Deposit & Trust Co. v. Hibbs, 229 U. S. 391, 33 Sup. Ct. 818, 57 L. Ed. 1241, is cited in that behalf. In that case Myers, a trusted employé of the Safe Deposit Company, with the consent of that corporation, obtained certain stock certificates which had been deposited by one Kelley as collateral security for a loan. Each certificate contained an assignment with power of attorney to transfer the stock upon the books of the company. This was signed by Kelley, whose signature was duly attested. It was customary, in the usual course of business, for Myers to procure from one of the officers of the bank, and to deliver to any customer paying a loan, the collateral security pledged for such loan. At his own request he obtained possession of the certificates belonging to Kelley, and by means of the assignment in blank sold them, through the offices of a broker, to Hibbs. The pledgee sued the latter, and the Supreme Court of the United States held that the loss should not fall upon the purchaser in good faith. In that case, however, the court found that the broker obtained the certificates "with all the indicia of ownership" from one "who had possession with the bank's consent and who brought the certificates to him apparently clothed with the full ownership thereof." After discussing the principle that an instrument indorsed in blank and stolen before it had been transferred would be taken subject to the equities, Mr. Justice Day, who handed down the opinion of the court, used this language:

> "The qualification of the rule, as not applying when the instrument is stolen, is not based upon the name of the agent's crime, but upon the fact that, in the ordinary and typical case of theft, the owner has not intrusted the agent with the document, and therefore is not considered to have done enough to be estopped as against a purchaser in good faith. He certainly has not done enough if the estoppel is based upon the principle that, when one of two innocent persons is to suffer, the sufferer should be the one whose confidence put into the hands of the wrongdoer the means of doing the wrong. But, in the case like the present, the agent has been intrusted with the converted property, and it is totally immaterial whether, by a stretch which extends larceny beyond the true field of trespass, his wrong has been brought within the criminal law or not. The ground of the estoppel is present, and the estoppel arises. The distinction is not new. On the one side are cases like Knox v. Eden Musee American Co., 148 N. Y. 441, 42 N. E. 988, 31 L. R. A. 779, 51 Am. St. Rep. 700, where an agent or servant simply had access to a document remaining in the possession of the owner; on the other, cases like Pennsylvania R. Co.'s Appeal, 86 Pa. 80, where possession is intrusted to the agent for one purpose and he uses it for another. It cannot matter in the latter class that the agent intended the fraud from the outset."

In the case at bar Brown was not intrusted with these special bonds. The California Safe Deposit & Trust Company was the trustee. True, Brown was an officer of that corporation, but he did not take the bonds with the consent either of the bank or the electric company. Neither did the bonds bear "every evidence of title and transferability upon them," but they bore the recitals that they were secured by a mortgage and subject to all the provisions of said mortgage. The purchaser was thus put upon his inquiry. If he had made some investigation and had been informed by the electric company that Brown was clothed with full power to act for that corporation, he might then invoke the rule that the more negligent of two innocent persons must suffer for the wrongful act of a third. Civ. Code, § 3543; Helmer v. Parsons, 18 Cal. App. 452, 123 Pac. 356. This distinction is well settled in California. One of the leading cases on the subject is Barstow v. Mining Co., 64 Cal. 389, 1 Pac. 349, 49 Am. Rep. 705, in which it is held that a thief may not impart title to nonnegotiable instruments like certificates of stock. It was there declared that the court was of the opinion:

> "That the principle that the thief of the stolen property (it not being money or negotiable securities) can pass no title should be maintained, unless the facts presented by a case should bring it within the law as stated in McNeil v. Tenth National Bank, 46 N. Y. 325 [7 Am. Rep. 341]: 'Where the owner of property confers upon another an apparent title to, or power of disposition over, it, he is estopped from asserting his title as against an innocent third party, who has dealt with the apparent owner in reference thereto, without knowledge of the claims of the true owner.'"

See, also, Swin v. Wilson, 90 Cal. 127, 27 Pac. 33, 13 L. R. A. 605, 25 Am. St. Rep. 110; Coolidge v. Austin, 22 Cal. App. 337, 134 Pac. 357.

Upon the facts in this case, and under the authorities cited above, we cannot see that respondents may avail themselves of the doctrine of estoppel.

[7] No other alleged errors require particular attention except the contention that the intent of the payer was to make the bonds negotiable. There was some evidence regarding such intent, but it was not sufficient to nullify the terms of the instruments themselves. The fact that an officer of the company believed the bonds to be negotiable does not alter their terms, which were ample notice, to all persons who might purchase any of the securities, that they were subject to all of the provisions of the mortgage.

The judgment is reversed.

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 7, 1914.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 439*)—EFFECT OF TRANSFER OF CAUSE — JURISDICTION OF LOWER COURT.

After an appeal was taken and perfected from an order setting aside a default judgment, the superior court was without jurisdiction to permit the matter to be reopened upon fortified affidavits.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 2197; Dec. Dig. § 439.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 957*)—REVIEW—DISCRETION OF LOWER COURT — SETTING ASIDE DEFAULT JUDGMENT.

An order setting aside a default judgment will not be reversed, except where an abuse of discretion is shown, and any doubt will be resolved in favor of the application to the end of securing a trial upon the merits.

3. JUDGMENT (§ 143*)—DEFAULT—OPENING—EXCUSE.

An affidavit of defendant's attorney stating that he was prevented from filing an answer in time owing to the fact that, there being other actions between the same parties, he had a conversation with plaintiff's attorney as to consolidating all the actions was insufficient as the basis of an order setting aside a default judgment; it not appearing that plaintiff's attorney consented to the consolidation, and the uncontradicted affidavit of plaintiff's attorney showing that the suggested consolidation came before the court and was denied seven days before the last day given defendant to answer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. §§ 269, 270, 272–291; Dec. Dig. § 143.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Butte County; H. D. Gregory, Judge.

Action by William Durbrow against J. P. Chesley. From an order setting aside a default judgment, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

See, also, 138 Pac. 917.

J. R. King, of Gridley, and Carlton Gray, of Oroville, for appellant. E. J. Corkin, of Gridley, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. This is an appeal from an order setting aside a default judgment. The action was claim and delivery. Summons was duly served on June 28, 1913. On July 9, 1913, the default of defendant was duly entered, and, on the same day, counsel for plaintiff appeared in court and submitted evidence in support of the complaint, and judgment was entered and recorded. Thereafter, and on the same day, defendant's attorney filed a notice of motion to set aside said judgment on the ground of mistake, inadvertence, and excusable neglect, and the court ordered plaintiff and his attorney to appear on July 15, 1913, and show cause why said motion should not be granted. The motion was supported by the affidavit of defendant and by affidavit of his attorney, E. J. Corkin, and was opposed by affidavit of plaintiff's attorney. Defendant's attorney, in his affidavit, stated that summons and complaint were handed him on June 28, 1913, and proceeds:

> "I was prevented from acting in the action owing to the fact that there were other actions between the same party, and I had a conversation with the plaintiff's attorney that all these actions would be consolidated and tried as one action, and that this was the best manner to proceed, and that when this was done all of the actions would be decided together. I further state that I have fully and fairly considered the facts in this action, and believe that J. P. Chesley has a good and substantial defense for the action, and I verily believe the same to be true."

Defendant deposed:

> "That on June 28, 1913, I gave the same [referring to the summons] to E. J. Corkin, of Corkin & Corkin, attorneys, with instructions that the same be answered in due time, and that I presumed that it had been done."

He further states that he believes he has a good and valid defense to the action, and has been so advised by his attorneys.

Plaintiff's attorney deposed that, on June 30, 1913, defendant made a motion in said action that said action and certain other actions (giving their titles) be consolidated; that plaintiff opposed said motion and the court denied the same; "that at the time said motion was denied said defendant had remaining seven days in which to appear in said action; and that since said motion was denied affiant never had any conversation whatever with said E. J. Corkin or with any of the counsel for defendant in regard to consolidating said actions, and affiant never, at any time, had any conversation with any one extending the time for said defendant to appear in said action." The motion was heard on these affidavits, on July 15, 1913, and the court on that day granted the same. Plaintiff, on the same day, filed notice of appeal from the order to this court.

[1] The following August defendant's attorneys served and filed a notice that they would move the court, at a time noticed, "that the order setting aside default judgment, and allowing the defendant in the above-entitled action to file an answer, be reconsidered, and that defendant be allowed to file an amended affidavit of merits, and to reconsider the whole matter, and, upon the affidavits filed, and the amended affidavit to be filed, and all the papers on record in this action to make a new order setting aside the default judgment, and allowing the case to be tried upon the issue alleged in the complaint and denied in the answer on file." The court granted this motion. It is not necessary further to state what appears in the record concerning the hearing of this last motion. In an opinion in the action, filed December 31, 1913, on motion by respondent to dismiss the appeal, it was very clearly pointed out that, after taking and perfecting the appeal from the order or judgment made by the superior court to this court, the superior court lost jurisdiction "to make any order or to carry out any proceedings in such action which would have the effect of vitiating the appeal or preventing the review of all alleged errors brought up by a duly prepared and authenticated record." The question now before us is confined to the record of the proceedings first taken on the motion to set aside the default judgment. The court was without jurisdiction to permit the matter to be reopened upon fortified affidavits or any new showing that was attempted to be made.

[2] It is the rule that an order setting aside a default judgment will not be reversed, except where an abuse of discretion is shown in making it (Merchants' Ad-Sign Co. v. Los Angeles, 128 Cal. 619, 61 Pac. 277); and any doubt that may exist should be resolved in favor of the application, to the end of securing a trial upon the merits. "The appellate court will, therefore, be less inclined to reverse an order granting, than one refusing, an application to open a default." Jergins v. Schenck, 162 Cal. 747, 124 Pac. 426. See, also, O'Brien v. Leach, 139 Cal. 220, 72 Pac. 1004, 96 Am. St. Rep. 105. In People v. O'Connell, 23 Cal. 282, the default judgment was set aside on motion without any affidavit or other showing. The order was reversed, the court saying:

> "The facts should be made to appear by affidavit, or other proper proof, showing that the case is one provided for by said section (sec. 68, Practice Act) to authorize the court to make the order."

In Bailey v. Taaffe, 29 Cal. 423, the order setting aside the default judgment was reversed on the ground that the affidavit in support of the motion was insufficient. In speaking of the discretion with which the trial court is clothed in such case, the court said:

> "The discretion intended, however, is not a capricious or arbitrary discretion, but an impartial discretion, guided and controlled in its exercise by fixed legal principles. It is not a mental discretion, to be exercised ex gratia, but a legal discretion, to be exercised in conformity with the spirit of the law, and in a manner to subserve, and not to impede or defeat, the ends of substantial justice."

It was also suggested, as the proper practice, though not absolutely necessary, that the applicant should exhibit to the court his proposed answer; and if the appellate court is satisfied from the showing, made on the motion, that the court below has come to an erroneous conclusion, the party complaining of the error is as much entitled to a reversal in a case like the present as in any other. In Sherman v. Jorgensen, 106 Cal. 483, 39 Pac. 863, the court said:

> "Inadvertence in the abstract is no plea upon which to set aside a default. The court must be made acquainted with the reasons for the inadvertence; and, if satisfactory, will act upon them and relieve from burdens caused by them; but, if the inadvertence is wholly inexcusable, as if it arises from gross negligence, the court will not look upon it kindly, and will have none of it."

Redding, etc., Min. Co. v. Nat. Surety Co., 18 Cal. App. 488, 123 Pac. 544, was another case where an order opening a default was reversed for insufficient showing in its support.

[3] We think the affidavit of defendant's attorney is wholly insufficient as a basis for the order. In the statement that he had a conversation with plaintiff's attorney concerning the consolidation of certain cases, not identified or shown to have any necessary relation to each other, it does not appear that plaintiff's attorney consented to such consolidation, and in the uncontradicted affidavit of plaintiff's attorney it appears that the suggested consolidation came before the court on defendant's motion and was denied seven days before the last day given defendant by law in which to answer. Conceding that such conversation occurred before the motion last referred to was made and denied, nothing was said during the conversation about extending the time in which to answer the complaint. In fact, had a consolidation of certain cases been contemplated, it would still have been the duty of defendant to answer in time. The most that can be said of the affidavit is that defendant's attorney had a conversation with plaintiff's attorney about pursuing a certain course, but nothing appears to show that any agreement or understanding grew out of the conversation. On the contrary, it appears, as already stated, by the uncontradicted affidavit of plaintiff's attorney that he opposed a consolidation, and the court refused to make the order. The excuse for not answering or otherwise appearing, it seems to us, is wholly wanting in merit, and that the trial court erred in accepting it as sufficient.

The order is reversed.

We concur: HART, J.; BURNETT, J.

24 Cal. App. 408

PEOPLE v. DESMOND. (Cr. 260.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 7, 1914.)

1. Prisons (§ 17½, New, vol. 19 Key-No. Series)—Bringing Firearms into Prison.

An information which charged that accused "did willfully and unlawfully and feloniously bring, and did aid and abet in bringing" into a county jail "a certain firearm, to wit, a loaded revolver," not being authorized by law to do so, charged an offense under Pen. Code, § 171a, making it a felony for any person not authorized by law to bring into any jail any firearms, though it was redundant in charging that accused did "aid and abet in bringing," and also that the revolver was "loaded."

2. Criminal Law (§ 511*)—Accomplice's Testimony—Corroboration—Sufficiency.

In a prosecution for bringing firearms into a jail, evidence independent of the testimony of an accomplice held sufficient to connect accused with the crime so as to meet the requirements of Pen. Code, § 1111, requiring proof independent of the testimony of an accomplice to support a conviction.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1128–1137; Dec. Dig. § 511.*]

3. Indictment and Information (§ 169*)—Issues—Proof and Variance—Evidence Admissible under Pleading.

Since Pen. Code, § 31, abrogates all distinction between accessories and principals, but makes all concerned principals, the prosecution could, under an information charging accused as principal, and also that he "aided and abetted" in its commission, show that he "advised and encouraged" its commission.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Indictment and Information, Cent. Dig. §§ 320, 535; Dec. Dig. § 169.*]

4. Witnesses (§ 268*)—Cross-Examination.

In a prosecution for bringing firearms into a jail, the issue being whether accused was connected in any way as aider, abettor, etc., the court properly refused to permit accused's counsel to ask a witness for the prosecution on cross-examination, "And (accused) did not assist you in any way in getting the gun into the jail, did he?" such being for the jury to answer, and not for the witness.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. §§ 931–948, 959; Dec. Dig. § 268.*]

5. Criminal Law (§ 1170½*)—Harmless Error—Evidence.

In a prosecution for bringing a gun into a jail, any error in permitting a district attorney to ask an accomplice whether he saw accused load the gun was rendered harmless by a negative answer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 3129–3135; Dec. Dig. § 1170½.*]

6. Criminal Law (§ 1169*)—Harmless Error—Evidence.

Where, in a prosecution for bringing firearms into a jail, a witness for the prosecution had already testified that he had an agreement with accused to get it and deliver it to him, any error in permitting him to state why he brought it into the jail was harmless.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 754, 3088, 3130, 3137–3143; Dec. Dig. § 1169.*]

7. Criminal Law (§ 782*)—Trial—Instructions.

Where accused was charged with aiding and abetting or advising and encouraging the bringing of firearms into a jail, an instruction that, if accused procured a third party to get the weapon, he would be guilty placed too great a burden on the prosecution; to "aid and abet" or "advise and encourage" falling short of "procure."

8. Prisons (§ 17½, New, vol. 19 Key-No. Series) — Crimes — Bringing Firearms into Prison.

Under Pen. Code, § 171a, making it a felony to bring firearms into a prison, jail, etc., it is immaterial that the revolver brought in was unloaded.

9. Criminal Law (§ 810*)—Trial—Instructions—Ambiguous and Misleading Instructions.

In a prosecution for bringing firearms into a jail, an instruction that, if defendant "did not himself commit the offense," but, knowing it was committed, being present, aided and abetted, or, not being present, advised and encouraged its commission, was not contradictory and meaningless; the expression "did not himself commit the offense" meaning the actual participation in the act of bringing the weapon into the jail.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1968; Dec. Dig. § 810.*]

10. Prisons (§ 17½, New, vol. 19 Key-No. Series) — Crimes — Bringing Firearms into Jail—Instructions.

In a prosecution for bringing firearms into a jail, an instruction that defendant need not have been present with the witness S. (an alleged accomplice) on the outside when the revolver was procured and brought into the jail, but, if defendant aided and abetted and received the revolver and concealed, etc., he was guilty, was not erroneous.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; W. A. Beasly, Judge.

William Desmond was convicted of bringing firearms into a jail, and he appeals. Affirmed.

B. S. Crittenden, of San Jose, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

BURNETT, J. [1] The information under which defendant was convicted charged that:

> "On or about the 11th day of February, A. D. 1913, he did willfully and unlawfully and feloniously bring, and aid and abet in bringing, into the county jail of the county of Santa Clara a certain firearm, to wit, a loaded revolver, and that the said defendant was not then or there or at all authorized by law so to do."

The accusation was brought under section 171a of the Penal Code, which makes it a felony for "any person not authorized by law" to bring "into any state prison, jail or reformatory in this state * * * any firearms, weapons or explosives of any kind." It is apparent, therefore, that the information sets forth an offense condemned by the statute. It is true that some redundancy is manifest, but this does not invalidate the information nor affect its sufficiency. For instance, the expression "and aid and abet in bringing" and the following term, "loaded," were unnecessary. "All persons concerned in the commission of a crime, * * * and whether they directly commit the act constituting the offense, or aid and abet in its commission or, not being present, have advised and encouraged its commission, * * * are principals in any crime so committed" (section 31, Pen. Code), and the distinction between an accessory before the fact and a principal in cases of felony has been abrogated, and both may be charged as principals (section 971, Pen. Code; People v. Nolan, 144 Cal. 75, 77 Pac. 774). In other words, having charged the defendant as principal, it was open to the district attorney to prove that the former actually committed the offense, or that he aided and abetted in its commission, or advised and encouraged its commission. It is also apparent that the statute does not require the weapon to be "loaded." In considering this case we may therefore disregard these superfluous features of the information.

[2] The claim is made seriously that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict. More specifically, it resolves itself into the contention that there is not sufficient corroboration of the testimony of witness J. J. Savage, who was admittedly an accomplice. In this we think appellant is in error. Savage and one Frank Cody had been arrested and committed to the county jail for an offense at Gilroy, and they were taken back to that place and sentenced to the county jail for petit larceny, and again returned to the custody of the sheriff on February 11, 1913. They were not searched at the time they were so returned. Subsequently Deputy Sheriff Buffington discovered in the sewer in the jail a pistol loaded with five shells. Savage testified that prior to said February 11th he had a conversation with defendant and that:

> "Desmond asked me about a gun; said that if he had a gun he could smoke his way out of the jail; he expected to get the cookhouse job when the cook went out. * * * Why, he told me that he would like to have the gun. I told him the gun would be worth some money. He said, 'How much?' I said, 'Three or four dollars.' He said, 'Bring it up; that is priceless.' So I went back to Gilroy, brought the gun up. * * * Q. And to whom did you deliver it? A. I delivered it to Desmond."

The record contains two statements made voluntarily by the defendant; one to Buffington, and the other to the sheriff and the district attorney. In the former he admitted that he had the weapon in his possession for some days and, in reply to the statement of Buffington, "Bill, what in the world was you doing with that gun for ten days; they say you were going to smoke up the joint and shoot your way out; Bill, would you have done that?" he answered, "Well, I don't know whether I would or not or I might have done it or I talked of doing it." In the other statement which was taken down and transcribed by the official reporter, these questions and answers appear:

> "Q. Well, now, did you have any understanding with him that he would give it to you when he came in, or how did he happen to come up and give it to you? A. He spoke to me two or three times about the gun before he brought it in at all. Q. And was it understood that you would take care of it for him? A. Well, the chances are if he got it in that he would give me the gun, and he did; the day after he got in he came and gave it to me. Q. Why wouldn't he keep it himself? A. I don't understand why. He asked me if I would use it, and I told him I didn't know; that possibly I may. * * * Q. When he brought it he brought it right to you? A. He did, sir. Q. That had already been agreed that before he went down if he brought it in he would give it to you? A. Yes."

We think the foregoing statements of defendant tend to connect him with the commission of the offense, and are sufficient to meet the requirement of section 1111 of the Penal Code. It is true that, when asked categorically, defendant denied that he encouraged, advised, or requested Savage to obtain the pistol, but the jury had the right to act upon the portion of his testimony that was more unfavorable to his cause.

[3] We can see nothing of merit in the contention that by reason of the evidence showing that defendant simply "advised and encouraged" the commission of the crime a variance was thereby created; the information containing the allegation that he "aided and abetted" in the offense. As we have already seen, he was also charged as a principal, and we can see no good reason why by virtue of said unnecessary allegation as to aiding and abetting, the people should have been precluded from showing any facts that would place the defendant in the category of principal as defined by the Code. If it had been charged simply that he committed the offense, there would be no doubt that the people would be permitted to prove that he actually brought the weapon into the jail or "aided and abetted in" or "advised and encouraged" the commission of the act, and, under the information here, we think the scope of inquiry was equally as broad. If the information had charged that the defendant had committed the offense by aiding and abetting in its commission there would be some force in appellant's contention, but no such situation is presented. We have not overlooked the claim of the Attorney General that there was evidence that the defendant "aided and abetted" in the commission of the offense, but we are satisfied the other feature is covered by the information.

The alleged errors in the rulings upon the admissibility of evidence are so inconsequential as hardly to merit attention.

[4] The objection was properly sustained to the following question asked of Savage on cross-examination: "And Mr. Desmond did not assist you in any way in getting the gun into the jail, did he?" That was for the jury to answer, and not for the witness. He was interrogated fully as to the facts, and, if his opinion as to whether the defendant's acts amounted to assistance would be admissible, it is clear that it would have been of no aid to the jury.

[5] The district attorney asked Savage this question: "Did you see Desmond load the gun?" But, even if the court erred in overruling the objection, the error was without prejudice, for the answer was: "I did not."

[6] It was clearly proper for the witness to testify that he delivered the pistol to Desmond. The conduct of defendant in receiving it would, of course, be a circumstance tending to connect him with the crime. It is obvious that no harm was done by the answer to the question: "Why did you bring that pistol into the jail, Mr. Savage?" The answer which he gave would necessarily be inferred from the facts to which he testified. Since he declared that he had an agreement with the defendant to get it and deliver it to defendant, it would quite naturally follow that his purpose in bringing the pistol into the jail was to deliver it to Desmond, and whether the question was technically objectionable or not the answer could not possibly add anything to the criminating effect of his other testimony.

[7, 8] Complaint is made of this instruction:

> "If you believe from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant procured the witness Savage to bring a revolver into the county jail, as charged in the information, and that this revolver was not loaded, but that the revolver was delivered to the defendant in the county jail by Savage accompanied by loaded shells that might be used to load the weapon, and that these shells were delivered to the defendant by Savage, along with the revolver, then I charge you that it is not necessary for you to find that the revolver when so delivered to the defendant was actually loaded at the time in order to find him guilty under the information."

The instruction, while not happily phrased, could not have prejudiced defendant. The word "procured" implied a greater burden for the prosecution than the statute demands. To be guilty of the offense charged it was not necessary for the defendant to have "procured" or induced Savage to perpetrate the act charged. To "aid and abet" or to "advise and encourage" falls short of "procure." But the substantive part of the instruction is the direction in reference to the cartridges and the unloaded pistol. What precedes is mere matter of inducement, as the manifest purpose of the instruction was to inform the jury that the circumstance of the pistol being unloaded was not sufficient to prevent a verdict of guilty if cartridges accompanied the delivery of the pistol. Of this appellant cannot justly complain, since the statute makes no distinction between a "loaded" and an "unloaded" weapon. The instruction is hypothetical in form, and does not assume any fact in dispute.

[9] Instruction 12 is subject to criticism for inaccuracy. Therein the jurors were directed that:

> "If you believe from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant did not himself commit the offense charged in the information, but that such offense was committed, and that the said defendant, knowing that such crime was to be committed, and being present, aided and abetted in its commission, or, not being present, advised and encouraged its commission, it is your duty to find him guilty of the crime charged."

If he had been charged simply as a principal, no fault could be found with said instruction. Having been accused, however, as a principal, and also as an aider and abettor, the appellant reduces the instruction to this absurdity: If you believe the offense was committed, but that the defendant did not commit it or aid and abet in its commission, but you believe furthermore that the defendant did aid and abet in its commission, you must find him guilty. We think it manifest, though, that the court intended by the expression, "did not himself commit the offense charged in the information" the actual participation in the act of bringing the weapon into the jail, and we are satisfied it was so understood by the jury. Otherwise the instruction would be contradictory and meaningless, and in that view would not warrant a reversal of the cause.

[10] Appellant inveighs with considerable warmth against this instruction:

> "It is not necessary that the defendant should have been present with the witness Savage on the outside of the county jail of Santa Clara county at the time the revolver is alleged to have been brought into said jail by said Savage, but, if you believe from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that said revolver was brought into said jail as charged in the information, and that the defendant knowingly aided and abetted in the bringing in of said revolver, and was present when the same was so brought in, and received said revolver from said Savage and concealed the same, you are justified in finding the defendant guilty."

We do not find any substantial basis for appellant's criticism. The instruction does not invade the province of the jury. No fact is assumed, and the only valid objection is that the instruction required of the people more than the law exacts. If the jurors believed the offense was committed, and that defendant aided and abetted in its commission, it was not necessary for them to go further and believe that he "concealed" the revolver in order to convict.

In this connection it may be said, also, that the action of defendant in concealing the weapon under the circumstances detailed was some evidence that he aided and abetted in the commission of the crime.

We have considered said instructions as though not given on request of appellant, although as to that the record is silent.

We have failed to discover any injustice in the conviction of defendant, and the judgment and order are therefore affirmed.

Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. C. Bates, of Alameda, for appellant. Wm. B. Bosley, John P. Coghlan, and Stanley Moore, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. Plaintiff was the owner of a building which was nearing completion. It was located on a lot in San Francisco. For several days prior to February 13, 1909, and on that day, defendant had been installing gas pipes in the basement of plaintiff's building. The said building extended from Valencia street to San Jose avenue, and from the latter thoroughfare defendant had laid a three-inch gas main which passed under the sidewalk into the basement and was carried a distance of 35 feet along joists to the floor of a light well, where it turned and was conducted near the wall of the light well to a height of 15 feet. The light well, which was about 10 feet square, was almost in the center of the building and extended the whole distance to the roof, but was itself open to the sky. Two of the storerooms of the building had been thrown into one. This large apartment was completed and had been occupied by the United States government as a branch post office for about two weeks before February 13, 1909. No other rooms in the building had been plastered and none was occupied. On the morning of February 13, 1909, about 2 o'clock the building caught fire and was almost entirely destroyed; the four walls and a portion of the room occupied by the post office being all that was left. Nearly two years later plaintiff brought this suit for damages, alleging in its complaint that defendant had negligently and carelessly omitted to fasten and construct the pipes in said building in a substantial manner or to inspect said pipes; that the main pipe fell from its support on the morning of February 13, 1909, thereby breaking the coupling and allowing large quantities of gas to escape into the plaintiff's building; and that the fire which destroyed the building was caused by the ignition of this escaping gas. The amount demanded by way of damages was $18,000. After hearing all of the evidence for the plaintiff, the court granted a nonsuit. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment of nonsuit and from the order denying a motion for a new trial.

The appellant's counsel insists that a prima facie case was established. The court found that the defendant negligently failed to strap its gas supply pipe and rested said pipe on two wooden arms, 1x3 inches, nailed to the wooden uprights of the building. There was some evidence on the part of the firemen that this was a "gas fire"; that is, that, when they arrived and found the building in flames, they recognized the fact that the gas was escaping and burning. From these circumstances appellant's counsel reasons that, the existence of a "gas fire" being shown, the burden is on the defendant to prove that the escaping and burning gas was not the cause but the result of the fire which consumed the building. In this behalf counsel cites such cases as Judson v. Giant Powder Co., 107 Cal. 552, 40 Pac. 1020, 29 L. R. A. 718, 48 Am. St. Rep. 146, and Linforth v. S. F. Gas Co., 156 Cal. 60, 103 Pac. 320, 19 Ann. Cas. 1230. In the first case it was held that proof of the explosion and consequent damage to plaintiff's property shifted the burden to defendant to prove its freedom from blame, because dynamite factories do not blow up when they are properly operated. In that case there was no doubt of the explosion itself. In the Linforth Case there was proof, partly furnished by the defendant's witnesses, that the explosion which wrecked the property of Mr. Linforth was caused by gas. The explosion being proven and its origin having been established as escaping gas, the burden shifted to defendant to show that something other than its careless installation and imperfect maintenance of the pipes caused the leak which produced the explosion. So in this case, if the origin of the fire had been established as escaping gas and its ignition, the same rule would apply. To complete that part of its case it would be necessary for plaintiff to show, either directly or circumstantially: First, that the pipe was not properly secured; Second, that its weight caused it to break away from its supports and to fall; Third, that in falling it broke from its connections, thus permitting the gas to escape into the building; Fourth, that the escaping gas was so diffused that it passed through small spaces in a door leading into the post office; Fifth, that it was there ignited, because the only burning gas jets in the building were in the post office; Sixth, that it was so diffused and ignited within 70 seconds, because it was proven that the jets in the post office would continue to burn that length of time after the shutting off of the supply at the main.

Mr. Clute, president of the plaintiff corporation, testified that, when he examined the ruins some days after the fire, he went into the basement and found the pipe broken off. The whole theory of plaintiff's case was based upon the supposed fact that the break in the pipe preceded the starting of the fire. The testimony tended to show that the gas was burning at the jets in the post office while the building was in flames. One of the firemen, George H. Thomas, said, while he was on the witness stand, that he could not be positive, but his recollection was that the gas at the jets was burning when he reached the building. At that time the fire had "a big start" and was "burning rapidly." Three of plaintiff's witnesses described flames around the connections of the meter through which the gas supply for the post office passed. This was located on the wall of the light well about 35 feet from the place where the pipe was broken. The fact that such flames were seen is absolutely at variance with plaintiff's theory that the liberated gas from the broken pipe caused the fire. Mr. Anderson, an expert witness produced by plaintiff testified, with reference to the lights around the meter:

> "If the light was burning for any length of time and kept burning persistently, of course the main could not be broken. However, there could be gas burning there during the course of the fire, because the gas pipe would be broken and the gas would exude from the gas pipes."

Part of plaintiff's theory was that the gas escaped from the broken main and entered the post office through openings in a door. The proof was that the glass part of the door had been broken but the opening had been boarded up with tongue and groove lumber, which left a space an inch and a half wide on the side of the boards. At the bottom of the door was an aperture through which mail was sometimes thrust. Through these openings the gas must have passed if the fire was caused as plaintiff contends. It must have traveled very rapidly to have caused an ignition before the lights would disappear because of lack of gas in the pipes due to the cutting off of the supply. In order that there might have been an ignition without a serious explosion, it would have been necessary that the amount of gas in the room should have greatly exceeded the amount of air. The expert so testified. He also gave this answer to the question which is quoted below:

> "Q. And if that window was boarded up—had boards nailed across it—and the only aperture was the space through which letters could be stuck that was underneath this door, you would not expect the gas to get into that room in such quantities and with such rapidity that there would be only a small explosion, would you? A. Under the conditions as you have mentioned, the window being pretty thoroughly boarded up, and no other access to that flame, why the answer certainly is that there would not be."

Yet there was no evidence of any explosion, and the testimony showed that the post office was less damaged than any other part of the building.

It will thus be seen that there was an utter failure to establish a causal connection between the only facts that may be taken as proved, namely, the insecure fastening of the pipe and the burning of the building. All the rest of plaintiff's case rested on inference piled upon inference. The building may have been set on fire by an incendiary, or a lighted cigarette dropped by a workman may have ignited débris which smoldered for hours before bursting into flame. These theories are pure conjectures; yet they are no more unsubstantial than the attempted proof that the defendant's negligence was the proximate cause of the fire. The fact that the pipe was insecurely fastened, coupled with the other facts that it was found broken after the fire and that gas was burning in the building during the conflagration, does not establish plaintiff's case. The learned judge of the trial court said:

> "As there is no evidence in this record from which I can say whether it was the burning of the building that broke the pipe or the breaking of the pipe that caused the building to be burned, the plaintiff has not made out a case."

And to quote Puckhaber v. Southern Pacific Co., 132 Cal. 364, 64 Pac. 480:

> "By proving defendant's negligence, without in some way fastening that negligence to the injury, a case is not made out."

The connecting links between the negligence and the catastrophe are wholly lacking in this case.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

O'CONNOR v. UNITED RAILROADS OF SAN FRANCISCO. (S. F. 6184.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 18, 1914.)

1. Street Railroads (§ 91*) — Injuries to Persons on Track — Liability — Negligence.

Where a street car motorman with a straight clear track ahead of him and nothing to obstruct his view of a vehicle driven in the same direction, close to the track, was running his car at a rate of speed prohibited by ordinance, and, without lessening such speed, having his car under control, or giving any warning of its approach, ran into the vehicle, the company was guilty of negligence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Street Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 190–192; Dec. Dig. § 91.*]

2. Street Railroads (§ 112*)—Injuries to Persons on Track—Actions—Evidence.

That a street car motorman ran down a vehicle proceeding in the same direction is cogent evidence of negligence, which is rarely capable of explanation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Street Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 227, 228; Dec. Dig. § 112.*]

3. Street Railroads (§ 99*) — Injuries to Persons on Track—Contributory Negligence.

A person driving along a public street close to street car tracks was required to exercise reasonable care, such as a reasonably prudent man would have exercised under the circumstances.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Street Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 209–216; Dec. Dig. § 99.*]

4. Negligence (§ 136*)—Questions for Jury.

As a general rule, whether a person has exercised ordinary care is for the jury to determine from all the circumstances surrounding him at the time.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. §§ 277–353; Dec. Dig. § 136.*]

5. Street Railroads (§ 99*) — Injuries to Persons on Track—Contributory Negligence.

It was not negligence per se, or at all, for a person to drive along the public street within a foot or 14 inches from street car tracks.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Street Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 209–216; Dec. Dig. § 99.*]

6. Street Railroads (§ 85*)—Rights of Company and Public in Street.

A street car company has no exclusive right to the portion of the street covered by its tracks, but only a right to use it in common with the public, and other vehicles have a right to travel over the entire street, including the space between the tracks, though other portions of the street are not crowded or in bad condition, subject only to the limitation that they may not unnecessarily interfere with or obstruct a car in its movement on the tracks.

7. STREET RAILROADS (§ 117*) — INJURIES TO PERSONS ON TRACK—ACTIONS—QUESTIONS FOR JURY.

It is not negligence per se for one driving on a street close to street car tracks to fail to keep a constant watch behind for an approaching car, and where one so driving looked for a car when he turned into that street, it was a question for the jury to determine, from a consideration of the reciprocal rights of the parties and the facts and circumstances of the case, including such driver's right to expect and rely upon some warning from an approaching car, whether he was negligent in failing to again look behind him while driving a distance of about 500 feet.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Street Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 239–257; Dec. Dig. § 117.*]

8. TRIAL (§ 255*)—INSTRUCTIONS—NECESSITY OF REQUESTS.

While the trial court, in charging that the violation of a city ordinance, forbidding street cars to run at a greater speed than 10 miles an hour, was negligence per se should have defined the expression "negligence per se," the failure to do so was not error, in the absence of any request for an instruction defining such term.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 627–641; Dec. Dig. § 255.*]

9. STREET RAILROADS (§ 91*) — OPERATION — NEGLIGENCE "PER SE."

The violation of a municipal ordinance forbidding street cars to run at a greater speed than 10 miles an hour was negligence "per se," or, as those words mean, "of itself."

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 6, p. 5226.]

10. TRIAL (§ 256*)—INSTRUCTIONS—NECESSITY OF REQUESTS.

Since an instruction that the violation of a city ordinance was negligence per se was correct so far as it went, the failure to accompany it by an instruction that such violation could not be considered unless it contributed proximately to plaintiff's injury was not error, in the absence of a request for such an instruction.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by John J. O'Connor against the United Railroads of San Francisco. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Wm. M. Abbott and Wm. M. Cannon, both of San Francisco (Kingsley W. Cannon, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant. Sullivan & Sullivan and Theo. J. Roche, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

LORIGAN, J. This is an action for personal injuries in which plaintiff had a verdict and judgment. Defendant appeals from the judgment and an order denying its motion for a new trial.

The first claim of appellant for a reversal is based on the refusal of the trial court to grant its motion for a nonsuit. Plaintiff, on the afternoon of February 13, 1909, was driving a hotel bus with a gentle team of horses along the southerly line of Mission street, between Fifth and Sixth streets, in the city of San Francisco. He was traveling along slowly, the wheels of the bus being a foot or 14 inches from the southerly railroad track of the defendant. While he was so proceeding a car coming rapidly along the southerly track of the defendant in the rear of the bus collided with its rear wheel, lifted the end of the bus and turned it in such a way as to throw plaintiff from it into the street, from which fall he sustained grievous injuries. It was admitted that an ordinance of the city of San Francisco limited the speed of cars on Mission street to 10 miles an hour. The evidence shows that the car which struck the bus was proceeding at from 12 to 15 miles an hour and its speed had not been slackened when the accident occurred, and that no warning or signal of its approach was given by the motorman by the ringing of a bell or otherwise. It further appeared that the plaintiff had made no effort while driving along to turn into the track, but was outside of it at the distance mentioned, and that had he been warned of the approach of the car it would have taken but a moment to have moved further into the street from the track; that the impact of the car with the bus was of such force that it carried the bus forward against a heavy mail truck 15 or 20 feet in front of it, and likewise forced the truck a considerable distance forward before the car was stopped. The plaintiff had turned into Mission street at Eighth street intending to turn off Mission street at Fourth street; that when about 25 feet east of Sixth street he looked back to see if a car was approaching and saw none; that he did not look back again; that there was nothing to prevent him from seeing back as far as Seventh or Eighth street, and the distance traveled by him after he looked back and up to the time the collision occurred was about 500 feet.

Appellant bases its motion for a nonsuit upon two grounds: First, that the plaintiff did not make a sufficient case showing negligence on the part of defendant; and, second, that the evidence affirmatively and indisputably shows that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence.

While appellant based its motion in the trial court on both grounds and urges both now, its particular insistence here is that the trial court should have granted the motion on the second ground—contributory negligence. In that regard it is claimed the evidence shows that plaintiff, after placing himself in dangerous proximity to the track, failed to take any precaution by looking back to see whether a car was approaching, but relied entirely on some warning of its approach to be given by the motorman in order to get his bus out of danger, and, in general, failed to use such ordinary care as the situation he was in demanded of him; that this constituted in law contributory negligence precluding a recovery, and that the trial court should have so declared and granted the nonsuit on that ground.

[1, 2] If this claim of the appellant as to contributory negligence is not well taken, or if, in other words, under all the circumstances of the case the question whether the plaintiff did or did not exercise ordinary care was properly a matter to be determined by the jury, then there is nothing in the first ground of the motion for a nonsuit, namely, that the evidence does not show negligence on the part of the defendant. The evidence shows that plaintiff was driving along a public street where, as we shall point out in discussing the matter of contributory negligence, he had a right to travel, even though it brought him close to the track of the defendant; that the motorman had a straight, clear track ahead of him with nothing to obstruct his view of the position of plaintiff or to prevent him perceiving the danger of a collision; that he was running his car at a prohibited rate of speed, and without lessening such speed or having his car under control, and without any warning of its approach ran down from behind upon the vehicle of the plaintiff. Under these facts the defendant was clearly guilty of negligence. It must be apparent that in operating a street car over a public street a motorman cannot, under ordinary circumstances, run down a vehicle proceeding in the same direction without having been negligent in the operation of his car. The mere fact that he does so furnishes cogent evidence of negligence which is rarely capable of explanation. Richmond Traction Co. v. Clarke, 101 Va. 383, 43 S. E. 618; Vincent v. Norton, etc., Ry. Co., 180 Mass. 104, 61 N. E. 822; Thompson on Neg. § 1404. In this case no explanation of the conduct of the motorman was offered. It is true that at the trial both the motorman and conductor were beyond the jurisdiction of the court and could not be produced by defendant. But the fact remains that there was no explanation.

Now as to contributory negligence. This is based on the claim that plaintiff in proceeding along the street placed himself in such proximity to the track of defendant that danger of collision with a car operating thereon might occur; that he should have taken the precaution which the situation demanded of him of looking out for the approaching car which collided with his bus, the approach of which was discernible for a long time after plaintiff commenced driving along the track, and which plaintiff might have observed if he had looked back; that he took no precaution in this respect, but depended solely on the care of the motorman to give him notice of any approaching car; that this was want of ordinary care, on the part of plaintiff, constituting contributory negligence.

[3-6] It is undoubtedly true that plaintiff was required to exercise reasonable care in driving along the public street in the vicinity of the track of the defendant; such care and diligence as a reasonably prudent man would have exercised under the circumstances. As a general rule, whether a person has exercised ordinary care or not is to be left to the jury, to be determined by them from all the circumstances surrounding him at the time. But it was not negligence per se for the plaintiff to drive along the street as he did in proximity to the track of the defendant. This of itself did not constitute negligence at all. The streets of a municipality are for the use of the traveling public and the right of a street car company is only to use it in common with the public. The fact that the company has been granted a right to lay tracks and operate cars along the streets gives it no exclusive right to travel even over that portion of a street covered by its tracks. Other vehicles have a right to travel over the entire street, including the space between the tracks. Nor is this right restricted to the times when other portions of the street may be crowded or in bad condition. Nor is a traveler in doing so in any sense of the term a trespasser. As a member of the public he is entitled as matter of right to use the entire street subject only to the limitation that, as the use of the street by the car company is confined to its tracks, a traveler may not unnecessarily interfere with or obstruct a car in its movement thereon. The car company is entitled in the interest of the public service to a free and unobstructed passage at all times of its cars over its tracks when necessary, and when such movement is being made free vehicles must yield a clear right of way to it for that purpose. Shea v. Potrero & Bay View R. R. Co., 44 Cal. 414; Clark v. Bennett, 123 Cal. 275, 55 Pac. 908; Scott v. San Bernardino Valley Traction Co., 152 Cal. 610, 93 Pac. 677; Lawyer v. Los Angeles Pacific Co., 161 Cal. 53, 118 Pac. 237. Hence, within the rule of these authorities, negligence on the part of the plaintiff cannot be raised from the mere fact that he was driving in proximity to the track of the defendant because he had a clear legal right to do so subject to the limitation that we have stated.

[7] Nor did the fact that he did not keep a constant watch behind for an approaching car while driving near the track show want of ordinary care on the part of the plaintiff or constitute negligence per se. The same rule as to "looking" applied to the drivers of vehicles about to cross the track of a steam railroad at highway crossings does not apply to those driving along street railroad tracks laid upon public highways. The distinction is clearly pointed out in Clark v. Bennett, supra. Nor is the conduct of one driving along or near a street railroad track in the same direction that a car coming from behind may approach measured by the same rule as to looking that governs one about to drive across the street railroad track substantially at right angles. The reason for the distinction is obvious. The conditions are quite different. In the one case it is practically an easy matter for the driver intending to cross, as his sight is directed ahead or to either side, to readily discover whether any car is approaching, and, if so, the distance and speed of its approach, and so avoid any danger. In the other, one driving along a public highway in the same direction in which a car may approach from behind is necessarily engaged in looking in front of him to have a care that he does not collide with some other vehicle ahead enjoying also the common use of the highway. Obviously, one cannot be expected to look simultaneously forward and back along the street. Naturally in the exercise of ordinary care his duty would be to look ahead of him so as to avoid collision with those in advance of him. They have the right to expect that he shall do so and as all travelers owe reciprocal rights to each other, he, too, has a right to expect this from those approaching from behind, no matter in what capacity they are using the street. Here the plaintiff after he entered Mission street and commenced to proceed along it in proximity to the track of defendant had looked back along the street to see if a car of the defendant was approaching, and saw none. At that time his observation showed that he was in no danger from any car near at hand, and it was not until some time afterwards that the defendant's car collided with him. The fact that he did not look back again did not per se constitute negligence. What amount of vigilance was requisite to constitute reasonable care upon the part of the plaintiff, and whether he exercised it while driving along the street, was to be determined by the jury not alone from what he did in the way of looking, but from a consideration of the reciprocal rights of the parties on the highway and all the facts and circumstances in the case, which would include whether he had a right to rely upon some warning or signal being given him by the motorman of any car approaching from behind in order that he might drive away from his position in proximity to the track. While it is true that one cannot rely entirely and wholly upon the care of another and neglect the precautions which in a particular situation he should exercise, still, when he has a right to trust to the reasonable expectation that another will discharge some duty peculiar to such situation, it is proper that such fact should be taken into consideration by the jury in connection with such precaution as the plaintiff did take, and the jury determine therefrom whether or not under the circumstances his conduct was negligent or not. That one driving a vehicle over or in proximity to a street railroad track has a right to expect and rely upon some warning to be given him by the motorman of a car approaching him from behind, and that this right should be taken into consideration by a jury as an element in determining the question of contributory negligence on the part of a plaintiff, is well established.

In Scott v. San Bernardino Valley, etc., Co., supra, 152 Cal. 610, 93 Pac. 679, it is said:

> "A street car cannot go on the street except upon its rails, and hence it has the better right to that space, to which others must yield when necessary, but otherwise its rights are not superior to that of any other person who has occasion to use the street. * * * The reasonable care which is required must be measured by all these conditions, rights, and circumstances. The foot passenger or driver of a horse has a right to expect that those in charge of street cars will operate them in the manner and run them at the speed which is customary at the particular place, and that they will give the usual warnings and signals, and take the usual precautions to avoid injury to others. Orcutt v. Pacific C. R. Co., 85 Cal. 299 [24 Pac. 661]; Driscoll v. Cable R. R. Co., 97 Cal. 553 [32 Pac. 591, 33 Am. St. Rep. 203]. In a crowded street it is often necessary and not inconsistent with reasonable prudence for a person to cross the street in front of street cars, in motion or at rest, at a point so near that it would be prima facie an act of negligence, if attempted at another place where the streets are less crowded and the cars usually run faster. The rights and obligations of all persons using a public street are, in this respect, reciprocal. Each may rightfully expect that the other will, at the proper time, discharge his proper duty toward others. He cannot rely wholly on the care of others, nor, on that account, neglect to use the precautions which the particular situation demands of him. But he frequently must, to some extent, depend on others in such situations, and his conduct must be considered in view of that fact in determining whether or not it is negligent. His care, or want of care, in such cases is generally a matter to be determined by the jury from all the circumstances surrounding him at the time."

In Lawyer v. Los Angeles Pacific Co., supra, in reversing a judgment of nonsuit it is said:

> "Appellant insists that the question whether or not he was guilty of contributory negligence was one of fact for the jury, and that under the evidence his conduct was not such that the court could say as matter of law that he was guilty of negligence. Being between the tracks of an electric railroad upon a public street is not negligence per se. The street is for the use of the public, although the car, which can be operated only on the track, has the better right to that part of the thoroughfare to which pedestrians must yield when necessary. The rights of a company operating street cars are otherwise not superior to those of persons who may be walking on the street. * * * The person walking upon that part of the street near the tracks of an electric railway has a right to believe that those in charge of the street cars will operate them in the usual manner and will take the customary precautions. The rights and duties of the pedestrian and the motorman in a case like this are reciprocal, and the conduct of either must be considered in the light of all of the circumstances of the particular case in determining whether or not it amounted to negligence. Here the plaintiff had the right to expect that defendant's servant would sound the warning bell as the car approached, particularly because he had just passed a cross street."

Other authorities declaring the same principle are Hickey v. Brooklyn Heights R. R. Co., 148 App. Div. 693, 132 N. Y. Supp. 946; Capitol T. R. Co. v. Crump, 35 App. D. C. 181; Bectenwald v. Met. St. R. R. Co., 121 Mo. App. 595, 97 S. W. 557; Mertz v. Detroit El. Ry. Co., 125 Mich. 11, 83 N. W. 1036; Normand v. Hudson Valley Ry. Co., 133 App. Div. 474, 117 N. Y. Supp. 1076.

In the light of these authorities applied to the facts disclosed by the evidence here it was the duty of the trial court, as it did, to leave to the jury for determination not only the question of the negligence of the defendant, but the further question of whether plaintiff was or was not guilty of contributory negligence.

[8] It is further claimed by appellant that the court erred in giving an instruction requested by plaintiff, wherein, after stating that an ordinance of the city of San Francisco prohibited the running of cars on Mission street at a greater speed than 10 miles an hour had been introduced in evidence and might be considered by the jury, concluded it with "I charge you that the violation of the ordinance constitutes negligence per se." It is insisted that the phrase "negligence per se," particularly the Latin words "per se" therein, should have been defined to the jury; that the use of these Latin words in the instruction without explaining what they meant, was calculated to mislead them. It is further claimed that the instruction as given is an incorrect statement of the law. As to the first point. While the phrase "negligence per se" has in legal science a fixed and well-defined meaning with which the legal profession is familiar, it is claimed by the appellant that the average jurors may not be familiar with it, and that its meaning should have been explained by the court so that they might comprehend and understand it. This doubtless was the proper course for the court to have pursued, but its mere failure to do so should not be held here to constitute error. It is highly probable in this case, as is common in cases of this character, that this phrase was made use of by counsel on both sides in their discussion of the motion for a nonsuit in the presence of the jury and in their argument to the jury on the submission of the cause on its merits, and that hence the jury did understand its meaning, and the court was aware of this fact when it instructed them. Be that as it may, however, when the instruction was given if counsel for appellant had any doubt whether the jury understood it, or that its meaning might be misapprehended, they should have either asked the court to explain it, or prepared an instruction themselves doing so. They should not be permitted to now urge error on the theory of possible ignorance or possible misapprehension of the jury as to the meaning of the phrase or the words used in it when they could so easily and readily have removed any conjecture about it.

[9, 10] Likewise, there is no merit in the other point made by appellant that the quoted portion of the instruction is an incorrect statement of the law. As an abstract proposition of law the violation of a local ordinance is per se, or, as these words mean, "of itself," negligence. The point which appellant really makes, however, is that though such violation would amount to negligence in the abstract, the court should have accompanied the declaration of the abstract rule with a qualification that such violation could only be considered by the jury if they found that it contributed proximately to the injury of the plaintiff. But as the instruction so far as it went correctly stated the law, it is to be said of the claim now made, as is said of the other objection to the instruction, that counsel for appellant should have either asked the court to instruct the jury as to the qualification which the court would have done, or have presented an instruction embodying it which the court undoubtedly would have given.

Appellant challenges the correctness of other instructions given by the court and its action in modifying and refusing instructions tendered by it. We have examined the claims made in this respect, and do not think any of the objections as to the action of the court are tenable.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

In Bank. Application by J. K. Burch for a writ of prohibition. Alternative writ dismissed.

James H. Boyer, of San Francisco, for petitioner. J. E. Pemberton, of San Francisco, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. This is an original proceeding for a writ of prohibition.

The petitioner, J. K. Burch, alleges that on January 15, 1914, an action was commenced in the superior court of the county of Lake by E. H. Wilson as plaintiff against Lyon Fraser, sheriff of said county, and J. K. Burch, defendants; that the purpose of the action was to quiet plaintiff's title to certain real property and to restrain Fraser, as sheriff, from executing a sheriff's deed of said property to said Burch; that Hon. M. S. Sayre, judge of the superior court in and for the county of Lake, was disqualified from trying the case by reason of financial interest in the subject of the action; that on the 15th day of January, 1914, Hon. M. S. Sayre, as judge of said court, made an order requesting Hon. George H. Buck, judge of the superior court of San Mateo county, to preside at the trial of the said action and all proceedings therein; that pursuant to the order Judge Buck held court at Lakeport, the county seat of Lake county, on that same day, and made an order restraining Fraser from executing a sheriff's deed to Burch; that on January 20, 1914, at the city and county of San Francisco, counsel for the defendants served on counsel for plaintiff an affidavit and notice of motion to transfer the action to the county nearest and most accessible to Lake county; that demand for transfer of the action was also served on counsel for plaintiff and then filed; that no counter affidavit or paper of any sort was filed by the plaintiff or any one; that on January 24, 1914, after the filing of all of the said papers, counsel for defendants in open court and in the presence of Judges Buck and Sayre read the notice of motion, affidavits, and demand, and moved said superior court to change the place of trial of said action of Wilson v. Fraser and Burch to the nearest and most accessible county; that an order was entered denying said motion; and that Hon. George H. Buck threatens to proceed, and, unless restrained, will proceed, with the trial and further matters connected with the action of Wilson v. Fraser and Burch.

The answers of respondents both admit the disqualification of Judge Sayre, and contain allegations that the action of Wilson v. Fraser and Burch is one of many commenced during the last 12 years involving title to the same property mentioned in that suit; that it has been Judge Sayre's custom, solely for the convenience and accommodation of the parties in said actions, to request Judge Buck to preside during the trials and proceedings therein; and that Judge Buck has heard and disposed of many matters in said litigations, without objection or exception, and frequently by stipulation of all parties concerned. Judge Sayre's answer further sets forth the fact that on hearing of the case of Wilson v. Fraser and Burch, he made the usual request of Judge Buck; and that he knew nothing of the desire of defendants to have the action transferred until the 24th day of January, 1914, when, as a spectator in the superior court of Lake county, where Judge Buck was presiding, he heard counsel for the defendants read his motion.

The answer of Hon. George H. Buck is of the same tenor. He mentions the fact that several times during the past few years he has held court in Lake county at Judge Sayre's request in actions and proceedings concerning title to the property involved in Wilson v. Fraser and Burch. He also avers that he was invited by Judge Sayre, in the month of January, 1914, to hold a session of the superior court in Lake county for the purpose of taking up some matters concerning the real property mentioned; that he accepted the invitation and attended to some of the pending litigation; that thereafter, on January 24, 1914, he again held court in Lake county for the purpose of taking up matters long pending, in connection with litigation commenced many years before, concerning the property mentioned in these proceedings; that a few days before January 24, 1914, he was informed by telephone that counsel for defendants would move for a change of venue; that on January 24th he held a session of court in Lake county and took up matters which he, as judge of the superior court, had theretofore set for that date; that the motion was made; and that he denied it upon the ground: (1) That, as less than ten days had elapsed between service of notice and hearing of motion, no sufficient notice had been given, all the attorneys having their offices in San Francisco, and no order shortening time having been entered; and (2) because a qualified judge was presiding in the superior court of Lake county.

An alternative writ of prohibition has been issued, and we shall now determine whether it shall be made permanent or shall be dismissed.

[1] Bohn v. Bohn, 164 Cal. 533, 129 Pac. 981 (cited by respondent), was a case in which the change of place of trial was requested by reason of the residence of the defendant in a county other than the one in which the action had been commenced. Motions made for the reason that a judge is disqualified are usually addressed to the court regarding matters peculiarly within the knowledge of the judge presiding, and generally do not require service of notice of the motion on the judge. Livermore v. Brundage, 64 Cal. 299, 30 Pac. 848. But here the moving party knew that Judge Buck would be presiding in the superior court of Lake county on January 24, 1914, the day on which the motion was made, and there was no presumption of law that Judge Buck would be familiar with the facts constituting the disqualification of Hon. M. S. Sayre. It was necessary, therefore, that the notice of motion should have been properly served upon the parties interested, and Bohn v. Bohn is authority for the first reason given by Judge Buck for denying the motion. Evidently counsel for defendants considered notice of the motion necessary, for he gave it to opposing counsel. If he had desired to have the time for serving the notice of motion shortened, doubtless he could have secured the proper order, but it does not appear either that he did so or that he asked for a continuance so that he might comply with the provisions of section 1005, Code of Civil Procedure. It may be contended that section 398, Code of Civil Procedure, alone applies to the motion here considered, and that the notice contemplated by section 397 of that Code is not necessary. Subdivision 4 of the latter section indicates, however, that the Legislature intended such notice to be given. Livermore v. Brundage, supra, does not hold that such a motion need not be noticed at all. It merely decides that the judge who is disqualified need not be served. The motion was properly denied for the first assigned reason.

[2] We are also of the opinion that, even ignoring the infirmity of the notice given by counsel for defendants, the motion should have been denied. This court has plainly declared that a litigant who makes a motion of the sort here considered and finds a qualified judge presiding is not prejudiced by the refusal of that judge to transfer the action or proceeding to another county, even though the judge who thus assumes the duty of trying the action or hearing the proceeding had been called from another county by the disqualified judge of the county in which the action or proceeding was pending. In denying the motion for a hearing in this court of the case of People v. Ebey, 6 Cal. App. 774, 93 Pac. 379, four of the justices signed an order of the court containing the following language:

> "In denying the application we desire to say that we do not give our assent to the view of the learned District Court of Appeal that the judgment should be reversed because the judge who tried the case was the judge of the superior court of another county requested to preside in the superior court of the county in which the case was pending by the judge thereof, who was himself disqualified to try the case. Under the plain and unambiguous language of our constitutional provision (section 8, art. 6), a judge of any superior court may preside in the superior court of any county at the request of the judge of the superior court thereof, and, while so presiding, may act in any matter in which he is not disqualified."

In Imperial Land Co. v. Imperial Irrigation District, 137 Pac. 234, this court suggested two methods whereby a qualified judge may be secured to preside at a trial in a county in which the only resident judge of the superior court is disqualified; one by calling a judge to hold an extra session; another by securing from the Governor a designation of an unbiased judge from another county for the particular case. While the question before us in this case was not there under discussion, the court was contemplating some of the various methods by which a qualified judge may be obtained for the trial of a cause, and clearly section 398 of the Code of Civil Procedure was not regarded as prescribing the only way to accomplish that result. The motion was properly denied for the second reason assigned by Judge Buck.

Let the alternative writ of prohibition be dismissed.

PIXLEY et al. v. SAUNDERS, Tax Collector.
(S. F. 6024.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 3, 1914.)

DRAINS (§ 66*)—SANITARY DISTRICT—"MUNICIPAL AFFAIR."

Const. art. 11, § 12, provides that the Legislature shall have power to impose taxes on counties, cities, towns, or other public or municipal corporations for municipal purposes, but may by general laws vest in the corporate authorities thereof the power to tax for such purposes. Section 13 declares that the Legislature shall not delegate to any special commission any power to make, control, or in any way interfere with any county, city, town, or municipal improvement, or to levy taxes or assessments, or perform any municipal functions whatever. Held, that the drainage of a district by a system of sewers was not a "municipal affair," and hence the inclusion of a portion of the territory of a sanitary district duly organized as provided by Sanitary District Act March 31, 1891 (St. 1891, p. 223), within the boundaries of an incorporated town did not withdraw the property so included from the jurisdiction of the sanitary district authorities for the purpose of assessing such taxes as were essential for the payment of bonds issued by the district and the furtherance of its activities.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Marin County; Edgar T. Zook, Judge.

Action by Herbert Farington Pixley and others, minors, by J. F. D. Curtis, their guardian, against John A. Saunders, as Tax Collector. Judgment for defendant, and complainants appeal. Affirmed.

Robert Harrison, of San Francisco, for appellants. Thomas P. Boyd, of San Rafael, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Upon the last submission of this case to the court in bank the following opinion was then adopted:

Plaintiffs, who are the owners of a tract of land in Marin county known as the Pixley ranch, brought this action to restrain the tax collector from selling said property for delinquent taxes levied thereon by the authorities of sanitary district No. 2 of Marin county. From a judgment upholding the validity of the tax, an appeal is taken. And there is also an appeal from the order dissolving the injunction whereby the tax collector was restrained from proceeding to sell the property pendente lite.

The learned judge of the superior court who presided at the trial of the cause put his "judgment and decree" in the form of an opinion setting forth the law which he considered applicable to the case. As we agree with his views, we adopt his opinion, which is in the following language:

"This is an action brought by the owners of a tract of land in Marin county, known as the Pixley ranch, to restrain defendant, as tax collector, from selling said ranch for delinquent taxes levied thereon by sanitary district No. 2 of said county. The cause was submitted to the court upon an agreed statement, from which the following facts appear:

"In January, 1902, sanitary district No. 2 of the county of Marin was duly and regularly organized under the provisions of the Sanitary District Act of March 31, 1891 (St. 1891, p. 223), and the tract here involved was embraced within the boundaries of the district at said time. Thereafter, in 1905, the sanitary district made a bond issue for $25,000 for the purpose of constructing a sewer, and at the time of the levy of taxes for 1910 there remained outstanding and unpaid $19,500 of the principal of said bonds.

"On March 2, 1908, the town of Larkspur was regularly incorporated as a municipal corporation of the sixth class, and said Pixley ranch was at said time, and now is, included within the territorial limits thereof. Since its incorporation, the town of Larkspur has regularly levied and collected taxes upon said Pixley ranch for all town purposes, which taxes have always been paid.

"In 1910, the assessor of the sanitary district made his assessment of the property of the district, including therein the Pixley ranch, and upon the return thereof the sanitary board of the district levied a tax of 86 cents for $100 for the fiscal year 1910–1911. Of this levy 71 cents was levied for the bond fund of the district to that year's proportion of the principal of, and interest on, outstanding bonds, and the remaining 15 cents was for running expenses. The amount of the tax on the Pixley ranch was $121.90, which plaintiffs refused to pay. Defendant, as tax collector of Marin county, thereupon published his notice of sale for delinquent taxes in the usual manner, fixing June 26, 1911, as the date on which he would sell said ranch, unless said taxes, together with the costs and penalties provided by law, were paid.

"Plaintiffs' complaint was filed June 13, 1911, setting forth the facts substantially as above stated, and alleging that, by reason of the inclusion of the Pixley ranch within the limits of the town of Larkspur, the property had passed out of the control and jurisdiction of the sanitary district, that the proposed tax sale was therefore without authority, that the same would constitute a cloud upon the title of plaintiffs, and praying for a permanent injunction restraining defendant from proceeding further with the sale. By stipulation of the parties an injunction pendente lite was granted, and the cause was briefed and submitted to the court upon the pleadings, and the agreed statement of facts above referred to.

"Plaintiffs' position, briefly stated, is this: That the power of providing for sewers is peculiarly a municipal affair, over which each municipality must exercise exclusive control within its own limits; that the Sanitary District Act of March 31, 1891, was a legislative makeshift intended solely to afford to unincorporated territory an opportunity to provide for its sanitation until such time as it might, by annexation or incorporation, acquire the larger powers of a municipal corporation; that, immediately upon the annexation or incorporation of any portion of the territory of a sanitary district, such annexed or incorporated tract becomes part of another imperium, and is relieved from the control of the sanitary district to which it formerly owed allegiance.

"Defendant, on the other hand, contends that the Sanitary District Act was intended to be general in its application, and to apply to any district which by reason of the natural configuration of the land therein might advantageously be served by a single system of sewer construction, whether wholly unincorporated or not.

"The endeavor to arrive at a conclusion between these diametrically opposed contentions is attended with considerable difficulty, in view of the loose manner in which the Sanitary District Act is framed. While the act has been under consideration by the Supreme Court in several cases, the precise question here involved has never been determined.

"In Woodward v. Fruitvale Sanitary District, 99 Cal. 554, 34 Pac. 239, the validity of the organization of a sanitary district covering wholly unincorporated territory was in question. The constitutionality of the act was challenged upon the ground that its terms were broad enough to permit the organization of sanitary districts to embrace municipalities, and that it was therefore in conflict with the provisions of sections 12 and 13 of article 11 of the Constitution, which read as follows:

" 'Sec. 12. The Legislature shall have no power to impose taxes upon counties, cities, towns or other public or municipal corporations, or upon the inhabitants or property thereof, for county, city, town, or other municipal purposes, but may, by general laws, vest in the corporate authorities thereof the power to assess and collect taxes for such purposes.

" 'Sec. 13. The Legislature shall not delegate to any special commission, private corporation, company, association, or individual, any power to make, control, appropriate, supervise, or in any way interfere with any county, city, town or municipal improvement, money, property, or effects whether held in trust or otherwise, or to levy taxes or assessments, or perform any municipal functions whatever.'

"The court in that case, speaking through Searles, Commissioner, declined to pass upon the constitutional question thus raised, for the reason that the district there involved did not embrace any incorporated territory. There is a strong intimation, however, in the following language that a sanitary district may not embrace any territory belonging to municipal corporations (99 Cal. p. 562, 34 Pac. p. 242): 'It may well be that, if in the formation of a sanitary district an incorporated city or town shall be included, in which the authority conferred upon the sanitary board is delegated to the municipality, it will be held that the law under consideration was not intended to apply to such city or town. The illustration is only used by way of comparison, * * * and not to indicate an opinion upon a case which may never arise.'

"In the case of People ex rel. Cuff v. City of Oakland, 123 Cal. 598, 600 [56 Pac. 445], it was contended that the territory embraced in a sanitary district could not be annexed to a municipality. The court there said: 'If the statute permits territory embraced in or covered by a sanitary district to be annexed to a city—a municipal corporation of a higher class and capable of exercising the same functions as well as others essential to municipal government—such statute contemplates, ex necessitate rei, a cession of the powers of the inferior corporation to the greater, and a consequent dissolution of the former as a result of the annexation.'

"It is to be noted, however, that in this last case no sanitary district was a party to the action, and the language used was therefore dicta.

"In the recent case of 'The Petition of the East Fruitvale Sanitary District,' 158 Cal. 453, 459, 111 Pac. 368, 371, the effect of the annexation of the whole of a sanitary district to a municipal corporation was under consideration. The court there held that the necessary effect of such annexation would be the dissolution of the sanitary district, but it declined to pass upon the question as to the effect of the annexation of a part only of a sanitary district. While the rule laid down in the Cuff Case was held by the court to be correct in the case of the annexation of an entire sanitary district, the court says: 'The Sanitary District Act contains one or two expressions which might seem to indicate that a sanitary district may cover in whole or in part territory within the boundaries of a municipal corporation. Thus section 5, in granting the power to enter upon a street or road for the purpose of making excavations, declares that in "case such street or road shall be in an incorporated city or town, the consent of the lawful authorities thereof shall first be obtained." Section 21 provides that upon the dissolution of the district its property shall vest "in any incorporated city or town that may at said time be in occupation of a considerable portion of the territory of the district." It may be readily conceived that the Legislature had in mind the possibility that a region, including territory both incorporated and unincorporated, might be so situated as to require a single and comprehensive scheme of sewer construction, or that, in laying a sewer for a sanitary district outside of any city or town, it might be necessary to pass through the streets of some municipality in order to reach an outlet. The provisions referring to "incorporated cities or towns" may have been intended to apply in such cases, and, so read, they may be given full effect without holding that the act contemplated the formation or the continued existence of a sanitary district entirely within the boundaries of a municipal corporation.'

"The question here involved is thus left open by the Supreme Court. Turning to the act itself, we find, in addition to the quotations from sections 5 and 21 referred to in the East Fruitvale Case, that the title of the act is as follows: 'An act to provide for the formation, government, operation and dissolution of sanitary districts, "in any part of the state,"' etc. Section 1 provides: 'Whenever twenty-five persons in any county of the state shall desire the formation of a sanitary district within the county. * * *' These expressions certainly do not indicate an intention to limit the operation of the sanitary district act to any particular class of territory, and, taking this general language, together with the reference to section 21 to 'any incorporated city or town that may (at the time of dissolution of the district) be in occupation of a considerable portion of the territory of the district,' it may be fairly inferred that the Legislature intended that sanitary districts might embrace both incorporated and unincorporated territory.

"There are many practical considerations which lead the court to adopt this view of the legislative intent. In many instances in California the limits of the incorporated towns are small, and just beyond these limits the territory is quite thickly populated. It is of vital importance to these towns that the sanitation of such adjacent districts be good, especially where the natural drainage from such outlying territory runs through the towns; yet no municipality is authorized to construct sewers to serve territory lying outside of its own boundaries. The following language from the case of Wilson v. Board of Trustees of Sanitary District [133 Ill. 443, page 466], 27 N. E. 203, page 207, supports this view: 'If the General Assembly may vest the power (to provide sanitation) in cities, towns, and villages, and may also create a corporation in the country and invest it with the power, it would seem to inevitably follow that it may create a corporation including both city and country, and invest it with the power. It must be evident that often, to render the exercise of such power by cities effective, it would have to be exercised over large rural districts adjacent to cities, as in case of large malarious swamps, lying within the vicinity of cities, and in other instances where the air and water to be used by the city population would be poisoned and laden with germs of disease by causes existing beyond the city limits. In such cases the preservation of health in the city would require that municipal authority should be exercised beyond the city limits, and it would violate no principle of constitutional law to create a district, and invest it with powers of taxation for sanitary purposes coextensive with the territory to be controlled. If districts may be thus organized, the question of the propriety of their organization in this, or any other, particular instance belongs to the General Assembly, and not to the courts; and it has been repeatedly held in other states that they may be thus organized. Reeves v. Treasurer of Wood County, 8 Ohio St. 333; Thompson v. Treasurer of Wood County, 11 Ohio St. 678; Anderson v. Drainage Co., 14 Ind. 199 [77 Am. Dec. 63]; O'Reiley v. Drain Co., 32 Ind. 169; Sessions v. Crunkilton, 20 Ohio St. 349; Woodruff v. Fisher, 17 Barb. [N. Y.] 224; Hartwell v. Armstrong, 19 Barb. [N. Y.] 166; Drainage Co. Cases, 11 La. Ann. 338; Dean v. Davis, 51 Cal. 406; Donnelly v. Decker, 58 Wis. 461, 17 N. W. 389 [46 Am. Rep. 637]; State v. Stewart, 74 Wis. 620, 43 N. W. 947 [6 L. R. A. 394].'

"Again, the general rule as to the disposition of property upon the annexation of a portion of one public corporation to another public corporation is that the property lying in the annexed territory belongs wholly to the corporation to which it is annexed, and the annexed territory is freed from all obligation for the debts of the corporation to which it formerly belonged. This rule is based upon the principle that the Legislature has the right to alter the lines of subordinate governmental agencies at will, and the propriety of its action in so doing cannot be questioned. In the ordinary case of a school district or other public corporation, the rule works no injustice, because the property thus transferred to a new jurisdiction is itself unaffected by the change. But it would be impracticable to apply the same rule to the sewer system of a sanitary district, because all of its parts are so related to each other that the severance of one part would necessarily impair or destroy the usefulness of the remainder. For example, if the territory at the outlet of a sanitary district were annexed to a municipality, the rest of the system, if deprived of its outlet under the rule referred to, would be practically useless.

"A concrete instance of the actual conditions to be considered is the case of the San Anselmo Valley in this county, a narrow valley draining into Green Brae slough. Sanitary district No. 1 of Marin county was organized in 1899 to serve the whole of this valley, which includes the territory now known as Kentfield, Ross, and San Anselmo. A single, comprehensive sewer system was installed, which has taken care of the sewage of the whole valley up to the present time. In 1907 the town of San Anselmo was incorporated, embracing territory at the upper end of the valley, and a year later the town of Ross was also incorporated; its northern boundary coinciding with the southern boundary of San Anselmo. The incorporation of these two towns left a large tract of unincorporated territory at the outlet of the district known as Kentfield. All three parts of the district have worked harmoniously under the jurisdiction and control of the sanitary district, conceding to it full power in all matters pertaining to sanitation. If it were intended that each of these towns upon its incorporation should be withdrawn from the control of the district in matters of sanitation, taking with it the portion of the system lying within its boundaries, we would have a sanitation where San Anselmo would have a sewer system stopping at its southern boundary several miles from any outlet, and Ross would have control of an intermediate portion, also without an outlet. Kentfield would have a small portion of the system, upon which would be saddled the whole of the debt incurred for the construction of the entire system, under the common-law rule that upon the severance of territory from a public corporation the debt remains with the old corporation. Each of the two upper towns would thus be compelled to acquire by purchase or condemnation a separate outlet for its sewage, and as a result there would be three separate sewer systems where one had theretofore sufficed. The outlet from San Anselmo having to pass necessarily through Ross, we would have that town owning property within the limits of Ross; and, should Kentfield incorporate (as is now proposed), it would have in its territory two lines of sewers owned by other towns. In the event that the portion of the outlet of the San Anselmo system lying in Ross should require repairs, the town of San Anselmo would have to get the permission of the town of Ross to open the streets under which the San Anselmo sewer ran, and there would be a constant conflict between the different authorities.

"The condition above described leads inevitably to the conclusion that, while generally the question of sanitation is a municipal affair, in many instances it is one of broader scope, which cannot be adequately handled by the municipal authorities of a single town. Therefore it cannot be said to be a 'local' or 'municipal' affair within the inhibition of sections 12 and 13 of the Constitution above quoted, and it falls within the class of public purposes such as irrigation and reclamation, for which the Legislature has the undoubted authority to provide governmental agencies or districts by general law.

"In this connection it is interesting to note that, although municipal corporations of the fourth and sixth classes have the power to acquire waterworks and supply water for irrigation purposes (Municipal Corp. Act, § 622; section 862, subd. 3), it was held in the case of the Madera Irrigation District, 92 Cal. 296, at 344, 28 Pac. 272, 675, 14 L. R. A. 755, 27 Am. St. Rep. 106, that the system of irrigation contemplated by the irrigation district act was not a 'municipal purpose' within the scope of the organization of a city or town. So here it is evident that the sanitation of a whole valley, embracing several towns, is not a 'municipal purpose.'

"For the reasons above stated, it is the conclusion of the court that in enacting the Sanitary District Acts the Legislature had in mind the sanitation of any territory which might conveniently be served by a single system, whether wholly unincorporated or not, and that a sanitary district formed under said act preserves its identity and retains its powers over the whole territory, except in the event of its complete absorption by a municipality."

After further consideration we have adopted the above opinion.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

BEATTY, C. J., does not participate in the foregoing.

BUTLER v. SAN FRANCISCO GAS & ELECTRIC CO. (JOHNSON, Intervener.) (S. F. 5985.)

1. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES (§ 298*)—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

In an action by the assignee of money due under a building contract, in which a judgment creditor of the contractor intervened, evidence held to warrant a finding that the assignment was made for the purpose of defrauding such creditor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fraudulent Conveyances, Cent. Dig. §§ 892–895; Dec. Dig. § 298.*]

2. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES (§ 64)—GROUNDS OF INVALIDITY—INTENT TO DEFRAUD CREDITORS.

A contract whereby a building contractor assigned or conveyed all his rights under a building contract to a third party for the express purpose of defrauding a judgment creditor of the contractor was void, and could in no way prejudice the rights of such creditor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fraudulent Conveyances, Cent. Dig. §§ 159–161, 164, 165; Dec. Dig. § 64.*]

3. EXECUTION (§ 348*)—PAYMENT BY DEBTOR OF JUDGMENT DEBTOR.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 716, providing that after the issuing of an execution, and before its return, any person indebted to the judgment debtor may pay to the sheriff the amount of his debt, the conditions which justify a payment by a debtor are that an execution has been issued, and not returned, and it not being essential to the validity of such payment that there should have been any levy at all.

A building contract prohibiting an assignment by the contractor or the subletting of any portion of the work without the written consent of the owner and requiring the contractor to personally supervise the work did not prevent the contractor from assigning money due or to become due under the contract.

LORIGAN, J. This cause was transferred to this court after judgment affirmed by the District Court of Appeal.

On December 30, 1909, William A. Butler, brother of the plaintiff, entered into a written contract with the defendant gas company to furnish the labor and material and do the brick and terra cotta work on a certain building to be constructed for the defendant; the latter agreeing to pay him therefor the sum of $2,940. The contract expressly provided that no assignment of it should be made by said Butler nor any portion of the work sublet by him to any subcontractor without the written consent of the defendant, and that said Butler should personally supervise and direct the work contracted for. On February 12, 1910, said William A. Butler and his brother, the plaintiff herein, entered into the following contract:

> "This agreement made this twelfth day of February, 1910, between Frank I. Butler, party of the first part, and William A. Butler, party of the second part, both of the city and county of San Francisco, witnesseth: That the party of the first part does hereby agree for and in consideration of $2,940, to furnish all labor and material required to do all the brick work and set all terra cotta, for building of the addition of the central station 'C' of the San Francisco Gas & Electric Company, east of Fourth street, all in accordance with the plans and specifications furnished by D. H. Burnham & Co., architects, and included in the contract entered into by the said W. A. Butler and the said San Francisco Gas & Electric Company. In consideration of this agreement the said W. A. Butler will pay or cause to be paid to the said Frank I. Butler the above-mentioned sum when it becomes due from the said San Francisco Gas & Electric Company."

Under this last contract the work was commenced by the plaintiff, although it was personally supervised and directed by said William A. Butler, and was completed and accepted by the defendant on April 14, 1910. No question is made but that the work provided to be done was done satisfactorily. On March, 19, 1910, the defendant paid to William A. Butler $1,350 pursuant to the terms of its contract with him, which left a balance to become due under the contract of $1,440 ($150 having been deducted by mutual consent), of which $705 was payable April 14, 1910, the remainder of $735 payable 35 days thereafter, or about June 4, 1910. On April 7, 1910, plaintiff in writing notified defendant that he was the subcontractor for the work, that he had received from William A. Butler $1,350, the first payment thereon, and that another payment would be due thereon in a few days, as his work would then be finished, and notified defendant to withhold the money due on its contract with William A. Butler for the plaintiff. This notice was accompanied with a copy of the contract set forth above between plaintiff and the said William A. Butler. The defendant was not requested to, nor did it, give its consent to the contract entered into between the Butlers, nor did it know of such contract or that William A. Butler had not personally performed the work under his contract with it until this notice and a copy of the contract was served on it on said April 7, 1910, when the work was substantially completed.

The intervener herein, Henry T. Johnson, had on November 7, 1909, obtained a judgment against said William A. Butler for $862.25. An execution was issued thereon on March 23, 1910, and served on defendant, levying upon any moneys due or owing by defendant to said William A. Butler. On April 18, 1910, William A. Butler by written instrument assigned to plaintiff all moneys due or to become due by reason of his contract with defendant, but of this assignment defendant had no notice until the present action was brought. On April 25, 1910, plaintiff served another notice on defendant similar to that of April 7, 1910, but on April 28th thereafter the defendant paid to the sheriff under the levy on the execution heretofore referred to the sum of $705, and took the receipt of the sheriff therefor. On May 12, 1910, plaintiff filed a claim of lien for $1,440 against the property of the defendant upon which the work had been performed, and thereafter commenced this action. Prior to the filing of the second amended complaint herein, and about October 18, 1910, another writ of execution was issued on the judgment against William A. Butler obtained by the intervener, Johnson, and was served on defendant to satisfy a balance claimed to be due on said judgment of $164.30, but no part of this was paid by the defendant.

The second amended complaint set forth three causes of action: To foreclose a mechanic's lien; to recover upon the notices served on the defendant to withhold the money due; to recover upon an assignment to plaintiff from William A. Butler of all moneys due him under his contract with defendant.

The defendant gas company in its answer set up as a defense the violation of the clause in its contract with William A. Butler, and further that the contract between said William A. Butler and the plaintiff had been knowingly and fraudulently entered into by them for the purpose of defrauding a judgment creditor—the intervener, Johnson—out of the fruits of his judgment against said William A. Butler by a transfer from said William A. Butler to the plaintiff of the moneys which might become due from the defendant under its contract with said William A. Butler; set up the payment by defendant of $705 to the sheriff under the execution as heretofore stated, and the further levy on the money in its hands for the balance claimed to be due said Johnson on his judgment; and admitted that there was due William A. Butler under his contract any balance remaining, after deducting these amounts.

A complaint in intervention was filed by the intervener, Johnson, in which said William A. Butler was made a party defendant and to which he appeared and answered. The intervener also attacked the validity of the contract between William A. Butler and the plaintiff, on the ground that it was entered into between them for the purpose of cheating and defrauding him of the fruits of his judgment obtained against William A. Butler, and asked for a judgment requiring the defendant gas company to pay over to the sheriff upon the execution levied on the money in its hands the balance due said intervener.

The court found that the contract entered into between William A. Butler and the plaintiff was, in legal effect, an assignment of the contract between said William A. Butler and the defendant and utterly void, as in contravention of the clause in the original contract prohibiting any assignment thereof; that being void for this reason plaintiff succeeded to no rights whatever under it either to support a lien or any other claim against the defendant; that the assignment of April 18, 1910, from William A. Butler to plaintiff of all moneys due or to become due arising out of the contract between William A. Butler and defendant was equally void by virtue of the prohibitory clause in the original contract. The court further found that the contract between the Butlers was made pursuant to a collusion and conspiracy on their part to defraud the intervener as a judgment creditor of William A. Butler; sustained the payment of the $705 made by the defendant to the sheriff on the levy of the execution; and found that there was still due the intervener $156.67 as a balance on his judgment against William A. Butler, and that there was unpaid from defendant to William A. Butler the sum of $578.33. The judgment was that the intervener had a lien on the moneys in the hands of the defendant due and unpaid from it to William A. Butler to the extent of the balance due on his judgment, and that plaintiff take nothing by his action.

Plaintiff appeals from the judgment, and insists that the view of the trial court that the contract entered into beween himself and William A. Butler was in legal effect, an assignment of the original contract, and hence void, is erroneous. He insists further that the finding of the court that this contract between himself and William A. Butler was fraudulently entered into for the purpose of defeating the claim of the intervener as a judgment creditor of William A. Butler, and so sustaining the payments made by the defendant under the execution levied thereon, is not supported by the evidence; and, in any event, that as to the balance of the contract price admitted to be due by defendant to William A. Butler plaintiff, as his assignee, was entitled to a judgment for it in his favor.

As to the nature of the contract between himself and William A. Butler, the position of the appellant is that that contract does not purport to be an assignment of the original contract, and does not have that legal effect; that it does not pretend to transfer the legal title to plaintiff or create any privity between the plaintiff and defendant; that it is purely an independent contract whereby plaintiff undertook to furnish the materials and do the work contracted for by William A. Butler for the sum which was to be paid by it to William A. Butler; that the fact that the price to be paid coincides in both contracts is entirely collateral, and does not make his contract with William A. Butler an assignment or detract at all from its force as an independent contract. While stating this contention as to the nature of the contract, we do no feel required to determine it. In the view we take on this appeal, a construction in harmony with the contention of appellant could only be important on the question of a lien in his favor, and then only with reference to a portion of the last payment admitted by defendant to be due William A. Butler for the work performed, because, under the particular finding of the court, to be immediately referred to, that is all which, in any event, the plaintiff would be entitled to recover. And, if entitled to a judgment for that amount, it is apparent in this case that he will be just as fully protected by a personal judgment against the defendant as through a lien. The question must, as we say, be limited to the right of plaintiff to recover this balance of the last payment for the work, because, whatever the nature of the contract between plaintiff and William A. Butler may have been, the finding of the court that it was fraudulently made for the purpose of defeating the rights of the intervener as a judgment creditor of William A. Butler, if supported by the evidence, fully warranted the trial court in sustaining the payments made by the defendant to the sheriff after the levy of execution, and providing also for the further payment of the balance due on the judgment.

[1, 2] The court found that the contract entered into between the Butlers was made "for the purpose of cheating and defrauding the said Henry T. Johnson [the intervener] out of the fruits of his said judgment and render it impossible" to levy and enforce execution upon any money which would become payable from defendant to William A. Butler; that the two Butlers knowingly, willfully and fraudulently colluded and conspired together, and executed their contract to accomplish that purpose. Appellant challenges this finding. But as fully sustaining it it is only necessary to quote the testimony of one witness, Kendall Dazy, as to a conversation had with plaintiff as follows:

> "The substance of the conversation was that Mr. Frank I. Butler called at the treasurer's office, with which I am connected, the treasurer's office of the gas company, to see about getting payment of $150 on the architect's certificate of D. H. Burnham & Co., which he had in his possession, and, inasmuch as there had been some litigation on the question, I took Mr. Butler up to Mr. Susman's office, because I did not know the status of the matter, and I thought Mr. Susman could tell Mr. Butler the status and just when he could get this, if at all. Mr. Butler stated to Mr. Susman that at the time the contract was transferred it was done for the reason that, if Mr. William A. Butler completed the contract, Henry T. Johnson would levy on the moneys coming to him, and it was for the purpose of preventing the levy by Mr. Johnson that the contract was tranferred to Frank I. Butler. Frank I. Butler stated that, if he had known the trouble that would occur on account of the transfer of this contract, he would not have taken it over."

Substantially the same testimony was given by Mr. Susman. Plaintiff testified that he did not remember such statements, but the court accepted the testimony of the other witnesses, as it had a right to do, and this justified the finding which appellant questions. The law applicable under such a finding is clear. The original contract between William A. Butler and defendant was, while effective, an asset of the former which was capable of being subjected to the claim of the intervener as a creditor in satisfaction of his judgment. Treating the contract between the Butlers as an independent contract, it was nevertheless one under which plaintiff took over the work agreed to be done by William A. Butler for a consideration the same in amount as the former had contracted to do the work for, and which was entered into and performed for the express purpose of defrauding the intervener as a creditor out of any right which he may have had against William A. Butler, his debtor, had the latter completed the original contract. No right, legal or equitable, can arise out of a fraudulent transaction of this kind which would prejudice the substantial interests of a creditor. Any such contract or arrangement entered into with the intent to hinder, delay, or defraud a creditor is void as to him.

> "One who knowingly takes a conveyance or assignment to aid or abet a scheme to defraud creditors cannot hold the fraudulent instrument, or any interest under it, as against the creditors to secure the amounts paid for it, or for the satisfaction of taxes or incumbrances he had paid upon the property it affects." Burt v. Gotzian & Co., 102 Fed. 937, 43 C. C. A. 59.

The effect of such attempted transfer is clearly stated in First National Bank of L. A. v. Maxwell, 123 Cal. 360, 55 Pac. 980, 69 Am. St. Rep. 64, as follows:

> "The Code expressly declares that such a transfer 'is void against all creditors of the debtor.' 'A void thing is as no thing.' So far as existing creditors are concerned, the title and ownership of the property remains in the fraudulent grantor as fully as though no transfer had been attempted. In 1 Freeman on Executions, § 136, it is said: 'As against the fraudulent transferee the creditor may seize the property, whether real or personal, as that of the fraudulent vendor, and may proceed to sell it under execution. The title transferred by such sale (on execution) is not a mere equity—not the right to control the legal title and to have the fraudulent transfer vacated by some appropriate proceeding; it is the legal title itself, against which the fraudulent transfer is no transfer at all.' This language was quoted and approved by this court in Judson v. Lyford, 84 Cal. 507 [24 Pac. 286]. See also, Bull v. Ford, 66 Cal. 176 [4 Pac. 1175], where the same point was decided."

As the contract between the Butlers was void as far as the creditor Johnson was concerned, the debt due from the defendant was to be treated as a debt due from it to William A. Butler, subject to be levied upon by the judgment creditor, and which the defendant was justified in paying over to the sheriff upon such levy. Section 716 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that:

> "After the issuing of an execution against property, and before its return, any person indebted to the judgment debtor may pay to the sheriff the amount of his debt, or so much thereof as may be necessary to satisfy the execution; and the sheriff's receipt is a sufficient discharge for the amount so paid."

[3] Under this section the defendant paid the sheriff $705, which became due April 16, 1910, as a payment under its contract with William A. Butler. It is true that when the execution was levied on March 23, 1910, this payment was not due, but this fact had nothing to do with the validity of the payment made by defendant after it had become due. It was not essential to the validity of the payment that there should have been any levy at all. Under the section the conditions which justified the payment by the debtor are that an execution against the property of the debtor has been issued, and not returned. A levy has nothing to do with the right of the debtor to pay to the sheriff. The case of Skelly v. Winchester School Dist., 103 Cal. 652, 37 Pac. 643, is directly in point. There it was held that, although the defendant, being an instrumentality of the state, could not be the subject of garnishment, yet, under the provisions of said section 716, it was authorized voluntarily to pay the amount of a debt due to its creditor to the sheriff while the sheriff has in his hands an execution issued upon a valid judgment against the creditor of the district.

Likewise as the interest of William A. Butler in the original contract was unaffected as to the rights of the creditor Johnson on account of this fraudulent transaction with plaintiff, this afforded sufficient justification for the trial court to direct that there be paid by the defendant to Johnson the sum of $156.67 as the balance due on his judgment.

[4] It will now be observed that deducting these amounts—$705 and $156.67—from the $1,440 due under the original contract leaves the sum of $578.33 unpaid and in the hands of the defendant. The defendant admitted that it was indebted under the original contract for that amount, but contends that it owes it to William A. Butler, and not to the plaintiff, and this is the effect of the judgment rendered by the trial court. In this conclusion we are of the opinion that the trial court was in error. Assuming, as the court found, that the contract between the Butlers was void as an attempted assignment of the original contract, then the work under it must be deemed to have been done by William A. Butler, and on this theory the payments thereunder were due to him alone. But one of the causes of action set up by plaintiff as the basis of a recovery against defendant was an assignment by William A. Butler to him of all moneys due or to become due under the original contract which was made after the work was fully performed and accepted by the defendant. The theory of the trial court was that this assignment of these moneys due under the original contract was void, as controverting the clause of the contract against assignment. But it is apparent from the terms of the prohibition against assignment that this went only to the performance of the work itself, which was to be personally supervised by William A. Butler. It did not apply to the benefits accruing on performance of the work. He was to perform the work before any liability could exist for the final payment. That work was done, and all that was assigned was the final payment earned, but not yet due. The mere assignment of moneys due or to become due, although the contract may not be assigned, is held not to be an assignment of the contract. National Surety Co. v. Maag, 43 Ind. App. 16, 86 N. E. 862; In re Wright, 157 Fed. 544, 85 C. C. A. 206, 18 L. R. A. (N. S.) 193; Dickson v. City of St. Paul, 97 Minn. 258, 106 N. W. 1053; Fortunato v. Patten, 147 N. Y. 277, 41 N. E. 572.

The assignment of the payments being valid, the court should have entered a judgment in favor of the plaintiff for this balance of $578.33. It had all the parties before it, so that complete disposition of the matter could be had. The claims of Johnson, the intervening creditor, were satisfied. Defendant had admitted that it owed the money. One or the other Butlers was entitled to it. William A. Butler was before the court, having answered the complaint in intervention. He made no claim to the money, and clearly under his assignment was estopped from doing so. It is true, as found by the court, that the defendant had no notice of this assignment until this action was brought. This, however, would only affect the matter of costs. But under the circumstances we do not think the defendant is entitled to any consideration in that matter. While it had no notice until this suit was brought of this particular assignment, it had several notices served upon it which showed that plaintiff was quite persistently claiming that he was entitled to the money from the defendant, and that as between the Butlers, who were the only ones, except the creditor Johnson, who made claim to a portion of it, he was entitled to it.

As we have said, we do not think it is necessary to pass upon the question as to the nature of the contract between the Butlers, whether, in effect, an assignment or an independent contract. This would only be necessary if we thought the matter of a lien in favor of the plaintiff was important. But it is not. Plaintiff, for the reasons heretofore given, would not in any event be entitled to recover a greater sum than the amount of the balance of the final payment due by the terms of the original contract. The defendant admitted that indebtedness and its willingness to pay it to William A. Butler. No question arises but that it is amply able to make the payment and to whoever the court determines is entitled to it.

The judgment is reversed, with directions to the lower court to enter a personal judgment in favor of plaintiff against the defendant for $578.33, and costs.

1. Criminal Law (§ 823*)—Instructions—Reasonable Doubt.

An instruction in a criminal case as to direct and circumstantial evidence, and that if the testimony was sufficient to convince the jury beyond a reasonable doubt and to a moral certainty that accused committed the act charged, although the fact was surrounded in a degree by a doubt, they should convict, though possibly objectionable standing alone, because of its failure to make clear the distinction evidently contemplated between a reasonable doubt and any other doubt, was not erroneous, where the court had fully instructed on the subject of reasonable doubt and charged that a reasonable doubt was not every possible or fanciful doubt which might be suggested to the minds of the jurors, and that a mere surmise or conjecture did not constitute such a doubt, as the jury must have understood that the court, in referring to a doubt which would not prevent a conviction, was referring to a possible or fanciful doubt, surmise, or conjecture.

2. Convicts (§ 5*)—Crimes—Evidence—Conspiracy.

On the trial of a life convict for assault with a deadly weapon, the prosecution had a right to prove a conspiracy between accused and other prisoners under which the assault was made, if such a conspiracy existed, and the admission of unsuccessful inquiries with a view to establishing a conspiracy evidently made in good faith and subsequently stricken out was not erroneous.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Convicts, Cent. Dig. § 4; Dec. Dig. § 5.*]

3. Criminal Law (§ 1171*)—Trial—Improper Remarks by Counsel.

On the trial of a life convict for assault with a deadly weapon, the remark of the district attorney, in response to the testimony of another prisoner, that he did not tell the guard that the prosecuting witness struck accused first because the guard would not have believed him, that that was unfortunate for the witness, though improper, was not prejudicial to accused, where the court immediately ordered it stricken out and instructed the jury to disregard it.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; J. W. Hughes, Judge.

Samuel E. Swearington was convicted of assault with a deadly weapon while undergoing a life sentence in a state prison, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Chas. B. Harris, of New York City, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the People.

LORIGAN, J. Under section 246 of the Penal Code, held to be constitutional by this court in People v. Finley, 153 Cal. 58, 94 Pac. 248, and affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States in the same case (Finley v. State of California, 222 U. S. 28, 32 Sup. Ct. 13, 5 L. Ed. 75), the appellant was prosecuted by information charging him, while undergoing a sentence for life imprisonment in the state prison at Folsom, with having committed, with malice aforethought, an assault with a deadly weapon upon one William Robinson. He was tried and convicted, and, as the section provides shall be done upon conviction of such offense, sentence of death was imposed upon him. He appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The evidence shows that on August 25, 1912, defendant and Robinson, both prisoners at Folsom, the former undergoing a life term for murder, were both in the main corridor of the prison where Robinson was reading a paper; that, without any warning or any altercation between them, defendant assaulted Robinson with a knife, inflicting grievous wounds upon his side, back, and arms, and was persisting in his attack when restrained by one of the prison guards. The reason for the attack, as stated by the defendant to the officers of the prison immediately after the assault, was that Robinson had informed on one of the other prisoners with reference to a contemplated effort to escape, and he wanted to teach him a lesson.

No question is made of the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict, but on behalf of the appellant it is urged for a reversal that the court erred in one of its instructions to the jury and in several particulars erred in its rulings upon the admissibility of evidence. Misconduct on the part of the district attorney is also assigned as error warranting a reversal.

[1] The instruction claimed to be erroneous was proposed by the prosecution and given by the court. It is as follows:

"There are two classes of evidence recognized and admitted in courts of justice, upon either of which, if sufficiently strong to establish guilt beyond a reasonable doubt and to a moral certainty, you may lawfully find an accused guilty of crime. One is direct or positive testimony by an eyewitness of the commission of the crime. The other is proof by testimony of a chain of circumstances pointing adequately strong to the commission of the crime by the defendant, and which is known as circumstantial evidence. Such evidence may consist of admissions by the defendant, statements made previous to the commission of the crime, and after its commission, and, in short, any acts, declarations, or circumstances admitted in evidence, tending to connect the defendant with the commission of the crime. All that is required is this: If the testimony in this case is sufficient to convince you, beyond a reasonable doubt and to a moral certainty, that the defendant did commit the act charged, although the fact be surrounded, in a degree, by a doubt, then it is your duty to convict the defendant."

The attack is directed against that clause in the italicized portion of the instruction, "although the fact be surrounded, in a degree, by doubt." Appellant insists that this language, without any explanation on the part of the court as to what was meant by it, told the jury in effect, and contrary to well-established principles of law, that, if there was a degree of doubt, they must convict the defendant. While this instruction, if it stood alone, might be open to the criticism that it did not define what does and what does not constitute reasonable doubt, a distinction evidently contemplated by the language of the instruction, this was so clearly defined by other instructions previously given in connection with the one under consideration that the jury could not have but understood what the court meant by the language it employed. The court had already instructed them on the subject of "reasonable doubt"; had given them the old and approved instruction clearly and explicitly defining it; that it consisted of a doubt of the guilt of the accused existing after a full comparison and consideration of all the evidence in the case. It further instructed them, as is usual, that the term "reasonable doubt" did not mean every possible or fanciful doubt which might be suggested to the minds of the jurors; that a mere surmise or conjecture did not constitute "reasonable doubt," and used similar and further language in marking the distinction between what amounted to reasonable doubt and what did not. With these instructions given on the matter of "doubt," reasonable or otherwise, the instruction in question was given, and it is to be considered as the court intended it should and as the jury naturally would consider and interpret it, in connection with and in the light of the previous instructions on the matters referred to in it. It will be observed that the instruction attacked was dealing with two classes of evidence which might be considered by the jury—direct or positive evidence and circumstantial evidence—and correctly informed them in the opening sentence of the instruction that either class, "if sufficiently strong to establish guilt beyond a reasonable doubt and to a moral certainty," would lawfully warrant a jury in finding one accused of crime guilty. Then, after defining direct or positive evidence and also circumstantial evidence, the court closed the instruction on those subjects with the direction as to the duty of the jury with respect to either class of evidence and used the language which appellant criticises. But, taking the entire latter portion of the instruction in the light of previous definitions, the jury could not have misunderstood what was meant by it. They were again thereby instructed as in the opening clause that in order to convict the defendant they must be satisfied, "beyond a reasonable doubt and to a moral certainty," of his guilt. It was not necessary for the court to again define reasonable doubt. It had already done so by previous instructions, and when in this connection the court said that, if so convinced, they should convict the defendant, "although the fact be surrounded in a degree by doubt," the jury, having in mind also the previous instructions of the court, must have understood this language to refer to that "doubt" which did not amount to a "reasonable doubt"; some possible or fanciful doubt, surmise, or conjecture, which might suggest itself in any case, but which, not arising from a consideration of the evidence, would not, as the court had theretofore instructed them, amount to or constitute a reasonable doubt of guilt.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

Under the entire portion of the instruction attacked, the court was simply pointing out to them that any "doubt" which they might entertain or act upon must be a reasonable doubt as had been previously defined and no other.

As to the assignments of error made by appellant of the rulings of the court with respect to the admission of evidence, these are not of sufficient moment to require a detailed discussion nor except that this is a capital case would they call for any discussion at all.

[2] The prosecution was permitted to ask some questions of witnesses over the objections of defendant on the claim that it intended to prove a conspiracy between the defendant and some other prisoners under which the assault was made by defendant on the prosecuting witness. In this connection, in addition to other inquiries, the prosecution sought to show the relations between defendant and other prisoners claimed to have been in the conspiracy and a prisoner named Smith. Appellant claims this was error. But a sufficient answer to this is that the prosecution had a right to prove such a conspiracy if it existed, and the inquiries made by the prosecution were properly directed to that end. It failed, however, to elicit any evidence sustaining it, and all the evidence that was introduced on the subject was stricken out on motion of the appellant. The witnesses who were called by the prosecution as to the relationship of Smith to the conspiracy knew nothing which would throw any light on that subject and gave no answers which were in any way prejudicial to the defendant. The fact that unsuccessful inquiries were made with a view to establishing a conspiracy, and which were evidently made in good faith, cannot be assigned as an effort to prejudice the case of the defendant.

[3] A prisoner testifying on behalf of the defendant stated that Robinson had struck the defendant before the latter assailed him. On being asked by the district attorney why he had not told the prison guard who took the knife from defendant that the prosecuting witness Robinson had struck the defendant before he assaulted him, he replied that he had not done so because the guard would not have believed him if he had, to which the district attorney responded, "That is unfortunate for you." This remark of the district attorney, was, of course, improper. But as the court immediately ordered it stricken out and at once instructed the jury to disregard it, the defendant cannot be said to have been prejudiced thereby.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Glenn County; Wm. M. Finch, Judge.

William Crawford was convicted of crime, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Geis & Geis, of Willows, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

BURNETT, J. Sexual intercourse under the age of consent was the offense charged in this case, a conviction was secured on the uncorroborated testimony of the prosecutrix, who is the daughter of defendant, and he was sentenced to 30 years in the penitentiary.

Appellant calls attention to the admonition given to the jury, and which is deemed proper in such cases, to view the testimony of the prosecutrix with caution, and claims that it must have been entirely disregarded in the determination of his guilt. It is declared that discredit and distrust naturally arise from the consideration of the manifold inconsistencies and irreconcilable contradictions of the witness and that the jury's conclusion can only be accounted for on the ground of passion and prejudice. To this deplorable result, it is urged, the unfairness of the district attorney contributed in no small degree, and appellant goes even further, in the claim that when fairly considered the record does not furnish sufficient support for the verdict.

The following portions of the transcript relating to the testimony of the girl are probably sufficient to indicate the basis of appellant's contentions. In her direct examination this appears:

"Q. Did your father have and accomplish with you the act of sexual intercourse? Mr. Geis: We object to that; that calls for the conclusion of the witness. The Court: Overrule the objection. A. Yes, sir. * * * Mr. Purkitt: Tell in your own language just what occurred. A. I can't tell you. Q. Yes you can, you can tell how it happened. The Court: Ask her the question, where he was, and what he did, and what she did. Q. (by Mr. Purkitt) Where were you? A. Down at the river. Q. Were you in the house or tent? A. In tent."

In answer to further questions she said her father came into the tent and got on top of her, and she raised her clothes, and this followed:

"Mr. Purkitt: Just tell us what went on. A. I don't know what you mean. Q. Did he get his parts into you? A. No, sir; he did not."

And she further declared that he "never did." She answered similarly in reference to another occasion, and then the record proceeds:

"Q. Did it hurt you any that time? A. No, sir; not very bad. Q. Did it hurt you some? A. No, sir; not to speak of. Q. Did it hurt any? A. No, sir. Q. Why did you say not to speak of? A. Oh, it didn't hurt me."

The district attorney then, for the purpose of refreshing her memory, as he stated, called her attention to her testimony before the grand jury as follows:

"Q. Now Ada, are you willing to make a clean breast of the entire affair? A. Yes, sir. Q. I would now ask you who was the man who had intercourse with you? A. My father."

Further questions and answers of the examination before the grand jury were then read, over objection, from which it appears that she minutely detailed the acts of appellant showing the complete offense as set out in the indictment. Then follows:

"Mr. Purkitt: Did you testify to that, that way, before the grand jury? A. I don't understand more than half of it. The Court: The question is whether you said that before the grand jury? A. I don't remember whether I said that or not, but he didn't."

The witness was then interrogated further about the charge, and, her answers apparently being a disappointment to the district attorney, he asked her where she had been, and if she had talked with anyone or received any letters or telephones about the case. Nothing of consequence was discovered, and the record continues:

"Q. What reason do you give for changing your testimony? A. Changing it? Q. Yes. A. I don't know. Have I changed it any? Q. Yes, you have changed it. What reason do you give? A. I didn't know I had changed it any."

Her attention was then directed to the fact that she had made a written statement at the time she was before the juvenile court and, in reply to a question by the district attorney whether her testimony now is the same, she replied:

"Yes, it is; I think it is. I might have not said every word the same, but them."

She was then again taken over the same ground with the same result, and the district attorney read what purported to be a written statement by her at the time of the said juvenile court examination, and this follows:

"Q. Did you write that? A. Yes, I wrote it. Q. That's so, is it? A. I made a mistake there; he never raised my clothes. I did that myself. Q. Why did you put that in here? A. I don't know. I didn't think, I guess, or something. I don't know why I did it. Q. You are willing now to take that onto yourself? A. Yes, sir. Q. All the blame on yourself? A. I am, because he never raised my clothes at all."

Again she was asked if she had talked with any one who told her to change her testimony, and she answered:

"No, sir. I never spoke a word to anybody only just Mrs. Stochhinni, and she didn't say anything. Q. How came you to change it? A. I don't know. I never had no notes or letters nor nothing only just that one letter. I haven't talked to nobody. Q. How came you to change it? A. I don't know how I did. Q. Didn't you change it to protect your father? A. No, sir. Q. If your testimony to-day is correct, why did you give that testimony before the grand jury that you did that I just read to you? A. I don't know why I did."

The district attorney then read further from her testimony before the grand jury, and in response she said:

"Well, he didn't. Q. Why did you say then that he did? A. I don't know why I did. Q. That's all the explanation you want to give? A. Yes, sir. Q. Just read this over and see if that is correct, will you? Just read it quietly to yourself and see if that's correct. (Witness reads paper.) That's correct what you wrote there? A. No, sir; it isn't. Some of it isn't."

She was again taken over the ground covered by the charge, and the concluding portion of this part of the examination was as follows:

"Q. He did get on top of you? A. No. Q. Why did you tell me awhile ago that he did? This is no plaything here. We want the truth. Now tell us just what took place there. A. I was turned over to him, just the same as being on top of me, pretty near. Q. Why did you say awhile ago that he was on top of you? A. Ain't that the same thing? Q. No, I don't think it is the same thing. You were laying down, and he was on top of you, you said a minute ago, and now you say he was sidelings. A. He was laid down and so was I. * * * Mr. Purkitt: What do you mean by changing your testimony, coming up here now and changing it? Has anybody made any signs to you at all? A. No, sir. Q. Wouldn't you feel better to tell me the whole facts as they occurred there, straightforward, in your own way? A. I have told you. Q. You haven't told us all. A. Yes, I have. Q. Well, we will go all over it again if it takes a week."

The defendant then objected to the threatened course of the district attorney, and the court said:

"In order that the district attorney may get the former testimony and look through his notes, we will take an adjournment until tomorrow morning at 9:30."

Thereupon counsel for defendant asked for the strict enforcement of the rule that the witness "be not permitted to talk with any person connected with this case in any way at all." To this the learned trial judge responded:

"The court will take care of this witness. Court is adjourned."

On account of illness of defendant's counsel, the trial was continued the next day till the day after. The district attorney began again with the witness at the beginning of the story, and, after the girl had stated that her father came into the tent and got into bed with her and the other children, the record proceeds:

"Q. What did he do? A. He got on top of me. Q. Then what? A. That's all, I guess. Q. Tell us what he did when he got on top of you. Tell the jury what he did when he got on top of you. A. He had intercourse with me, I guess. Q. You know what he did, don't you? A. Yes. Q. And he did insert his private parts into you? A. Yes, sir. Q. Anything come from him? A. Yes, sir."

In response to questions she then related two other similar occasions in Tehama county, and the direct examination here concluded as follows:

"Have you any reason to give the jury why you didn't tell us this day before yesterday? A. Yes, sir. Q. What was it? A. I thought I could protect my father some way. Q. At the time you had intercourse at Jelly's Ferry or here, did he say anything to you? A. Yes, sir. Q. What did he say? A. He told me not to tell."

In cross-examination she was interrogated at great length about her testimony before the grand jury and she declared it was untrue as far as it tended to criminate Mr. Lunceford and exculpate her father. She also stated again that she falsified to protect her father. She admitted also that she told Judge Farnham and one time Judge Finch and also the district attorney that it was Lunceford. Then follows this:

"Q. Did your mother ask you to tell the story that you told here? A. She told me in the first place that she was going to make trouble over it. Q. Did she ask you to tell the story in order that she might get hold of the children? A. Yes, sir. Q. Did she tell you before you told her that your father had had intercourse with you, or afterwards? A. Afterwards."

Her attention was then directed to the particular circumstances surrounding the alleged intercourse, and these questions and answers appear:

"Q. Do you remember anything at all about that evening, simply save and except the fact that you had intercourse? A. No, sir. Q. Did you have a light in your room or your tent? A. No, sir. Q. Was it dark in there? A. Yes, sir. Q. What was said? A. Nothing was said at all. Q. Not a word spoken? A. No, sir. Q. He got up and went out and not a word said? A. Yes, sir. * * * Q. This might have been somebody else, might it not? A. It might have, I don't know. Q. You wouldn't tell who it was? A. No, sir. Q. Just somebody came in there and had intercourse with you and went out? A. Yes, sir. Q. And it was dark and you couldn't see who it was? A. No, I couldn't see who it was. Q. That was the only time that anybody ever had intercourse with you in this county, wasn't it? A. Yes, sir. Q. You wouldn't pretend to say, would you, who it was? A. No, sir. Q. It might just as well have been some person else over there? A. Yes, sir. Q. You don't want to be understood as saying it was your father? A. No, sir. Q. Because you don't know? A. I don't know. Q. It might have been Lunceford? A. Might have, I don't know who it was."

Then on redirect the following appears:

"Mr. Purkitt: Then on the 15th of April your father did have intercourse with you down at that place? A. Yes, sir. Q. You know it was your father, do you? A. No, sir; I couldn't say for sure it was him because it was dark there and I couldn't see. Q. Now, Ada, cutting off the matter at Jelly's Ferry, we will commence again and go all over this, so we can't be mistaken."

The district attorney then called her attention to her former statements and the record proceeds:

"Mr. Purkitt: Now at the time your father came in in April, was the time he came and had intercourse with you down at the camp? A. Yes, in the night. I guess it was him. I don't know who it was. It was dark and I couldn't see. Q. Who have you been talking to since you got out of here? Don't you know it was your father? A. I don't know. Q. You know he had been doing it to you, and you know he was the fellow that had done that down there? A. I don't know whether it is or not. Q. Now at the time you told your mother this story, did she tell you to tell the truth about it? She told you to tell just exactly how it was, didn't she? A. Yes, she told me to tell what I did. Q. And tell the truth about it? A. She didn't say to tell the truth, but she told me to say that it was. She didn't say whether to say the truth or not. Q. She said to say what happened? A. Yes, for me to say it was Papa. Q. You had already told her before that that it was Papa, hadn't you? A. Yes, sir."

Several times thereafter she was asked if she didn't know it was her father, and she reiterated the answer, "I don't know whether he did or not." The redirect examination finally concluded with these questions and answers:

"Mr. Purkitt: Let's fix the time, was it in March or was it in April, 1913, that your father had intercourse with you on the Estes ranch, at the fish camp in Glenn county, Cal.? A. April. Q. At that time he inserted his private parts into your private parts? A. Yes, sir. Q. And something came from him? A. Yes, sir."

But the ordeal was not yet over for the unfortunate girl. She was taken upon recross and stated several times that she did not know who it was; that she wouldn't state it was her father. Each counsel seemed determined to have the last word with her, so there was a re-direct examination. In that, among other things, this appears:

"Q. You remember testifying this morning the time when I was asking you the questions that the shorthand reporter read back to you? A. Yes. Q. Since then you have changed your testimony, have you? A. Yes, sir. Q. Have you changed that to protect your father? A. No. Q. Why have you changed it? A. I have changed it because it is right what I have told you. Q. Well, we will have to go all over this again."

The district attorney then read her former statements directly charging her father, and she admitted they were correct. On her re-recross examination she qualified them as before, stating she did not know it was her father, and, with one or two questions by the court, the long examination of the witness came to an end.

[1, 2] To exhibit clearly the ground of appellant's charges it seemed necessary thus to set forth at considerable length the record of the proceedings.

We cannot, of course, say that the jury disregarded the admonition to consider with caution the testimony of the prosecutrix. In view of the gravity of the offense, the serious consequences of conviction, and the palpable inconsistencies and contradictions of the witness, it would be a reflection upon the honesty or intelligence of the jurors to hold or to suggest that they did not scrutinize that testimony with the utmost care.

It is equally certain that the decision as to the sufficiency of the evidence must be against appellant. It is settled that a conviction may be had upon the uncorroborated testimony of the prosecutrix. She testified positively to acts from which only one inference could be drawn, to wit, that the defendant is guilty of the offense charged. We cannot say that said testimony is inherently improbable. While it excites wonderment and horror, it is no different in that respect from other shocking crimes that are of frequent occurrence. Nor are we authorized to say that because the witness contradicted herself time and time again, and denied many times while on the witness stand that her father had carnal connection with her, her testimony of incrimination is unworthy of belief and legally insufficient to uphold the verdict. That would be to invade the exclusive province of the jury to weigh the evidence and determine the credibility of the witnesses. The test here is not whether the witness is truthful, but whether it can be said that her testimony in favor of the verdict is inherently untrue. The jury may legally base their verdict upon statements which they believe of a witness known to be testifying falsely in material parts of his testimony. It is apparent and must have been to the jury that the testimony of the prosecutrix is surcharged with falsehood, and that circumstance casts suspicion and discredit upon the entire recital; but it did not require the rejection of what was believed to be true. It can be readily understood how the jury must have viewed the situation and made allowance for the natural desire of the child to protect her father. No doubt the jurors believed that, while it was not strange nor incredible that the prosecutrix would falsely avow her father's innocence, it was almost unthinkable that she would falsely charge him with the crime.

[3] Nor is it singular that great importunity and persistent effort were required to exact of her a statement inculpating the defendant. Ready willingness on her part to lay the unspeakable crime at her father's door would be more surprising than her apparent reluctance to tell the truth. At any rate, there is legal evidence to support the verdict, and we cannot say that it is insufficient for that pupose. People v. Kaiser, 119 Cal. 458, 51 Pac. 702; People v. Preston, 19 Cal. App. 675, 127 Pac. 660, 665. In the latter case it is said:

"But whatever the nature or character of the contradictions or inconsistencies she might have been guilty of in detailing her story, it was after all for the jury to decide whether such contradictions or such inconsistencies were of such significance as to have the effect of impeaching her statement as to the fact of the asserted sexual intercourse. In such a case as this, the appellate courts are not authorized to substitute their judgment for that of the jury and the trial court as to the weight and effect of the evidence."

It may be said, also, that while the district attorney was very persistent in his examination of the witness, we must presume that he was animated solely by a desire to elicit the truth and that his conduct does not appear to merit condemnation.

[4] Objection was made by defendant to the questions addressed to the witness as to her testimony before the grand jury. In People v. Bushton, 80 Cal. 161, 22 Pac. 127, 549, it is said:

"It is contended that the court below erred 'in allowing purported testimony of the prosecuting witness Hernandez, given at the coroner's inquest, to be read in the presence and hearing of the jury, and in allowing the coroner to give evidence of the purported testimony given before him by Hernandez on that occasion, and that it erred in not striking out such evidence as hearsay.' The evidence referred to was introduced for the purpose of impeaching the witness Hernandez, who had been put upon the stand by the prosecution, and testified in such a way as to prejudice the people's case, and inconsistently with the testimony given by him at the coroner's inquest. It was proper, for this purpose, to call the attention of the witness to what he had testified before the coroner, and read the same in the presence of the jury, and upon his denial of said testimony, to prove that he did so testify. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 2049, 2052."

But such evidence is not admissible where the witness has simply failed to testify to all that the party calling him expected or desired. People v. Mitchell, 94 Cal. 550, 29 Pac. 1106.

"Upon this subject, this court has never gone further than to hold that, where a witness called by a party has given damaging testimony against him, * * * the party calling him may show that the witness previously made statements inconsistent with his present testimony, and this ruling is apparently upon the theory that the party was surprised by the adverse testimony given by his own witness." People v. Creeks, 141 Cal. 532, 75 Pac. 103; People v. Cook, 148 Cal. 345, 83 Pac. 43.

It is apparent that this case falls clearly within the rule as thus limited. The child had given damaging evidence against the people in that she had virtually denied a fact that was essential to conviction. She had plainly shown herself to be a hostile witness, and under the decisions it was admissible to prove her inconsistent statements made on other occasions.

[5] The only other point of serious import relates to the following instruction given by the court:

"If any witness examined before you has willfully sworn falsely in this case to any material matter, it is your duty to distrust his entire evidence. I do not intimate to you that any witness in this case has testified falsely. These matters are exclusively within your province as jurors and are not to be determined by the court."

We have italicized the portion of the instruction to which the exception is taken. The claim is that the court thereby curtailed the exclusive function of the jury to determine the credibility of the witnesses; in other words, that if they followed such instructions the jurors, when they reached the conclusion that a witness had sworn falsely as to a material matter, must reject his entire testimony, although they might believe that in other material matters the witness had spoken truly. Respondent contends that taking the instructions together the jury could not have been misled. In this connection attention is called to various instructions setting forth the right and duty of the jury to pass upon the evidence, among others, the following:

"The court instructs you that to the jury exclusively belongs the duty of weighing the evidence and determining the credibility of the witnesses. In determining the credibility of a witness the jury may take into consideration the character, conduct, and manner of the witness upon the stand, their relation to the controversy and to the parties, if any, their bias or impartiality, the reasonableness or unreasonableness of the statements made, the strength or weakness of their recollection, viewed in the light of all the testimony and facts and circumstances in the case. It is the province of the jury to determine the weight and credibility to be given the testimony of the prosecutrix as well as that of all other witnesses testifying in the case."

As stated in People v. De Lucchi, 17 Cal. App. 103, 118 Pac. 935, the criticised instruction is not "a strictly correct statement of the law." It would be better to have given the familiar apothegm of the statute, "that a witness false in one part of his testimony is to be distrusted in others." But, considering the instructions together, the jury must have understood that while they were to look with suspicion upon the entire testimony of a witness who had willfully sworn falsely to a material matter it was their exclusive right to weigh the evidence and to judge of the credibility of this as of other witnesses. We think the jury could not have understood that they were instructed to reject all the testimony of such witness, but that while they were to regard it with suspicion it was their exclusive province to determine the truth or falsity of the statements. We may adopt here what was said by Mr. Justice Sloss, in People v. MacDonald, 140 Pac. 256, as follows:

"It would be a better practice, in matters of this kind, to adhere to forms of expression that have had the direct sanction of appellate courts. At the same time, we do not think the instruction, read in its entirety, was substantially prejudicial to the appellant's rights."

[6] Another answer might be made to appellant's contention here, and that is that it does not appear that the instruction was not given at the request of defendant. We cannot, of course, presume error, and, if the criticised instruction was not given at his instance, defendant should have had it so appear.

We have carefully examined the record, but have found no error that would warrant a reversal of the judgment or order denying the motion for a new trial, and they are therefore affirmed.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; HART, J.

SMILIE v. SMILIE. (Civ. 1222.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 9, 1914.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1002*)—QUESTIONS REVIEWABLE—FINDINGS ON AFFIDAVITS.

The court, on appeal from an order denying a change of venue to the county of the alleged residence of defendant, is bound by the rule controlling it, where oral testimony is presented for review, and, where there is any conflict in the affidavits, those in favor of the ruling of the trial court must be considered as established.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3935–3937; Dec. Dig. § 1002.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 912*)—QUESTIONS REVIEWABLE—FINDINGS ON AFFIDAVITS.

Error is not presumed, but all intendments are in favor of the action of the trial court, and affidavits on behalf of the successful party, opposing a motion for a change of venue, are deemed to establish the facts directly stated therein and also the facts which may be reasonably inferred from the direct statements.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 3689; Dec. Dig. § 912.*]

3. DIVORCE (§ 66*)—VENUE—"RESIDENCE" OF PARTIES.

Where, on a motion of a wife to change the venue of an action by her husband for divorce from A. county to S. county, it appeared that the wife resided with her husband in A. county until June 28th, when, without his consent, against his will, and through no misconduct of his, she departed and went to reside with a sister in S. county, and there remained until June 30th, when she left for another county, taking with her all her personalty, and had not returned to S. county August 21st, that she had said nothing about her intention to take up her residence in S. county, and that when she left her husband's home she left there some of her personal effects, the court properly refused to change the place of trial, for it did not appear that the wife had a residence in S. county within Pol. Code, § 52, prescribing the rules to be observed in determining a person's residence, which indicates permanency of occupation as distinct from lodging or boarding or temporary occupation.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; T. W. Harris, Judge.

Action by Robert Howard Smilie against Florence Lucia Smilie. From an order denying the motion of defendant to change the place of trial, she appeals. Affirmed.

C. E. McLaughlin, of Sacramento, for appellant. Schwartz & Powell, of Oakland, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Motion to change the place of trial from Alameda county to Sacramento county. The motion was based upon the demand and the affidavit of defendant; the ground of the motion being that, at the commencement of the action, defendand was and ever since has been a resident of Sacramento county.

The action is for divorce, the complaint alleging extreme cruelty, and was filed July 15, 1912.

The affidavit states:

"That since the 28th day of June, 1912, said defendant, Florence Lucia Smilie, has resided in and intends to continue to reside in the county of Sacramento, state of California; that ever since said 28th day of June, 1912, said defendant, Florence Lucia Smilie, has been a resident of said county of Sacramento."

The remaining portion of the affidavit relates to the statement to her counsel of the facts connected with the case and the advice given that she has "a sufficient and substantial defense on the merits to said action."

In a further affidavit defendant sets forth the following facts:

"That on the 28th day of June, 1912, said defendant, Florence Lucia Smilie, commenced to reside at 1118 Twelfth street, in the city of Sacramento, county of Sacramento, state of California, at which point all her property and personal effects have since been; and since said 28th day of June, 1912, said defendant has continued to reside in the city of Sacramento, county of Sacramento, state of California, except while temporarily absent for the benefit of her health and as advised by her physician, at Tahoe Pines, on Lake Tahoe, in the county of Placer; that at all times while so temporarily absent she has in good faith intended to and still intends to return to her said residence in the city of Sacramento, on or about the 1st day of September, 1912; that ever since said 28th day of June, 1912, defendant has in good faith intended to and still intends to have and fix, and she has fixed, her home and habitation and residence in said city of Sacramento, county of Sacramento, state of California, where she in good faith intends to reside in the future."

Counter affidavits were filed by plaintiff as follows: Mrs. A. M. Smith deposed:

That her address is 1118 Twelfth street, Sacramento, Cal. "That she is personally acquainted with Florence Lucia Smilie, the defendant in the above-entitled action; that the said defendant came to the residence of affiant on the 28th day of June, 1912, from her previous residence in Berkeley, Alameda county, Cal. That the said defendant remained in the house of affiant from the said 28th day of June, 1912, to the 30th day of June, 1912, and went to Lake Tahoe in the county of Placer, state of California, and that since said 30th day of June, 1912, the said defendant has not been at, nor has she returned to, the residence of affiant. That said defendant took with her at the time she left, on the said 30th day of June, 1912, all of her personal belongings, and that she left no personal belongings, clothes, or other things at the residence of affiant (contrary to defendant's statement). That affiant believes that, if the said defendant had returned to the city of Sacramento, she would have come to the residence of affiant and stayed there with her, for the reason that the sister and brother-in-law of said defendant have been living in the residence occupied by affiant for a period of several years last past. That during the time that the said defendant was with affiant as aforesaid, the said defendant made no reference of any kind or statement to the effect that she intended to take up her permanent residence and place of abode in the city of Sacramento. That the same defendant at such time told affiant that she was going on through to Lake Tahoe. That affiant thereupon asked the said defendant if her husband, plaintiff above named, was to join her at Lake Tahoe, and the said defendant replied that he was not coming just at present; and further affiant saith not."

Plaintiff made affidavit, on August 20, 1912, as follows:

"That he is the plaintiff in the above-entitled action. That on the 29th day of February, 1912, at the time of the marriage of affiant and defendant, defendant was a resident of the state of Minnesota. That immediately thereafter affiant and defendant came to the county of Alameda, state of California, to the home of affiant to reside. That defendant then and there became a resident of said county of Alameda, and continued to be a resident thereof up to and including the time of the commencement of this action, and was a resident thereof on the 15th day of July, 1912, the day upon which this action was commenced. That on the 28th day of June, 1912, defendant left the home of affiant without the consent of affiant, and against his will and through no fault or misconduct of affiant. That when defendant left the home of affiant, she took with her certain of her personal effects, and left certain other of her personal effects at the home of affiant. That about the said time, defendant's mother, in the presence and hearing of defendant, said to plaintiff, in substance: 'Can we leave these boxes here until we decide what we are going to do, or where we are going to locate, and, when we notify you, will you send them to us?' That defendant then and there made no comment. That neither defendant nor her mother has ever notified affiant where to send said boxes. Affiant is informed and believes, and therefore alleges: That, when defendant left his home, she went to the city of Sacramento, in said state of California, remained at a boarding house in said city of Sacramento for about one day, and went immediately from there to Lake Tahoe, in the county of Placer, state of California. That ever since said time defendant has continuously remained in and about said Lake Tahoe. That she was at Lake Tahoe at the time of the commencement of this action, and was there at the time of the making of her affidavit, on this motion for change of venue. That on the 15th day of July, 1912, defendant wrote a letter to affiant from Lake Tahoe in which she stated that she would return to Sacramento about the month of September, and would then and there be willing to see affiant and discuss their affairs. That at all of the times herein mentioned affiant has been and now is a resident of the county of Alameda, state of California. That at all times from the arrival of affiant and defendant in the county of Alameda, state of California, up to and including the 15th day of July, 1912, defendant was domiciled in the county of Alameda, state of California, which was during all of said time the residence of affiant, her husband."

Pursuant to the motion and upon the foregoing affidavits, the hearing was had, and the motion was, on August 23, 1912, denied. Defendant appeals from the order.

[1] "In the consideration of an appeal from an order made upon affidavits, involving the decision of a question of fact, this court is bound by the same rule that controls it where oral testimony is presented for review. If there is any conflict in the affidavits, those in favor of the prevailing party must be taken as true, and the facts stated therein must be considered as established." Doak v. Bruson, 152 Cal. 17, 19, 91 Pac. 1001, 1002, and cases there cited.

[2] The court states a still further rule, important to be observed in controversies of the present character, namely:

"And as error is not presumed, and all intendments are in favor of the action of the lower court, it follows that the affidavits in behalf of the successful party are deemed to establish not only the facts directly stated therein, but also all facts which may reasonably be inferred or presumed from the direct and positive statements."

See, also, Bradley v. Davis, 156 Cal. 267, 268, 104 Pac. 302.

[3] The Political Code, § 52, prescribes certain rules which are to be observed in determining the place of residence of a person, to wit: There can be only one residence and it cannot be lost until another is gained; that the residence of the husband is the residence of the wife; and that the residence can be changed only by the union of act and intent. Intention to change one's domicile is ineffectual unless accompanied by an actual change in the place of abode. There must be, as the statute declares, a concurrence of act and intent. Sheehan v. Scott, 145 Cal. 684, 79 Pac. 350.

On the 28th day of June, 1912, defendant resided with her husband in Alameda county, and on that day, as plaintiff deposes, she left his home without his consent and against his will and through no misconduct of his, and, as defendant deposed, "commenced to reside at 1118 Twelfth street, in the city of Sacramento, where her sister and brother-in-law were residing at the residence of deponent Mrs. Smith." She remained there June 29th and departed on the 30th for Lake Tahoe, and, as Mrs. Smith deposed, taking with her "all her personal belongings, and that she left no personal belongings, clothes, or other things at the residence of affiant," and had not returned up to the date of Mrs. Smith's affidavit, August 21, 1912. Mrs. Smith also deposed that defendant while with her said nothing about any intention to take up her residence at Sacramento, but "that she was going on through to Lake Tahoe." Contrary to defendant's statement in her affidavit, plaintiff deposed that when she left his house "she took with her certain of her personal effects, and left certain other of her personal effects at the home of affiant"; that defendant was present and made no comment when her mother made the following request of plaintiff: "Can we leave these boxes here until we decide what we are going to do, or where we are going to locate, and, when we notify you, will you send them to us?" and that neither defendant nor her mother "has ever notified affiant where to send said boxes"; that, on July 15, 1912, the day the complaint was filed, and, of course, before she had any knowledge of it, "defendant wrote a letter to affiant from Lake Tahoe in which she stated that she would return to Sacramento about the month of September, and would then and there be willing to see affiant and discuss their affairs."

In re Donovan, 104 Cal. 623, 38 Pac. 456, was a case where the person concerned testified that "he came to California to live," and it was claimed that the court was bound by the direct evidence of the witness. Referring to section 52 of the Political Code, the court said:

> "He had been in this state but three days, and nothing could be inferred from his presence for so short a time as to his intention in coming, and it was for the court to determine from the whole of his testimony what his intention was."
> "Residence indicates permanency of occupation as distinct from lodging or boarding or temporary occupation. If a person actually 'lives' in a certain place with the intention of remaining there indefinitely, that place must be said to be his residence. In other words, the abiding is animo manendi when residence is acquired." Marston v. Watson, 20 Cal. App. 465, 468, 129 Pac. 611, 612.

So far as defendant's acts show what her intention was with reference to establishing a residence, we think the trial court found sufficient in the affidavits to justify an inference that Sacramento had not become her abiding place, and that as to the acts indicating her intention there was sufficient conflict to bring the decision of the lower court within the rule above stated.

The order is affirmed.

We concur: HART, J.; BURNETT, J.

Ex parte CLARK. (Cr. 516.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. May 5, 1914.)

1. Municipal Corporations (§ 633*)—Criminal Prosecutions—Statute—Validity.

An action to recover a penalty for the violation of an ordinance, making it unlawful to sell intoxicating liquors, was, by Const. art. 6, § 20, providing that the style of all process shall be "The People of the State of California," required to be prosecuted in the name of the people; Municipal Corporation Act (St. 1883, p. 272) § 867, in so far as it authorized such action to be prosecuted in the name of the municipality, being in violation of the above section of the Constitution.

2. Criminal Law (§ 1*)—Nature of Crime—Quasi Criminal Act—"Action."

In view of Code Civ. Proc. § 24, declaring that actions are of two kinds, civil and criminal, and section 22, defining "action" as an ordinary proceeding in a court of justice by which one party prosecutes another for the enforcement or protection of a right, the redress of a wrong or the punishment of a public offense, there is no such intermediate grade between civil and criminal breaches of legal obligation as a quasi criminal act.

3. Municipal Corporations (§ 635*)—Violation of Ordinance—Criminal Prosecution.

A violation of an ordinance of a city, adopted as a police regulation, and making unlawful the sale of intoxicating liquors, was an offense against the public generally, and hence required to be prosecuted in the name of the people under Const. art. 6, § 20, requiring all process to run in the name of "The People of the State of California."

Application by Ella Clark for a writ of habeas corpus. Writ granted, and petitioner discharged from custody.

Burns & Watkins and E. D. Edwards, all of Fresno, for petitioner. H. A. Savage and M. G. Gallaher, both of Fresno, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. The questions involved in this case arise upon the application of Ella Clark for a writ of habeas corpus, alleging the unlawfulness of her confinement in the county jail of Fresno county. The undisputed facts of the case are set forth in the petitioner's application for the writ, and are substantially these: The city of Sanger is a municipal corporation of the sixth class, and has been organized and exists as such under the provisions of the Municipal Incorporation Act of the state of California applicable to cities of its class. St. 1883, p. 269. Subdivision 1 of section 862 of that act empowers such cities "to pass ordinances not in conflict with the Constitution and laws of this state or of the United States." By subdivision 14 of the same section such cities are empowered "to impose fines, penalties and forfeitures for any and all violations of ordinances; to fix the penalty at fine or imprisonment or both; but no such fine shall exceed $300, nor the term of imprisonment exceed three months." By section 867 of the same act it is provided that "the violation of any ordinance of such city or town shall be deemed a misdemeanor, and may be prosecuted by the authorities of such city or town in the name of the people of the state of California, or may be redressed by civil action at the option of such authorities." The city of Sanger, assuming to be acting under the foregoing provisions of the Municipal Incorporation Act, passed an ordinance for police regulation relating to the sale of intoxicating liquors, and kindred subjects, by the terms of which the sale of intoxicating liquors in the city of Sanger was declared to be unlawful, and the specific penalty of $40 was imposed for the breach thereof, which penalty it was provided should be recoverable in a civil action against the violator of the ordinance, which action the city of Sanger was authorized and empowered to maintain and prosecute in its own name. The ordinance further provided that:

> "Whenever judgment is given and entered in any such action in favor of the city of Sanger for the recovery of the amount of such penalty and costs, the same may be enforced by execution, as provided in section 684 of the Code of Civil Procedure of the state of California, which section of said Code is hereby adopted in so far as the same is applicable; and if the judgment in any such action direct that the defendant therein be arrested, execution may issue against the person of such judgment debtor after the return of execution against his property unsatisfied in whole or in part, and require the officer to whom the same is directed to arrest such judgment debtor and commit him to the county jail of Fresno county, state of California, until he pay such judgment according to the terms thereof, or be discharged according to law."

On the 11th day of October, 1913, the city of Sanger commenced six actions, each entitled "The City of Sanger, a Municipal Corporation, Plaintiff, versus Ella Clark, Defendant," in the recorder's court of said city. The complaint in each of said actions set forth an alleged violation of the terms of the foregoing ordinance and consequent liability of the defendant to the penalty of $40 in each case prescribed therein; a summons in each case in the usual form of process in civil actions was issued and duly served upon the defendant in the way provided for the service of civil process. The defendant in due time appeared and entered a general denial in each case, and a trial in each, apparently in the usual form of a civil trial, was had before the court, at the conclusion of which the court took the several cases under advisement, and on the following day rendered its judgment against the defendant in each case in the following form:

"That plaintiff do have and recover the sum of $40 and costs, taxed at $17.50, from the defendant Ella Clark; and that execution for said amount and costs issue according to law; and that in the event said execution is returned unsatisfied I do direct that the city marshal or other authorized officer arrest this defendant Ella Clark, and commit her to the county jail in the county of Fresno and to the custody of the sheriff of said county, until she pay the penalty of $40 hereby adjudged to be due the plaintiff, or is discharged according to law."

Upon each of these judgments a civil execution was issued and was presently returned unsatisfied, and thereupon the recorder rendered and entered in each case a further judgment in the following words:

"Execution in this action having been regularly returned wholly unsatisfied, it is by this court ordered and adjudged, as a punishment for the offense committed at the city of Sanger, county of Fresno, on September 10, 1913, as above set out, that said defendant, Ella Clark, be committed to the county jail in the county of Fresno and to the custody of the sheriff of said county for the period of 40 days, unless she sooner pay said penalty or the part remaining to be paid at the time payment is made, or otherwise discharged according to law."

Thereupon a commitment was issued by the court in the first of these cases, and delivered to the sheriff of the county of Fresno, who, acting thereunder, arrested the petitioner and imprisoned her in the county jail, from which arrest and imprisonment she now seeks to be relieved through her application for this writ. The commitments in the other five cases were also delivered to the sheriff, who holds the same subject to execution in their order upon the person of the defendant.

[1] The chief contention of the petitioner herein is that her arrest and imprisonment are illegal for the reason that she has been proceeded against and is being imprisoned in a civil action not involving fraud or a willful tort, or a militia fine in time of peace, but which, though civil in form, is criminal in nature, because solely involving the imposition of a penalty for the commission of a misdemeanor, which proceedings, the petitioner contends, were instituted and conducted by the city of Sanger in its own name and in the form and with the process of civil actions, in violation of the provisions of the Constitution, and the laws of the state passed thereunder, regulating the prosecution of persons for crimes.

Section 20 of article 6 of the state Constitution provides that "The style of all process shall be 'The People of the State of California,' and all prosecutions shall be conducted in their name and by their authority." The Penal Code provides that "Crimes are divided into felonies and misdemeanors" (section 16), and further provides that "A criminal action is prosecuted in the name of the people of the state of California, as a party, against the persons charged with the offense." Section 684. The Supreme Court of California has construed the foregoing provisions of the Constitution in several cases, and in relation to several different forms of proceeding, having for their ultimate consequence the imposition of a penalty in the form of imprisonment or other punishment involving disgrace. In the case of City of Santa Barbara v. Sherman, 61 Cal. 57, which involved an action prosecuted in the name of the city of Santa Barbara for the violation of an ordinance, the penalties of which were fine and imprisonment, the court held that the action was essentially criminal, and hence must be prosecuted in the name of the people. In the case of Kilburn v. Law, 111 Cal. 237, 43 Pac. 615, a proceeding instituted under section 772 of the Penal Code in the name of a private party for the removal of certain bank commissioners from office, the court held that, being instituted for the punishment of an offense in its nature criminal, the proceeding must be prosecuted in the name of the people. In the case of Fitch v. Board of Supervisors, 122 Cal. 285, 288, 54 Pac. 901, the court held that section 8 of the act of the Legislature adopted March 7, 1881 (St. 1881, p. 55), which provided for the institution of an action by "any interested party" against the board of supervisors to enforce the penalty of removal from office for their failure or refusal to perform the specific duties prescribed in the act, was void because in violation of the said provision of the Constitution requiring all prosecutions to be in the name of the people of the state of California. In these several cases the Supreme Court has applied this provision of the state Constitution indifferently to cases, whether they arose under city ordinances or state statutes, where the evident purpose and ultimate effect of the proceeding was to punish the defendant for an unlawful act; that this would seem to be the true test by which the validity of the proceeding must be determined, regardless of the form or circumlocutions of the statute or ordinance, there cannot be much serious question, especially when the real and vital object of the constitutional provision is divined. In requiring that all criminal actions must be prosecuted in the name of the people the framers of the Constitution had evidently in mind those safeguards which the law has invoked for the protection of the liberty, property, or honor of persons accused of public offenses—the right of trial by jury in proper cases; the right to stand mute and not to be required to be a witness against oneself; the right to have the presumption of innocence prevail until overcome by proof of guilt beyond reasonable doubt and to a moral certainty as contrasted with the mere preponderance of evidence required in civil cases; the right or compulsion to be personally present in certain stages of the proceeding, and to be there informed both audibly and visibly as to the nature and seriousness of the offense, and the need as well as the right to the benefit and aid of counsel. It was doubtless to insure these salutary safeguards for the benefit of persons sought to be penalized for either felonies or misdemeanors that this general and all-embracing clause was inserted in our state Constitution.

Counsel for the respondent has urged that the same provision is to be found in the state Constitution of Iowa, and which has been construed by the Supreme Court of that state to apply only to prosecutions before the higher tribunals referred to in the article of the Constitution of that state wherein the provision occurs, and hence not to be applicable to proceedings in inferior courts arising out of the violation of municipal ordinances. The Supreme Court of this state has not caught this distinction; nor do we think that there is reason for its application to this provision of our state Constitution; for the article therein which embraces this section refers to the judicial power of the state as vested, not only in its courts of general jurisdiction, but also "in such inferior courts as the Legislature may establish in any incorporate city or town." Const. art. 6, § 1. In this connection also it is urged by the respondent that the offense for which the defendant has been prosecuted is not such a public offense as to entitle it to the application of this section of the Constitution for two reasons: First, because it comes within that class of minor infractions of ordinances which are denoted in the decisions of several states as "quasi criminal"; and, second, because it is not an offense against the public generally, but only an infraction of the special enactment of the city of Sanger in the enforcement of which that municipality alone is interested.

[2, 3] As to the first of these refinements it may be said that no such intermediate grade between civil and criminal breaches of legal obligations is known to our law. Section 24 of the Code of Civil Procedure states that: "Actions are of two kinds: Civil and criminal." While section 22 of the same Code provides that:

> "An action is an ordinary proceeding in a court of justice, by which one party prosecutes another, for the enforcement or protection of a right, the redress or prevention of a wrong, or the punishment of a public offense."

There is no room between the terms of these two sections of the Code for quasi criminal acts or actions for their prevention or redress.

> "A criminal case is an action, suit, or cause instituted to punish an infraction of the criminal laws, and, with this object in view, it matters not in what form a statute may clothe it; it is still a criminal case." Thurston v. Clark, 107 Cal. 285, 289, 40 Pac. 437.

Nor do we think that the second refinement of the respondent can be drawn from the facts of this case. The defendant is being proceeded against for an infraction of an ordinance of the city of Sanger, adopted as a police regulation, and making unlawful the sale of intoxicating liquors in that city. The inhibited act is in its very nature an offense against the public welfare, and has always been so regarded when ordinances forbidding its commission have come under review; besides, it is expressly made a misdemeanor by the terms of the Municipal Incorporations Act; and in addition to this the defendant is actually being deprived of her liberty by being incarcerated in the county jail at public expense, in which fact or condition the general public is interested in a twofold sense. We think the offense to be clearly public in its nature, and the proceeding as clearly criminal in its character. We think, also, that the requirement of the Constitution that prosecutions shall be in the name of and by the authority of the people is one which goes to the very substance and not mere shadow of those essential rights to which the individual is entitled when proceeded against for an alleged infraction of a law having for its penalty the deprivation of personal liberty.

This view of the chief question at issue renders unnecessary a consideration of the other question presented by petitioner, relating to the concurrent operation of the five other judgments and commitments obtained in the similar and simultaneous cases brought against the defendant under the terms of the ordinance under review.

For the reasons stated the petitioner is discharged from custody.

We concur: LENNON, P. J.; KERRIGAN, J.

DAVIDSON v. GRAHAM, County Clerk.

(Civ. 1262.)

1. MANDAMUS (§ 154*) — PETITION — SUFFICIENCY.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 585, providing that, in an action arising upon contract for the recovery of money or damages only, if no answer has been filed within the time specified in the summons or such further time as may have been granted, the clerk, upon application of the plaintiff, must enter the defendant's default and immediately thereafter enter judgment for the amount demanded, and section 1085, providing that a writ of mandate may be issued to compel the performance of an act which the law specially enjoins, to justify the issuance of a writ of mandate to compel the county clerk to enter defendant's default, plaintiff was required to show by his petition that no answer was filed within the statutory time or such further time as may have been granted, and that plaintiff made application for the default.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mandamus, Cent. Dig. §§ 296–316; Dec. Dig. § 154.*]

2. JUDGMENT (§ 107*)—BY DEFAULT—DEMURRER REMAINING UNDISPOSED OF.

Conceding that a demurrer may be fully disposed of, without an order of the court, by a stipulation of the parties, the clerk was not required to enter defendant's default where a demurrer was on file undisposed of and unaffected except by a stipulation that no default should be taken against the defendant, he waiving his demurrer, and that he should have to a specified date in which to file and serve his answer, signed in the name of the defendant's attorney by his clerk, where it was not shown that the clerk had authority to sign the attorney's name, especially as the stipulation did not expressly limit the time during which it was provided that no default should be taken.

3. MANDAMUS (§ 154*) — PETITION — SUFFICIENCY.

Where plaintiff, applying for a writ of mandate to compel the clerk to enter defendant's default, relied upon a stipulation as waiving a demurrer filed by the defendant, he should have directly alleged that defendant entered into or executed such stipulation, instead of alleging that there was entered into and filed such a stipulation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mandamus, Cent. Dig. §§ 296–316; Dec. Dig. § 154.*]

Application by Mattie E. Davidson for a writ of mandate against Eugene D. Graham, as County Clerk. Demurrer to the petition sustained.

For decision in Supreme Court transferring cause to Court of Appeal, see 141 Pac. 216.

Webster, Webster & Blewett, of Stockton, for petitioner. A. H. Carpenter and Walter F. Lynch, both of Stockton, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. This is an application for a writ of mandate to compel the clerk of San Joaquin county to enter the default of one A. T. Karry for his failure to answer in a certain action brought against him by said Mattie E. Davidson in the superior court of said county.

The petition herein sets out the complaint in said action and alleges: That it was filed, that summons was issued and served upon said Karry, that he appeared and filed a demurrer, which is exhibited.

"That thereafter on the 18th day of August, 1913, there was entered into and filed in said action a stipulation in the words and figures as follows, to wit: '(Title of court and cause.) It is hereby stipulated and agreed that no default shall be taken against the defendant, A. T. Karry, he waiving his demurrer, and that the said defendant, A. T. Karry, shall have to and inclusive of September 15th, 1913, in the which to file and serve his answer on the merits. Dated this 18th day of August, 1913. Webster, Webster & Blewett, Attorneys for Plaintiff. A. H. Carpenter, Attorney for Defendant, A. T. Karry. By Walter F. Lynch, Clerk.'"

That, on December 1, 1913, the plaintiff filed with the clerk her demand for the entry of Karry's default and tendered the legal fee for the same, that the demand was refused, that thereafter, upon notice given, a motion was made in the said superior court for judgment against said Karry on the ground that he had suffered default but that the motion was denied without prejudice, and that, on December 16th, defendant Karry filed a demurrer in said action, which is set out.

[1] The claim is that it was the clear, ministerial duty of the clerk to enter the default at the time the said demand was made, and therefore that section 1085 of the Code of Civil Procedure as to mandate applies.

It is further contended that the law which "specially enjoins" that duty is found in section 585 of the said Code, which it is sufficient to quote as follows:

"Judgment may be had, if the defendant fails to answer the complaint, as follows: (1) In an action arising upon contract for the recovery of money or damages only, if no answer has been filed with the clerk of the court within the time specified in the summons, or such further time as may have been granted, the clerk, upon application of the plaintiff, must enter the default of the defendant, and immediately thereafter enter judgment for the amount demanded in the complaint."

We are dealing here simply with the question of default; therefore the nature of the said action is immaterial, although it may be said that it appears it was one to recover damages only for the wrongful levy of a writ of attachment.

It is clear, from the foregoing, that, to justify the issuance of the writ of mandate to compel the county clerk to enter said default, it must be shown by the petition herein: (1) That no answer was filed within the statutory time, "or such further time as may have been granted"; and (2) that plaintiff in the cause made application for the default. It is conceded that the demurrer was an "answer" within the contemplation of said provision, and it expressly appears that a proper application was made for the entry of the default.

[2] The only question remaining, then, is whether the demurrer filed by said Karry

was undisposed of and of force and effect at the time the demand for default was made.

It is the claim of petitioner that this demurrer was no longer operative as it had been waived by means of said stipulation. The demurrer presented an issue of law (section 589, Code Civ. Proc.), and "an issue of law must be tried by the court, unless it is referred upon consent" (section 591, Id). There is no statutory provision for waiving a demurrer that has been filed in a cause. To effectually dispose of it it is probable that an order of court is required sustaining or overruling it or allowing it to be withdrawn.

But, conceding that by stipulation it may be removed as a pleading in the case, is there a sufficient allegation to show such waiver?

[3] In the first place, there is no allegation that said stipulation was executed by said defendant Karry. In that respect the averment is "there was entered into and filed in said action," etc. There should, of course, be a direct allegation that Karry "entered into" or executed said stipulation. The waiver is the only reliance of petitioner, and that, as seen, depends upon the execution of said stipulation by Karry, and, manifestly, we cannot say that the clerk refused to perform a plain duty unless it appears from the petition herein that Karry was a party to said stipulation.

Again, the purported stipulation does not appear to have been signed by A. H. Carpenter, the attorney for defendant Karry. Assuming that the attorney for a party has authority to enter into such stipulation, it will not be claimed that it extends to the attorney's clerk. If, as a matter of fact, the clerk was authorized by Mr. Carpenter to sign the latter's name to the stipulation, there should be an allegation to that effect. In other words, it should be shown that it was the act of the attorney and not of his clerk.

We must assume that the facts disclosed to the clerk were only those exhibited here by this petition. It is too much, therefore, to demand of him that he should enter the default of a party where the latter's demurrer is on file undisposed of and unaffected except possibly by a purported stipulation simply purporting to be signed by a clerk of the attorney for said party. But, if effect be given to said stipulation, it would at least appear doubtful whether, according to its terms, the clerk should enter the default of defendant Karry. Therein it is provided that "no default shall be taken against the defendant A. T. Karry." As to this covenant, there is certainly no express limit as to time. Probably the parties signing the paper intended to provide that no default would be taken prior to September 16, 1913, but if so it should have been more clearly expressed, and it is not an unreasonable construction that, in view of the waiver of the demurrer, no default was to be taken, although there was no express agreement to extend the time to answer beyond September 15, 1913.

We cannot say therefore that the entry of a default by the clerk was a duty enjoined upon him by law, and the demurrer to the petition is sustained, and the peremptory writ denied.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; HART, J.

On Application for Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. On application for a rehearing, it is claimed that the faults of the petition may be avoided by an amendment, permission to file which is requested. The portion of the judgment therefore rendered that "the peremptory writ is denied" is set aside, and there is substituted therefor, "Petitioner will be allowed ten days in which to file an amended petition."

LYNIP v. ALTURAS SCHOOL DIST. OF MODOC COUNTY. (Civ. 1220.)

1. TRIAL (§ 404*)—FINDINGS OF FACT—CONSTRUCTION.

A finding that "all of the allegations of said complaint are true" was a finding, not only that an assignment, set out in hæc verba in the complaint, was executed, but that its terms were true.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 957–962; Dec. Dig. § 404.*]

2. ASSIGNMENTS (§ 73*)—BUILDING CONTRACT —FUTURE EARNINGS.

An assignment by a contractor to plaintiff recited the fact that the contractor had theretofore contracted with a school district to construct a school building, whereby the trustees were to pay certain amounts monthly as the work progressed until its completion, and the balance upon completion and acceptance of the building, and, in consideration of an advancement, assigned to plaintiff $430, "out of the payment that is to be paid to me, * * * upon the completion and acceptance" of the building, and the school trustees indorsed thereon that they recognized the assignment and agreed to pay such sum to the assignee out of the payment to be made to the contractor at the time of completion and acceptance of the building. Held, that the fund upon which the assignment operated was that which would become payable to the contractor upon completion of the building in accordance with the terms of the building contract, it being a mere equitable assignment of moneys subsequently to become due, and in no way purporting to convey a present interest, and hence upon abandonment and failure of the contractor to complete the building defendant's liability ceased to exist.

3. TRIAL (§ 404*)—FINDING BY COURT—CONSTRUCTION.

A finding that there is now due, owing, and unpaid to plaintiff from defendant, on account of moneys advanced to a contractor, held, in view of the averments of the complaint and the other facts admitted and found, a mere conclusion of law.

Appeal from Superior Court, Modoc County; Clarence N. Raker, Judge.

Action by B. F. Lynip against the Alturas School District of Modoc county. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed, with directions.

C. S. Baldwin, of Alturas, for appellant. Jamison & Wylie, of Alturas, for respondent.

HART, J. On the 6th day of June, 1911, the defendant and one A. E. Pearson entered into a contract whereby the last named agreed to construct a school building for the former for the sum of $20,350. By the terms of said contract, said Pearson was to furnish the labor and material for the construction of the building and was to complete the construction thereof, in accordance with plans and specifications adopted for that purpose, on or before the 15th day of November, 1911. It was further stipulated in said contract that payments on the contract price should be made by the school district to Pearson as follows:

"Seventy-five per cent of the value of the material and the work upon said building * * * on the first day of each month during the term of this contract, said value to be based upon the superintendent of construction's estimate. And the remainder of the said twenty thousand three hundred and fifty dollars after the full completion of said school building and upon its acceptance by the said board of trustees of the Alturas School District."

It is then provided that no installment as above specified shall be paid until the superintendent of the school building or superintendent of construction shall have first certified to the board of school trustees that the work required to be performed as a condition precedent to the right to claim and receive the payment of such installment has been fully and satisfactorily performed. It is further provided in said contract that:

"Should the said contractor, at any time during the progress of said work, refuse or neglect to supply a sufficiency of materials or workmen, the said first party shall have the right to provide material and workmen, to finish the said works, and the expense incurred thereby by said first party shall be deducted from the amount of said contract price."

The complaint alleges that on the 6th day of November, 1911, while engaged in the construction of said school building under the contract whose terms are, in part, above set forth, said Pearson—

"being short of funds and by reason thereof being unable to proceed with the erection of said building, which was then in a partial state of completion, applied to this plaintiff for the loan of $430 in cash, to enable him to procure the necessary labor and material for use in and upon said school building in the construction thereof; and upon said last-named date the said * * * Pearson duly made, executed, and delivered to plaintiff an assignment of $430 of the money payable to him, the said * * * Pearson, from said Alturas School District for the construction of said building. That said assignment so made * * * as aforesaid was in writing and was in words and figures as follows: 'Know all men by these presents, that I, A. E. Pearson, have heretofore entered into a contract with the board of trustees of the Alturas Public School District to construct a school building for said district, by the terms of which contract the said trustees of said school district have agreed to pay certain sums of money to me as the work progresses on said building, on the first day of each month until said building is completed, and the balance of the contract price to be paid to me upon completion and acceptance of said building; and, whereas in order to enable me to pay for labor and material furnished and used in said building and performed thereon, it is necessary for me to have certain sums of money from time to time and week to week during each of said months; and, whereas, B. F. Lynip has this day advanced me the sum of $430 for use by me in the payment of said labor and material: Therefore I do hereby assign and set over unto the said B. F. Lynip the said sum of $430 out of the payment that is to be made to me by the said board of trustees upon the completion and acceptance of said building as aforesaid, and to receipt for same in all respects as fully and completely as I might or could do. Dated this 6 day of November, 1911. A. E. Pearson.' And upon which said assignments appeared the following indorsements and agreements, to wit:

" 'We hereby recognize the above assignment and hereby agree to pay the sum therein named to the said B. F. Lynip instead of to the said A. E. Pearson, out of the payment to be made by us to the said A. E. Pearson on the construction of said school building at the time of completion and acceptance of said building. Dated this 6 day of November 1911. F. F. Auble, S. T. Ballard, L. S. Smith, Trustees of Alturas School District.'

" 'This is to certify that the above A. E. Pearson has accomplished work and furnished material and is entitled to more than the amount drawn, including the above amount, as per the 25 per cent basis of his contract upon the completion and acceptance of said school building. H. M. Sweeney, Superintendent.'

"That relying upon the said assignment of said A. E. Pearson and its approval thereof by said defendant, and the certificate of said superintendent, this plaintiff advanced to the said A. E. Pearson the said sum of $430 in lawful money of the United States, and the said $430 so advanced by plaintiff to the said A. E. Pearson, as aforesaid, was used by the said A. E. Pearson in paying for labor performed in the construction of said school building and in paying for material furnished in the construction thereof."

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

The complaint further avers that, at the time of the execution and delivery to the plaintiff of said assignment, the said school district was indebted to the said Pearson in a sum in excess of the said sum of $430, "in this, that by the terms of the contract entered into between the said A. E. Pearson and the said school district, the said school [district] was to withhold from the monthly payments therein specified twenty-five per cent. of the value of the labor performed on said school building and material furnished therefor, until the completion of the building." It is then alleged that said "building has been completed and is now being occupied by said defendant for school purposes, but that no part of said sum of $430, or any interest thereon, has ever been paid to this plaintiff by said defendant, or by any one else," and that the same is "now due and owing to plaintiff and unpaid to him." Upon information and belief the plaintiff alleges that the defendant "has used and expended for other purposes than paying this plaintiff the sums of money withheld by it out of the money owing by it to the said A. E. Pearson as aforesaid, and that none of said money so withheld by it as aforesaid is now available or will be available at any time hereafter, for the payment of the said $430 and interest, or any part thereof to this plaintiff."

A demurrer on general and special grounds was interposed to the complaint and overruled.

The gist of the defendant's defense is set forth in paragraph 6 of its answer, wherein it is admitted that the contract above described was entered into on the 6th day of June, 1911, between said Pearson and the defendant; that Pearson thereupon commenced the performance of said contract, and at various times, as the work progressed, the defendant paid to Pearson all sums of money due and owing to him by virtue of the terms of said contract; that on the 1st day of January, 1912, and before the completion of the school building according to the terms of said contract, Pearson "neglected and refused to furnish labor and material necessary to complete said school building" according to the requirements of said contract, "and abandoned his said contract and said uncompleted school building." Thereupon, so the answer proceeds, the defendant, in pursuance of the authority so vested in it by said contract, entered into and took possession of the uncompleted school building, and proceeded to complete the same in accordance with the terms of said contract and the plans and specifications adopted therewith, and to that end furnished the required labor and materials, "expending therein for such necessary labor and materials to complete said school building the entire balance of said contract price remaining in its hands over and above the sum theretofore paid to said Pearson under the terms of said contract; that all sums of money which became due said A. E. Pearson under or on account of said contract were fully paid by defendant to him, or to his order, prior to the time of his abandonment of said contract as aforesaid, and by reason of the failure of said Pearson to complete his said contract, and his abandonment thereof, no sum of money was, or ever at any time became, due thereunder out of which defendant could lawfully pay to plaintiff the sum sued for on account of said assignment."

The court found that the contract as above described was entered into between Pearson and the defendant on the 6th day of June, 1911; that Pearson entered upon the execution of the terms of said contract; that on the 6th day of November, 1911, Pearson borrowed the sum of $430 from the plaintiff upon the assignment and indorsements thereon, as set out in the complaint and above quoted; that, at the time of the execution of said assignment, the defendant was indebted to Pearson in an amount greatly exceeding the sum so loaned by the plaintiff to Pearson for work already performed by the latter on said building; that after said assignment was delivered to the plaintiff Pearson performed work and labor upon the building amounting to the sum of $1,497.66, and that after said assignment was made and delivered to plaintiff the defendant paid over to Pearson, for work performed on said building and materials furnished for the same, the sum of $5,200; that the defendant paid said Pearson, on account of said contract, the aggregate sum of $14,895, of which amount the sum of $5,200 was made in three different payments subsequently to the date of the execution and delivery of said assignment and the acceptance thereof by the defendant, to wit, November 9, 1911, $4,100, December 4, 1911, $600, December 18, 1911, $500; that said payments were based upon the written estimates furnished by the superintendent of construction, except the payments of December 4 and December 18, 1911, and amounting to 75 per cent. of the superintendent's estimate of the value of labor and material furnished for the building by the contractor during the month preceding the payment. The court found that Pearson commenced the construction of said school building and continued work on the same up to about January 1, 1912, "at which time he abandoned his contract," after which the defendant took possession of and completed the building in accordance with the "Pearson contract, and necessarily expended therein the sum of $5,848.38 for labor and materials. At the time of the abandonment of said contract by said Pearson on January 1, 1912, there was in the building fund of said school district the sum of $5,455, the balance of the contract price of said school building, all of which moneys were subsequently expended by defendant in completing said building according to the Pearson contract." The court further found that:

"All of the allegations of the said complaint are true, and that the said school building was fully completed on or about September the 1, 1912, and ever since then has been used and occupied by defendant as its public school building."

From its findings, the court concluded, as a matter of law, that "the defendant is justly and legally indebted to plaintiff in the sum of $430, with interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum, from December 1, 1911, to this date, and that said last-named sum, with said interest, is now due, owing, and unpaid to plaintiff from the said defendant," and accordingly awarded judgment to the plaintiff for said amount.

This appeal is by the defendant from the judgment on the judgment roll alone.

The defendant insists that on the facts found by the court the judgment ought to have been for it. Its position is, as is manifest from the defense set up in the answer, as above indicated, that the assignment by Pearson to the plaintiff was of the money to accrue in favor of the former on the 25 per cent. of the contract price of the building and to become due and payable to Pearson only on the completion by him of the construction of the building according to his contract with the defendant. In other words, the contention of the defendant is that the assignment was not intended to operate upon any moneys becoming due and payable to Pearson as the work progressed, on the 75 per cent. basis prescribed by the building contract, but solely and exclusively upon the fund to become due and payable upon the completion of the terms of said contract by Pearson, and that, when Pearson abandoned his contract, and so failed to complete the construction of the building according to his agreement, the liability of the defendant under the assignment thereupon ceased further to exist. We can see no way of escaping a conclusion in harmony with the defendant's position, as above explained.

[1] The court found, as we have seen, that "all of the allegations of the said complaint are true," and this constituted a finding that the assignment, as set out in hæc verba in the complaint, was not only executed, but that its terms as so set out are true, and that the defendant accepted and assumed the liability thereby created against it and none other.

[2] The assignment so found to have been executed and delivered to the plaintiff by Pearson, and acknowledged and accepted by the defendant, needs no construction to ascertain its meaning and scope. It clearly, unambiguously, and with unerring certainty speaks for itself, and, as plainly as language can express any proposition, provides that the fund upon which it was intended exclusively to operate was that which the building contract provided should accrue and mature in the hands of the defendant, and to become payable to Pearson only upon the completion by him of the building in accordance with the terms of the building contract. As counsel for the defendant suggests, it constituted a mere equitable assignment of moneys subsequently to become due and payable, and in no way purports to convey a present interest. In other words, the vitality of the assignment, so far as it was capable of accomplishing any substantial purpose, was made to depend and did depend wholly upon the fulfillment by Pearson of a condition precedent, viz., the completion by him of the construction of the building and the consequent maturing of an obligation on the part of the defendant to pay to him, or to any one regularly and duly subrogated to his rights therein, the 25 per cent. of the contract price of the building.

That the effect and scope of the assignment was understood by all the parties to the transaction of which it was the crystallization to be limited in its operation to the fund to mature on the 25 per cent. and not on the 75 per cent. basis prescribed by the building contract, and payable on the completion of the building by Pearson, is clearly and unmistakably emphasized by the language of the written indorsement on the assignment of the acceptance or acknowledgment of said instrument and agreement by the defendant's board of trustees to pay to the plaintiff, instead of to Pearson, the sum of money named therein. Said indorsement, as seen, reads as follows:

> "We hereby recognize the above agreement and hereby agree to pay the sum named to the said B. F. Lynip instead of to the said A. E. Pearson, out of the payment to be made by us to the said A. E. Pearson on the construction of said school building at the time of completion and acceptance of said building."

Nothing could be clearer than that, by the foregoing language, the board of trustees of the defendant intended and understood that the assignment was to be restricted in its operation to the fund which, under the terms of the building contract, could only mature when the building had been completed by Pearson and accepted by the defendant, and that, since the liability thus named and assumed by the defendant was precisely the same as that created by the assignment itself, the plaintiff must thus have had emphasized upon his mind the proposition that solely upon the fund to mature only on the final completion of the building was the efficacy of his assignment made to depend.

It necessarily follows that when, as the court distinctly finds was true, the building contractor abandoned his contract before completing the construction of the building and thus failed to comply with the condition, the execution of which was prerequisitely essential to the maturing of the fund from which only the assignment, by virtue of its own terms, could be satisfied, any liability which the defendant might have incurred by reason of said assignment was thereupon extinguished, since the assignment vested in the plaintiff only such rights as the assignor had in the fund upon which the assignment was intended to operate, or, as is said in First Nat. Bank v. Perris Irr. Dist., 107 Cal. 55, 40 Pac. 45, the assignment could vest in the assignee no rights different from or superior to those of the original contractor.

[3] The only finding which furnishes even plausible ground for the contention that the judgment is sufficiently supported is the following:

> "* * * That there is now due, owing and unpaid to plaintiff from defendant on account of the money loaned and advanced by him to A. E. Pearson as aforesaid the sum of $430, with interest," etc.

But, considered by the light of the averments of the complaint and the other findings, said so-called finding must be treated as a conclusion of law rather than as a finding of fact. We may say that the so-called finding involves one of those peculiar statements which may constitute either a finding of fact or a conclusion of law, according to the connection in which or the circumstances under which it is employed. As has been well said as to matters designated "findings of fact" and "conclusions of law":

> "In one connection a word or a phrase may stand for a fact, while in another the same word or phrase may designate a conclusion of law." Hill v. Finigan, 77 Cal. 267, 19 Pac. 494, 11 Am. St. Rep. 279.

For illustration, in Gay v. Moss, 34 Cal. 125, it was held that a finding that "the assignment and delivery of the contract was a mortgage and not a pledge," although stated as a finding of fact, was, in view of the other facts admitted and found, a mere conclusion of law. See 2 Hayne on New Trial and Appeal (Rev. Ed.) p. 1388. Hence we say that the so-called finding of fact above referred to cannot, in view of the allegations of the complaint and of the other facts found by the court, be held to be anything more than a mere conclusion of law, as we will now proceed to show.

The foundation of the plaintiff's right to a recovery is obviously the assignment. Upon that instrument his right to a recovery must stand or fall. As seen, the plaintiff, in his complaint, pleaded and set out in hæc verba said assignment. The complaint nowhere alleges that, at the time of the completion of the building, there was any money due from the defendant to Pearson on account of the building contract. It is true, as seen, that the complaint avers that, "at the time the assignment was made to this plaintiff," the defendant was indebted to Pearson "for more than the said sum of $430, in that by the terms of the contract entered into between the said Pearson and the said school district, the said school district was to withhold from the monthly payments therein specified 25 per cent. of the value of the labor performed on said school building and material furnished therefor, until the completion of said building, and that at the time said assignment was made to plaintiff by said Pearson as aforesaid, the amount so at that time withheld by said defendant for work and labor and material furnished * * * in the construction of said building amounted to more than said sum of $430," etc. But that averment, conceding that it states the truth, is manifestly immaterial and can, of course, afford no aid to the plaintiff. The assignment, as is clear from its terms, solely affected a fund different and distinct from any which might have matured in favor of Pearson prior to the completion of the building, and the averment just quoted could have no more pertinency to the right of the plaintiff to recover, if any he had, than an averment that the school district was indebted to some other person than Pearson.

It is also true, as before shown, that on the assignment as set out in the complaint is the indorsement of the superintendent of construction of the building to the effect that Pearson "has accomplished work and furnished material, and is entitled to more than the amount drawn, including the above amount, as per the 25 per cent. basis of his contract upon the completion of and acceptance of said school building." While the language of said indorsement, taken by itself, is rather obscure, the succeeding averment of the complaint renders it perfectly clear that the superintendent of construction entered said indorsement upon the assignment prior to the delivery thereof to the plaintiff and before the transaction to which it related was fully completed—that is, before the plaintiff had actually advanced the money to Pearson—and that said indorsement, therefore, solely referred to the 25 per cent. remaining unpaid to Pearson on the work and materials performed and furnished up to the time of the execution of the transaction of which the assignment was the culmination. The averment referred to reads, in part:

> "That relying upon the said assignment of said A. E. Pearson and its approval thereof by said defendant, and the certificate of said superintendent, this plaintiff advanced to the said A. E. Pearson the said sum of $430," etc.

But if any doubt could by any possibility arise from the complaint as to whether the indorsement by the superintendent of construction referred to the 25 per cent. remaining due Pearson at the time the assignment was executed and delivered to the plaintiff, it must readily be removed by the finding of the court upon that proposition, as follows:

> "* * * And thereupon the said A. E. Pearson made and executed the assignment to plaintiff and secured the indorsements thereon by the said trustees, and by H. M. Sweeney, the superintendent of construction of said building, as set forth in paragraph 2 of plaintiff's said complaint, and delivered same to plaintiff as security for the said loan. And thereupon the said plaintiff accepted the said assignment, with said indorsements, from the said A. E. Pearson and loaned him the said sum of $430 in cash."

Thus it appears, as above stated, that the complaint does not anywhere allege that there was any money due Pearson on account of his contract with the defendant at the time of the completion of the building.

Now, as to the findings other than the one under present consideration: As has been shown, the court found that the assignment as pleaded by the plaintiff (the foundation of his right to a recovery) was executed, and that the terms thereof were as they plainly purport to be by the pleaded instrument itself. The court further found, as seen, that the defendant paid to Pearson, out of the contract price, the total sum of $14,895, the last payment being on the 18th day of December, 1911, or 13 days before the time at which the latter abandoned his contract to construct the building, and that the sum then remaining of the contract price, together with the additional sum of $393.38, was required and actually used by the defendant to complete the building according to the terms of the building contract after Pearson had abandoned the same. From this finding, it is clear, and, indeed, it irresistibly follows, that the fund the existence of which at the time of the completion of the building was contemplated by the building contract, and upon which alone the assignment was to operate, did not and, in the very nature of the case, could not mature in favor of Pearson or his assignee.

Thus readily will it be observed that, if the so-called finding above adverted to, viz., "that there is now due, owing, and unpaid to plaintiff from defendant on account of the money loaned and advanced by him to A. E. Pearson * * * the sum of $430," etc., is to be regarded as a finding of fact, it would not only not be responsive to or within any issue tendered by the complaint or made by the pleadings, but it would be contradictory to the other findings which, obviously, were educed from the only evidence proper to be received into the case under the issues as framed—that is to say, it would be irreconcilably inconsistent with the finding that Pearson abandoned his contract before completing the building and with the assignment itself, which, as pleaded by the plaintiff as the sole foundation of his right to a recovery the court found was executed and delivered to the plaintiff by Pearson in consideration of the loan by the former to the latter of the sum of money therein specified, which finding, in view of the plain and unobscure meaning of the instrument, necessarily implies the further finding (or perhaps it may be more accurate to say compels the legal conclusion) that the assignment was to operate solely upon a fund only to mature, under the terms of the building contract, at the time of the completion of the building by Pearson in conformity with the requirements of said contract and the acceptance of said building, as so completed, by the defendant. Hence, as stated, the so-called finding, although included by the court in its findings of fact, cannot be invested with a higher function than that of a mere conclusion of law, and, as has been shown, one which is obviously erroneous.

[4, 5] But it appears to be the view of counsel for the plaintiff that this case comes within the principle of certain cases where it is held that a contractor may abandon a building after the partial completion thereof and at the same time recover for the value of the work and material already performed and furnished. Among the cases cited by counsel as supporting that proposition is that of Adams v. Burbank, 103 Cal. 646, 37 Pac. 640. There is, however, a clearly marked distinction between that case and the case at bar in respect of the facts. In the Adams-Burbank Case it appeared that, "without cause, and in violation of the contract, defendant took possession of the building, ousted the plaintiff [contractor] therefrom, and refused to permit him to complete the same in consonance with the contract, and appropriated to his own use the material on hand and provided to be used therein or in the construction thereof." In the case at bar, neither the pleadings nor the findings show that Pearson was caused to abandon the contract or prevented from completing the building through any act or fault of the defendant. Indeed, while the complaint contains no reference to the abandonment of the contract by Pearson, the answer alleges, as seen, "that before the completion of said contract, to wit, on or about the 1st day of January, 1912, said Pearson neglected and refused to furnish labor and material necessary to complete said school building according to the terms of said contract, and abandoned his said contract and said uncompleted school building," and that thereupon the defendant entered into and took possession of said uncompleted building and furnished the labor and material and completed said building according to the terms of the Pearson contract. Presumptively, upon evidence responding to those allegations of the answer, the court based its finding that on or about January 1, 1912, Pearson "abandoned his contract and the uncompleted building was completed by defendant school district." But this finding is itself clear, definite, and certain in meaning. It can imply nothing less than that Pearson, without fault of any person other than himself, relinquished and refused to proceed with the execution of his contract according to its terms. "To abandon," says the Supreme Court of Massachusetts, in Pidge v. Pidge, 3 Metc. 257, 265, quoting Crabb on Synonyms, "is totally to withdraw ourselves from an object; to lay aside all care for it; to leave it altogether to itself," and in Sikes v. State (Tex. Cr. App.) 28 S. W. 688, 689, the word "abandon" is defined to mean "a giving up; a total desertion; an absolute relinquishment." Hence, when the court said that Pearson "abandoned his contract" it meant to find, and does find, if the ordinary, usual, and natural signification is to be attributed to words, that the abandonment of the contract was solely the result of Pearson's own act and volition—that he voluntarily relinquished or withdrew from the same without the consent of the defendant.

[6] In the foregoing discussion, we have not lost sight of the familiar rule that all presumptions are to be indulged favorably to the support of the judgment, where the appeal is not supported by a bill of exceptions or a statement of the case or other legally authenticated record of the evidence.

Our conclusion is that judgment ought to be entered upon the findings in favor of the defendant. Indeed, it is manifest that the complaint does not state a cause of action against the defendant, and that the demurrer should have been sustained on the general ground.

The judgment is reversed, with directions to the court below to enter judgment upon the findings for the defendant.

PACIFIC RYS. ADVERTISING CO. v. CONRAD, Chief of Police. (S. F. 6247.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 26, 1914.)

1. LICENSES (§ 5½*)—POWERS OF MUNICIPALITY.

It is within the power of a municipality to impose license taxes upon persons displaying advertising cards in railway cars operated through the municipality.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Licenses, Dec. Dig. § 5½.*]

2. LICENSES (§ 5½*)—LICENSE TAXES—VALIDITY.

A municipality cannot, under the guise of license taxes operating as revenue measures, subject legitimate business such as display advertising in railway cars to oppressive or unjustly discriminatory burdens, but the power of the courts cannot be invoked unless the ordinance is clearly oppressive and discriminatory; the matter otherwise being one of legislative cognizance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Licenses, Dec. Dig. § 5½.*]

3. COMMERCE (§ 16*)—INTERSTATE COMMERCE—WHAT CONSTITUTES.

Mere contracts, though executed in several states, are not of themselves interstate commerce, and hence a license tax upon display advertising in railway cars operating wholly within a municipality in the state is not invalid as a burden on interstate commerce because the corporation displaying the advertising made the contracts therefor in a foreign state.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; T. W. Harris, Judge.

Action by the Pacific Railways Advertising Company, a corporation, against John Conrad, Chief of Police of the City of Alameda. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Heller, Powers & Ehrman, of San Francisco, for appellant. A. F. St. Sure, of Alameda, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Plaintiff sought an injunction restraining the respondent from interfering with advertising cards which it was displaying in the railway cars operated by the Southern Pacific Company in Alameda. The interference of the chief of police was based upon the refusal of the plaintiff to pay the sum exacted by the license ordinance of the city of Alameda. The vital question upon the trial and upon this appeal is whether that ordinance is so unjust, oppressive, and discriminatory as to be illegal and void. Judgment passed for defendant upon general demurrer sustained to plaintiff's complaint, and plaintiff appeals.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

The complaint alleges that its business, conducted throughout various states of the United States and the cities therein, is that of displaying upon printed cards announcements of various business enterprises in street cars and steam cars carrying passengers in such cities. The general office of the corporation is in New York City, and it maintains subsidiary offices in other large cities. Under contract with the Southern Pacific Railway Company it placed its advertisements in the 57 cars operated by that company in and through the city of Alameda and other nearby cities. Plaintiff's ability to secure contracts and maintain its business depends upon its ability to place these advertising cards throughout the United States generally. The Alameda branch of its industry is in its infancy, and is maintained at a loss; the gross annual income for advertisements so displayed in the city of Alameda being about $8,000 a year, and the actual operating expenses for this branch of the business exceeding $12,000 a year. It was so maintained at a loss because it was a part of the general business, in the hope and expectation that in time plaintiff might increase its advertising rates so as to make that branch of the business profitable. The methods of public announcement or advertisements prevailing in the city of Alameda are the newspapers, outdoor displays on billboards, and displays in cars. The license provided by the ordinance of Alameda for printing and publishing newspapers, including the display of such advertisements as those presented to the public by plaintiff, is $25 per annum. No license whatsoever is required of those conducting the business of billboard displays, while the tax or license upon plaintiff's business is fixed at $100 per annum. It is further urged, as showing the discriminatory character of this ordinance, that other businesses requiring more protection and more use of public service or regulation are charged much smaller license fees. Thus banks pay $60 a year; building and loan associations $25. Finally, plaintiff pleads that the ordinance is void as being an unauthorized interference with the interstate commerce which it is carrying on. Upon these allegations plaintiff sought a judgment that the ordinance was injust, discriminatory, oppressive, and void.

[1, 2] The ordinance is clearly a revenue measure within the power of the municipality to pass. The limitations upon the exercise of this power are familiar ones, that a legitimate business such as this shall not be subjected to oppressive or unjustly discriminatory burdens. Within that limit there is full play for municipal discretion. In re Guerrero, 69 Cal. 88, 10 Pac. 261; Wolf v. Lansing, 53 Mich. 367, 19 N. W. 38; Fifth Ave. Coach Co. v. New York, 194 N. Y. 19, 86 N. E. 824, 21 L. R. A. (N. S.) 744, 16 Ann. Cas. 695; Stull v. De Mattos, 23 Wash. 71, 62 Pac. 451, 51 L. R. A. 892; Cooley, Taxation (2d Ed.) p. 599. It is only when such an ordinance is clearly unjustly oppressive and discriminatory that the power of a court may be invoked to right the wrong. Manifestly there is, and must be, a broad zone dividing and delimiting, upon the one hand, those ordinances which are clearly reasonable and just from those which are as clearly unreasonable and unjust. In all that broad zone legislative discretion operates. It is doubtful territory. Ordinances falling within it cannot be set aside by the courts, for then there is a clear substitution of the judgment of the courts for the judgment of the Legislature and thus plain judicial legislation. It would add nothing to this consideration to analyze and discuss the many cases presented for consideration by opposing counsel. The result of the consideration, however, may be declared in this: That the ordinance in question falls within the indicated zone where the view of a court may not be substituted for the determination of the Legislature.

[3] Whatever may be the general nature of plaintiff's business, the particular business for the conduct of which a license fee was here exacted was a business conducted wholly within the state of California, and in no way involved the transportation of goods. Mere contracts, though executed in several states, are not in and of themselves any part of interstate commerce within the meaning of the federal Constitution. Paul v. Virginia, 8 Wall. 168, 19 L. Ed. 357; Butler Bros. Shoe Co. v. U. S. Rubber Co., 156 Fed. 1, 84 C. C. A. 167; International Text-Book Co. v. Pigg, 217 U. S. 91, 30 Sup. Ct. 481, 54 L. Ed. 678, 27 L. R. A. (N. S.) 493, 18 Ann. Cas. 1103; Williams v. Fears, 179 U. S. 270, 21 Sup. Ct. 128, 45 L. Ed. 186; New York v. Knight, 192 U. S. 21, 24 Sup. Ct. 202, 48 L. Ed. 325.

The judgment appealed from is therefore affirmed.

Proc. § 1860, providing that a contract may be explained by reference to the circumstances under which it was made, are but declaratory of the common-law rule, and a contract reduced to writing and executed cannot be varied by parol evidence of surrounding circumstances.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 1756–1765; Dec. Dig. § 397.*]

2. EVIDENCE (§ 448*)—PAROL EVIDENCE—VARYING WRITTEN CONTRACTS.

Parol evidence of the surrounding circumstances is admissible only where on the face of the contract there is doubt, and the evidence is used to dispel the doubt by showing what the parties meant by what they said, but not by showing that they meant something other than what they said.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 2066–2082, 2084; Dec. Dig. § 448.*]

3. EVIDENCE (§ 442*)—PAROL EVIDENCE—EFFECT ON PRIOR CONTEMPORANEOUS OR SUBSEQUENT AGREEMENTS.

Where parties to a contract have reduced it to writing and the written instrument appears to be a complete and certain agreement, importing a legal obligation, it will, in the absence of fraud, accident, or mistake, be conclusively presumed to contain the whole of the agreement, and parol evidence of prior, contemporaneous, or subsequent conversations or representations is inadmissible to vary the instrument.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 1874–1897; Dec. Dig. § 442.*]

4. SALES (§ 267*)—WARRANTIES—CONTRACTS IN WRITING—EFFECT ON PRIOR CONTEMPORANEOUS OR SUBSEQUENT AGREEMENTS.

A written contract for the construction of a dredge, which stipulates that the manufacturer warrants that the dredge will move a specified quantity of material a given distance, provided it is operating in dredgable matter specifically defined, is not within Civ. Code, § 1770, providing that one manufacturing an article for a particular purpose warrants by the sale thereof that it is reasonably fit for that purpose, though it was understood that the dredge was to be used in a particular harbor, and parol evidence of an additional warranty is inadmissible.

5. CONTRACTS (§ 166*)—CONTRACTS REDUCED TO WRITING — INSTRUMENTS ATTACHED TO CONTRACT.

Where a written contract refers to an instrument specifically identified as a part of the contract, the instrument is admissible in evidence whether it tends to make the whole contract ambiguous or not, and to exclude the instrument is in ordinary cases prejudicial error.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Cent. Dig. § 749; Dec. Dig. § 166.*]

6. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1056*)—HARMLESS ERROR — ERRONEOUS EXCLUSION OF EVIDENCE.

Where a contract for the construction of a dredge according to a proposal, made a part of the contract, was complete without the proposal save in one particular, the error in excluding the proposal was not prejudicial, where the language in the proposal and not in the contract did not affect the rights or liabilities of the parties.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4187–4193, 4207; Dec. Dig. § 1056.*]

7. SALES (§ 261*)—CONTRACTS—REPRESENTATIONS—WARRANTY.

A statement by a contractor of a dredge that he had looked at the grounds of the owner and had designed a dredger which would meet the requirements is not a warranty that the dredge will do the work desired, but is merely an expression of an opinion.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Cent. Dig. §§ 727–735; Dec. Dig. § 261.*]

8. EVIDENCE (§ 441*)—PAROL EVIDENCE—VARYING WRITTEN CONTRACTS.

Where a written contract to construct a dredge according to plans contained a limited warranty, parol evidence enlarging the warranty is inadmissible.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 1719, 1723–1763, 1765–1845, 2030–2047; Dec. Dig. § 441.*]

9. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1002*)—VERDICT—CONCLUSIVENESS.

A verdict on conflicting evidence is conclusive on appeal.

10. SALES (§ 284*)—PERFORMANCE—EVIDENCE.

Where a manufacturer of a dredge, under a contract stipulating for a trial, was at all times willing and able to make the test, but the buyer failed to designate dredgable ground for the operation, and the ground in which the dredge actually operated was wholly unsuitable, the buyer could not defeat a recovery of the price on the ground that the dredge did not conform to the contract stipulating for a seven days' continuous run of the dredge, during which it should remove a specified quantity of earth per hour.

11. SALES (§ 284*)—CONTRACTS—PERFORMANCE BY BUYER.

Where a manufacturer of a dredge according to specifications showed that the winding gear and cutter on the dredge delivered were suitable for the work to be done of the character specified in the contract and that changes therein were made in an effort to operate the dredge in ground not contemplated by the contract, the changes did not show a failure to complete the dredge and did not defeat a recovery of the price.

12. SALES (§ 284*)—CONTRACTS—PERFORMANCE BY SELLER.

Where a manufacturer of a dredge able to handle a specified quantity of material per hour showed that the dredge manufactured and delivered would handle that amount of material working in the ground specified in the contract, the buyer could not defeat a recovery on the ground that the dredge was not up to contract capacity.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Cent. Dig. §§ 803–805; Dec. Dig. § 284.*]

13. SALES (§ 282*)—CONTRACTS—PERFORMANCE BY SELLER.

Where a dredge was constructed according to plans and specifications therefor, the buyer could not defeat a recovery of the price on the theory that it was improperly constructed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Cent. Dig. §§ 797, 798; Dec. Dig. § 282.*]

14. EVIDENCE (§ 441*) — CONTRACTS — EVIDENCE.

Where a contract for the construction of a dredge according to plans and specifications was reduced to writing, evidence of prior negotiations and of surrounding circumstances to vary in essential particulars without reformation the terms of the contract was properly excluded, in the absence of any fraud inducing the execution of the contract.

15. MECHANICS' LIENS (§ 10*)—STATUTORY PROVISIONS—"STRUCTURE"—DREDGE.

A dredge is not a structure within the mechanics' lien law, Code Civ. Proc. § 1183 et seq., in view of the fact that section 813 et seq., provides for a special lien on vessels and floating structures, and hence it was unnecessary to record the contract as required by the mechanics' lien law.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 7, pp. 6700–6702; vol. 8, p. 7806.]

16. SALES (§ 77*)—CONTRACTS—MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

Where a contract for the construction of a dredge stipulated that the manufacturer would furnish a captain and crew to operate the dredge for the buyer for 35 days after completion, and that during that time a test run would be made to determine whether the capacity of the dredge was up to contract, and the parties agreed that the 35 days' run should commence on a designated date, the buyer, paying all of the expenses incident to that run, was not chargeable for expenses previously incurred by the manufacturer.

17. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1151*)—POWER OF COURT ON APPEAL.

Though the Supreme Court on appeal cannot make a new finding, it may either order a new trial or modify the judgment, and where the evidence is conflicting it will not peremptorily modify a judgment rendered on a verdict pursuant to erroneous instructions on the measure of recovery, but will conditionally reduce the recovery by the amount resulting from the error, in case the successful party consents thereto.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. P. Wood, Judge.

Action by the United Iron Works against the Outer Harbor Dock & Wharf Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Conditionally modified and affirmed.

Lewis W. Andrews, Thos. O. Toland, and Cedric E. Johnson, all of Los Angeles, for appellant. Davis, Kemp & Post, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. This action was brought to recover the unpaid part of the purchase price of a dredge constructed by plaintiff for defendant. Defendant needed a dredge to deepen a portion of the harbor of San Pedro in aid of its dock and wharf business. The purpose for which the dredge was to be used and the place where it was to be used were well understood by the parties. Plaintiff had in a letter designated "D" made an offer to construct dredges of different capacity and design for different prices. This letter concluded with the following statement:

"We have looked at your grounds and have designed you a dredge which we believe will fully meet your requirements and trust you may favor us with your order for same."

In the end, these negotiations resulted in an elaborate contract for the construction of the dredge. This contract began with the following:

"It is hereby understood and agreed that the party of the first part will build and furnish to the party of the second part one 12" suction dredge in accordance with the accompanying plans and specifications and the proposal dated 8th of January, 1909, of the party of the first part, marked 'D.' The hydraulic and operating conditions of dredge to be as follows:"

The contract is too long to be set forth in full, but it goes into minute details concerning the construction of the hull, the nature and character of the dredging machinery, and the time for the completion. It further provided that the plaintiff would furnish a captain and crew to operate the dredge for the defendant for a period of 35 days after completion. In this connection it was agreed:

"The party of the first part agrees that during the 35 days in which they are to operate the dredge that they will make a test run of seven consecutive days during which time they agree to handle an average of 110 cubic yards of material per hour when working in dredgable material, at such point in the channel to be dredged as may be designated by said party of the second part, at a depth of from 10 to 20′ and transporting the spoil (material dredged) to a distance of 1,000′ or more through a 14" pipe line, providing electric current furnished is 2,000 volts, 50 cycle, three phase alternating current; so that the electric motors will operate at the proper speed. It being understood that the said dredgable material shall consist of sand, gravel and clays, excluding gravel or boulder deposits wherein the stone is larger than 8" or the percentage of large stones interfere with obtaining the quantity due to the interference of said large stones; also excluding sand rock formations."

The trial was had before a jury, verdict and judgment were for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

The dredge was constructed and turned over to the defendant. It did not prove satisfactory, did not operate successfully in removing material from the bed of the harbor, and hence this controversy arose. The fundamental difference between the parties litigant may be briefly stated. Appellant contends that plaintiff agreed under a warranty to build and deliver to the defendant a dredge capable of doing this specific work in which case clearly the proved failure of the dredger so to do would relieve appellant from liability of payment. Respondent, on the other hand, contends that the full measure of its duty is defined by the written contract between the parties and that no such warranty is therein contained.

[1] Appellant undertook by parol evidence of the "surrounding circumstances" to show that there was such a warranty given even if it were not expressly embodied in the written contract. The objections to the admission of this evidence were sustained, and this is the first one of the asserted errors; the contention being that under section 1647 of the Civil Code and section 1860 of the Code of Civil Procedure such evidence was clearly admissible. In this, however, appellant errs. These sections but enact the common-law rule. It is never within their contemplation that a contract reduced to writing and executed by the parties shall have anything added to it or taken away from it by such evidence of "surrounding circumstances."

[2] This rule of evidence is invoked and employed only in cases where upon the face of the contract itself there is doubt and the evidence is used to dispel that doubt, not by showing that the parties meant something other than what they said, but by showing what they meant by what they said. Harrison v. McCormick, 89 Cal. 327, 26 Pac. 830, 23 Am. St. Rep. 469; Kreuzberger v. Wingfield, 96 Cal. 251, 31 Pac. 109; Balfour v. Fresno Canal Co., 109 Cal. 221, 41 Pac. 876; 3 Jones, Commentaries on Evidence, § 454. Appellant relies upon the case of Snyder v. Holt Manufacturing Co., 134 Cal. 324, 66 Pac. 311, as expressing a contrary doctrine. We need not be at pains to discuss this case to the end of determining whether or not appellant's position in this regard is well founded. Suffice it to say that, if such a construction is permissible, the principle is so contrary to all adjudications, our own as well as those elsewhere, that it cannot be recognized as authority.

[3] The principle is thus succinctly stated in 2 Mechem on Sales, § 1254:

> "The rule is well settled that where the parties have reduced to writing what appears to be a complete and certain agreement, importing a legal obligation, it will, in the absence of fraud, accident, or mistake, be conclusively presumed that the writing contains the whole of the agreement between the parties, and parol evidence of prior, contemporaneous, or subsequent conversations, representations or statements will not be received for the purpose of adding to or varying the written instrument. If therefore such a writing exists between the parties, and it contains no warranty at all, no warranty can be added by parol; if it contains a warranty of some kind or to some extent, parol evidence will not be admitted to extend, enlarge or modify that which the writing specifies."

Such is the precise declaration of this court in Germain Fruit Co. v. Armsby Co., 153 Cal. 585, 96 Pac. 319.

[4] Nor is this consideration influenced in the slightest by the provisions of section 1770 of the Civil Code to the effect that:

> One who manufactures an article under an order for a particular purpose warrants by the sale that it is reasonably fit for that purpose."

True, it is that the parties here understood the general purpose for which the dredge was to be used, namely, the deepening of appellant's tide lands in San Pedro harbor and the filling in of other of its lands with the dredged material. If appellant had represented to respondent that such was the dredge which they desired and respondent had made answer that they would build for and furnish to appellant such a dredge, the section of the Code would have immediate applicability. But respondent did no such thing. It did not pretend to say that the dredger would dredge the harbor bottom. All that it warranted in this particular was that the dredge would move a specified quantity of material a given distance providing it was operating in dredgable material which was very specifically defined.

[5] The second error advanced by appellant is in connection with the same matter and grows out of the following facts: As above set forth, the contract actually entered into between the parties expressly declared that the plaintiff would build the dredge "in accordance with the accompanying plans and specifications and the proposal dated 8th of January 1908, of the party of the first part marked 'D.'" At the trial defendant offered proposal "D" in evidence as being referred to and made a part of the contract between the parties. Respondent's objection to the introduction was on the ground that the contract without proposal "D" was complete in itself and that to admit proposal "D" would make the contract ambiguous and uncertain. Of course, where, as here, the contract between the parties makes reference to another detached but specifically identified instrument as forming a part of the contract, such a collateral writing, whether it tends to make the whole contract ambiguous or uncertain or not, is always admissible in evidence, and to refuse it admission will in the ordinary case be grave and injurious error. It has been said (17 Cyc. 365) upon the authority of one of our cases that the rule demanding the introduction of collateral writings which have been expressly made a part of a contract by reference is inapplicable to an instrument which, although referring to them, is complete in itself. True it is that cases may arise where the collateral instrument has no material bearing upon any terms or conditions of the main instrument so that its rejection from consideration, while error, will be error which does not result in injury. Such, indeed, when we come to consider it, will be found to be the case here; but the fact nevertheless remains that it is always proper to receive such collateral instrument in evidence. If it does affect the terms of the contract, the party insisting on its introduction has the right to establish this fact; if it does not affect the terms of the instrument, his right is none the less. The only consequence is that the result of its introduction is valueless. The one citation supporting the language of Cyc. above quoted is from the case of Tustin Fruit Ass'n v. Earl Fruit Co., 6 Cal. Unrep. Cas. 37, 53 Pac. 693. Therein a contract was offered which began with the recital:

"Being desirous of having my oranges handled in the manner set forth in the by-laws of the Tustin Fruit Association."

This contract was offered in evidence unaccompanied by the by-laws to which it referred. An objection was made upon that ground. This court made answer as follows:

"We agree that no part of a document should be wrenched from its context, and received as a disjointed member of what is properly an indivisible unit of evidence. But here the paper offered by plaintiff was no such fragment. It seemed to be complete in itself, so far as regards authority to sell the subscribers' fruit, and contained no intimation that the by-laws varied or might vary, its import, for, in terms, it purported to conform to the by-laws. * * * Code Civ. Proc. § 1854; Toohey v. Harding (C. C.) 1 Fed. 174, 177; note to Rouse v. Whited, 82 Am. Dec. 345, and cases cited."

This is, in effect, but a declaration that this court would not reverse the case for this technical error unless it was shown, as it was not, that injury resulted from it.

[6, 7] So, in the case at bar, we conclude that it was unquestionably the duty of the court to have admitted in evidence the proposal "D" so plainly by reference made a part of the contract between the parties. It remains to be considered whether appellant suffered injury by the court's refusal to do so.

It is conceded by appellant that the contract without proposal "D" is complete and controlling in all particulars save one. As to that one it is argued that there should be read into the contract the language above quoted from proposal "D" to the following effect:

"We have looked at your grounds and have designed you a dredger which we believe will fully meet your requirements and trust you may favor us with your order for same."

This may be done. But appellant's effort to erect out of this language a warranty that the dredge would do the work desired of it is futile. The language itself imports nothing more than the expression of an opinion. It falls far short of an express warranty, a warranty which, if appellant had desired, it should have caused to be inserted in the contract.

[8] To the contrary, however, the contract does contain express warranties of very much more limited character than that contended for by appellant, and Mechem's rule, as above laid down and approved by this court, comes into immediate applicability—if the contract "contains a warranty of some kind or to some extent, parol evidence will not be admitted to extend, enlarge or modify that which the writing specifies." On this proposition the case of Bancroft, etc., v. S. F. Tool Co., 120 Cal. 228, 52 Pac. 496, will be found to be an exact parallel.

[9-14] Appellant advances a number of propositions of fact. They present questions controverted in the case. The evidence upon them is conflicting. The verdict of the jury is conclusive on these propositions against appellant. Thus, it contends that the dredge was never completed. There is the positive testimony of a witness that the dredge was completed upon August 15th and that the operation of it began on August 26th. Again, it is said that plaintiff is not entitled to recover because admittedly the dredge did not make the seven days' continuous run during which it was to remove 110 cubic yards per hour of dredgable material. But the evidence of respondent shows that it was at all times willing and able to make the test, but that appellant was unable, or at least failed, to designate dredgable ground for the operation, and that the ground in which the dredger actually operated was wholly unsuitable. As an argument of the incompleteness of the dredge appellant urges that the winding gear and cutter were changed after the time fixed for the commencement of the seven days' test. But respondent's evidence upon this was that the winding gear and cutter were suitable for the work to be done of the character specified in the contract, and that the changes were made in the effort to operate it in unsuitable ground not contemplated by the contract. Again, it is said that the dredge was never brought up to contract capacity; that is to say, it never proved its ability to handle an average of 110 cubic yards of material per hour. But there is positive testimony on behalf of respondent that the dredge would handle this amount of material, working in the ground specified in the contract. Again, it is contended that the dredge was improperly constructed. But this really means that it was inefficient, not for the work which it contracted to do, but for the work which it was called upon to do, for it is indisputably shown that the dredge—hull and machinery—was built under agreed plans and specifications, and that as built it conformed strictly to those plans and specifications. Again, appellant insists that the court erred in refusing to allow evidence of what it designates the fraudulent representations of respondent, which fraudulent representations are alleged to be representations to the effect that respondent had built other dredges which had proved their capacity and that the dredge which it would build would be equal to the work required of it and that respondent knew the character of the ground in which the dredge was to work. But, as has been said, appellant was abundantly able to protect itself in all these matters which were antecedent to the contract, by the simple method of requiring a warranty in the contract itself. There is not the slightest intimation that any fraud attached to the execution of the contract, and the court was right in excluding the offered evidence. What has here been said is equally applicable to the numerous objections made to the court's other rulings in refusing admission to appellant's proffered evidence. All of this evidence that was so rejected was evidence of previous negotiations and of surrounding circumstances by means of which the effort was made to vary in essential particulars without reformation the terms of the contract in writing between the parties.

[15] Appellant further alleges that plaintiff should not be allowed a recovery because the dredge is a structure within the meaning of the mechanics' lien law, and that respondent failed to file the contract as required by that law. In section 1183 et seq., Code Civ. Proc., are found the provisions of the Code relating to mechanics' liens. Section 813 et seq. of the same Code provides for a special lien upon vessels and floating structures. It was never the intention of the Legislature to include a vessel under the provisions of the general mechanics' lien law. 26 Cyc. p. 755e; Bartlett v. Steam Dredge, 107 Mich. 74, 64 N. W. 951, 61 Am. St. Rep. 314; Stewart v. Gorgoza, Fed. Cas. No. 13,428, 3 Hughes, 459.

[16] To substantially every one of the instructions which the court gave appellant raises objection. Respondent contending, as has been pointed out above, that the dredge was completed in August, asked for a judgment for the expenses incurred and outlay made in the payment of the captain and crew, amounting to $1,051.50 for the 35 days immediately after this asserted completion of the dredge. Appellant disputed this, contending that during all the intermediate time from August until the 1st of October the dredge was not in fact completed, and insisted that the money was spent by respondent in putting the dredge into working order so that it might comply with its contract. It contended further that under no circumstances did the 35 days begin to run until the 1st of October, that it was not liable for the expenses incurred prior to that time, and that it had paid all that was due after the 1st of October. Upon this phase of the controversy it proposed an instruction which the court gave in the following language; the words in parentheses being words in the proposed instruction stricken out by the court, and the words in italics being words inserted by the court:

> "You are further instructed that it was not incumbent on the defendant to pay the expense incurred by plaintiff for (of) operating said dredge at any time, excepting the (only the period of) 35 days named in the contract, and if you find from the evidence that it was the understanding and arrangement of the parties that said period of 35 days began to run on or about the 1st day of October, 1909, then I instruct you that the plaintiff can (not) recover from the defendant for the items (of labor and board aggregating $1,051.50) of labor and material charged to the defendant, if for said period of 35 days, you find that, commencing on or about October 1, 1909, the defendant began the payment, and thereafter for 35 days, continued the payment of the salary of the captain and crew, and the other expenses incident to the operation of said dredge for the ensuing 35 days."

It is manifest that the instruction proposed was sound as addressed to the contention of respondent; that is to say, it advised the jury that appellant was responsible for the operating expense of the dredge only for the period of the 35 days named in the contract. The court so instructed the jury. Then, so proceeded the proposed instruction, if by consent of the parties this 35 days was to run from October 1st, the appellant was not responsible for the $1,051.50, expenses antecedently incurred by respondent. Such is the substance of the proposed instruction. The instruction which the court actually gave told the jury that, while defendant was responsible only for the expenses incurred in the 35 days' run, nevertheless if by agreement the 35 days' run was to commence on October 1st, and defendant had paid all of the expenses incident to that run, it was nevertheless responsible for the $1,051.50 of the expenses antecedently incurred by plaintiff. There can be no need to expatiate upon the manifest error and injury of this instruction. So plain is it that we are convinced that it was the result of an oversight of the court in its effort to remodel the proposed instruction. But the explanation of the cause does not remove the result, and the result is that upon a disputed question of fact the court positively instructed the jury to find for plaintiff.

[17] This court is not able to make a new finding. Its power is limited either to the ordering of a new trial or to a modification of the judgment, and under the conflicting evidence in the case it is not disposed peremptorily to order such modification. Therefore it is ordered that in the event that within 30 days from this date respondent files with the clerk of this court its consent to a modification of the judgment in its favor by the deduction therefrom of $1,051.50, with legal interest from the date of the judgment, the judgment shall stand modified accordingly.

But in the event that said consent be not so filed within said time, the judgment appealed from shall be reversed. Salstrom v. Orleans Bar, etc., Co., 153 Cal. 551, 96 Pac. 292.

GOLDEN GATE UNDERTAKING CO. v. TAYLOR. (S. F. 6272.)

1. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 97*)—LIABILITY OF ESTATES OF DECEASED PERSONS.

Estates of deceased persons are not directly liable to those employed by the executor or administrator to assist him in his duties of administration; this having been the rule with attorneys of executors and administrators prior to the statutory changes of 1905 in Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1616, 1619.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 411, 411½; Dec. Dig. § 97.*]

2. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 214*)—FUNERAL EXPENSES—LIABILITY.

In view of Code Civ. Proc. § 1643, providing that funeral expenses shall be first paid, and the fact that such expenses must ordinarily be incurred before the appointment of an executor or administrator, such claims do not stand on the same footing as other claims for expenses of administration, but are enforceable against the estate, though not authorized by the executor or administrator; an undertaker being justified in furnishing the necessary services upon the request of any one so related to the deceased as to exclude the idea of officious interference.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 755; Dec. Dig. § 214.*]

3. Executors and Administrators (§ 430*)—Suits Against.

Whenever a recovery would be a direct charge upon the estate of a deceased, the executor or administrator may be sued in his representative capacity.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 1683–1688; Dec. Dig. § 430.*]

4. Executors and Administrators (§ 431*)—Suits Against Executor.

In view of Code Civ. Proc. § 1643, providing that funeral expenses shall be first paid, and the fact that the charge is one for which the estate is liable, though the arrangement for funeral expenses is not made by the executor or administrator, an action for funeral expenses may be brought against the administrator in his representative capacity and need not be presented as a claim for expenses of administration.

5. Executors and Administrators (§§ 214, 443*)—Burial Expenses—Actions for.

As an estate can be charged with the expenses of the burial of the deceased only on the ground that the funeral is the work of necessity, as well as charity and piety, the amount charged cannot exceed such sum as is reasonable under the circumstances; hence a complaint seeking recovery of funeral expenses is defective, unless it allege that the amount sought to be recovered is a reasonable amount in view of all the circumstances.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 755, 1798–1811, 1823–1830, 1842–1845, 1848; Cent. Dig. §§ 214, 443.*]

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Jas. M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by the Golden Gate Undertaking Company against Bee Taylor, as executrix of James D. Taylor, deceased. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Bee Taylor, of San Francisco, in pro. per. Ralph L. Hathorn and Brooks Palmer, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an action brought to recover the value of materials furnished and services rendered in the matter of the burial of James D. Taylor.

It was alleged that at the time of the death of James Taylor, and for about 14 days thereafter, there were no relatives or heirs at law surviving deceased in the state of California; that shortly before his death James D. Taylor requested Almer F. Veale, his attending physician, to take charge of his body and upon his death to make all funeral arrangements; that said deceased left a will wherein he appointed Almer F. Veale and Bee Taylor as executor and executrix, respectively; that after the death of said James D. Taylor, the plaintiff, at the special instance and request of said Almer F. Veale, and at the special instance and request of said Bee Taylor, rendered services and supplied merchandise for and on account of the preparation, care, disposition, funeral, and burial of the body of said deceased; and that the reasonable value of said services and merchandise was and is the sum of $1,110.

The complaint further states that subsequently, in May, 1903, the said will was admitted to probate, and letters testamentary thereon were issued in accordance with the directions of said will, and that said Bee Taylor ever since has been, and now is, such executrix; that Almer F. Veale was discharged as such executor on or about June 8, 1903, prior to the commencement of this action. To this complaint defendant interposed a special and general demurrer, which was overruled; whereupon the defendant filed an answer denying all the allegations of the complaint, and also filed a cross-complaint, in which she sought damages from the plaintiff in the sum of $5,000. A demurrer to the cross-complaint was sustained.

Nothing further appears to have been done in the case until January 29, 1909, when, after due notice, the cause was set for trial. By various postponements the trial was continued until May 19, 1909, when, in the absence of the defendant, the court heard the evidence and rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff in the sum of $850, together with interest and costs, and directed that the same be paid in due course of administration of said estate. Within six months thereafter the defendant applied to the court to set aside the judgment on the ground of surprise, inadvertence, and excusable neglect. The motion was denied. The defendant appeals from that order and from the judgment.

The only point that need be considered here is the claim that the general demurrer to the complaint should have been sustained.

The principal contention of the defendant is that a claim for funeral expenses is not recoverable by action against the executrix in her representative capacity, but will sustain only an action against the individual who ordered the services. If payment out of the assets of the estate is sought, the sole jurisdiction of the demand rests, it is argued, in the court in which the proceedings for administration of the estate are pending.

[1, 2] It is, of course, the well-settled rule that estates of deceased persons are not directly liable to those who have been employed by the executor or administrator to assist him in the performance of his duties of administration. The claim is "against the executor or administrator in his individual capacity, who in turn may, if the expenditure was made in good faith and was proper, be credited therewith in the settlement of his accounts with the estate." Hickman-Coleman Co. v. Leggett, 10 Cal. App. 29, 100 Pac. 1072; 2 Woerner Am. Law Adm. § 356. The rule has been applied in this state to claims of real estate brokers for services rendered the personal representative (Maxon v. Jones, 128 Cal. 77, 60 Pac. 516; Estate of Willard, 139 Cal. 501, 73 Pac. 240, 64 L. R. A. 554; Hickman-Coleman Co. v. Leggett, supra), as well as to claims of attorneys for services rendered the executor or administrator (Gurnee v. Maloney, 38 Cal. 85, 99 Am. Dec. 352; Briggs v. Breen, 123 Cal. 657, 56 Pac. 633, 886; Estate of Kasson, 119 Cal. 489, 51 Pac. 706). The same principle is applicable to demands of attorneys for services rendered guardians of minors or incompetents. Hunt v. Maldonado, 89 Cal. 636, 27 Pac. 56; Morse v. Hinckley, 124 Cal. 154, 56 Pac. 896; McKee v. Hunt, 142 Cal. 526, 77 Pac. 1103. Prior to the statutory changes of 1905 (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1616, 1619) giving to attorneys for executors or administrators the right to have their compensation fixed and paid out of the assets of the estate, such attorneys, in common with all others rendering service to the personal representative, could not assert a demand against the estate in the probate proceedings (Briggs v. Breen, supra), or otherwise, and were limited to their personal action against the executor or administrator who had employed them.

The appellant argues that claims for funeral expenses stand upon the same ground as claims for attorney's fees, brokers' commissions, or other demands arising under contracts made by the executor or administrator, and that, accordingly, a demand for such funeral expenses cannot form the basis of any action except one against the executor or administrator personally. We think this position cannot be upheld. Claims for funeral expenses are not necessarily founded upon contracts made by the personal representative. It is seemly and proper, indeed necessary, that decent burial should be given to the body of a deceased person within a very short period after death. Ordinarily, arrangements for such burial must be made, and the expense incurred, before the appointment of an executor or administrator. An undertaker is justified in furnishing the necessary service upon the request of any one so related to the decedent as to exclude the idea of officious interference. The one ordering the burial may or may not be the same person who subsequently becomes executor or administrator. If, as in this case, the person alleged to have ordered the funeral does become executor or administrator, the liability, if any, of the estate is not affected one way or the other by such circumstance. The person contracting for the service may be individually liable therefor, but this liability depends upon his individual agreement, and not upon his subsequent representative character.

The claim for funeral services is not, to be sure, a claim on a contract or debt of the decedent, existing before his death. Neither, as we have pointed out, is it a claim on a contract made after death by the personal representative as such. It is a demand of a peculiar nature, arising immediately upon death, but prior to the commencement of administration. It is properly chargeable, in some form of procedure, against the assets of the estate.

The Code of Civil Procedure ranks such charges among debts of the estate. Section 1643 provides that:

> "The debts of the estate * * * must be paid in the following order:
> "1. Funeral expenses;
> "2. The expenses of the last sickness;
> "3. Debts having preference by the laws of the United States;
> "4. Judgments, * * * and mortgages and other liens * * *;
> "5. All other demands against the estate. * * *"

Section 1646 declares that:

> The "executor or administrator, as soon as he has sufficient funds in his hands, must pay the funeral expenses and expenses of the last sickness, and the allowance made to the family of the decedent. * * *"

[3, 4] Not only, then, is the charge for funeral expenses a debt of the estate, but it is a preferred debt of the first class, and is payable as soon as the executor or administrator has sufficient funds in his hands. It is not a debt arising upon a contract made by the decedent in his lifetime, and a creditor's claim, as defined in section 1493, Code of Civil Procedure, is not, therefore, required to be presented as a basis for action. Potter v. Lewin, 123 Cal. 146, 55 Pac. 783. It is, however, a claim upon a debt of the estate, and thus differs essentially from claims based upon services rendered the executor or administrator, which, as we have seen, do not constitute debts of the estate. If the claim is one against the estate, and for which the estate as such is liable, it is difficult to see why an action cannot be brought against the executor in his representative capacity, to obtain a judgment payable in due course of administration. The general rule is that, whenever a recovery would be a direct charge upon the estate of a deceased, the executor or administrator may be sued in his representative capacity. 8 Ency. Pl. & Pr. 678.

> "The only way in which an action can be brought against an estate is to sue the administrator or executor in his representative capacity." Sterrett v. Barker, 119 Cal. 492, 51 Pac. 695.

If the executor voluntarily pays the demand, he may undoubtedly claim credit for the payment of such amount as the court thinks proper, in the settlement of his accounts. See In re Galland, 92 Cal. 293, 28 Pac. 287. But, if the executor should refuse to pay, the claimant must have some remedy for the enforcement of a demand which is, by the express provision of the statute, made a preferred debt of the estate. To await the settlement of accounts would be destructive of the preference granted by the Code. There is no provision expressly authorizing the claimant to go into the probate court by petition for an order compelling the payment of his claim, if it be disputed. The funeral charges are not, strictly speaking, expenses of administration, but are, as we have shown, classed with debts of the estate. By sections 1643 and 1646, the demand is put in the same category as a claim for expenses of the last sickness. Such a claim may, beyond question, be established by an action against the executor or administrator. The judgment is that the amount found due be paid in due course of administration. The question of priority is thus left to be determined in the probate court. McLean v. Crow, 88 Cal. 644, 26 Pac. 596. So, too, with the claim for funeral expenses, which is equally a debt of the estate, and which differs only in so far as the necessity for presenting a claim is concerned. While we do not hold that the validity and amount of the demand may not properly be determined by the probate court upon petition of the claimant, we find no sufficient ground for holding that the demand may not be established in the manner applicable to all other debts of the estate; that is, by an action against the personal representative.

This conclusion is, we believe, in accord with the practice commonly accepted by the profession. Potter v. Lewin, 123 Cal. 146, 55 Pac. 783, may be cited as an example of the cases in which the procedure of action against the executor or administrator was taken. In that case the procedure was upheld without question of its propriety. And this view seems to be in accord with the weight of authority in other jurisdictions. 8 Am. & Eng. Enc. L., (2d Ed.) pp. 1024–5–6; Schoul. Ex'rs (3d Ed.) § 398; 2 Woern. Adm. (2d Ed.) § 357, and cases cited. Of course, the services may be furnished upon the personal credit of the executor or of some one else, in which event the person contracting will be individually liable. This is, however, not such a case.

[5] But the only ground upon which the estate may be charged with the expenses of burial is, as has already been suggested, that the "funeral is a work of necessity, as well as of charity and piety." Woern. Adm. (2d Ed.) § 357. The amount to be charged to the estate cannot exceed such sum as may, upon a consideration of all the circumstances, including the station of the decedent and the value of his estate, be found to be proper and reasonable. Woern. Adm. (2d Ed.) §§ 359, 360. These considerations would govern the probate court in passing upon a charge made by the executor or administrator for funeral expenses incurred by him. The court would not be controlled by the amount actually expended, even though such amount would afford only a proper compensation to the undertaker for the services rendered, but would inquire into the circumstances and conditions in order to ascertain whether such amount was reasonable and proper to be charged against the particular estate. The same considerations must apply where the person furnishing the services is suing the executor in an action like the present one. It follows that, in order to state a cause of action in such a case, the complaint must contain proper allegations designed to show that the amount sought to be recovered is a reasonable and proper charge against the estate in view of all the circumstances, so far as they could with reasonable diligence be ascertained at the time of the burial. Woern. Adm. (2d Ed.) § 359. The complaint before us contains no such allegations. All that is alleged is that the plaintiff rendered services and supplied materials for the funeral and burial of the body, and "that the reasonable value of such services and merchandise was and is the sum of $1,110." This means no more than it says; namely, that the services and merchandise furnished were worth the amount named. It may well be that they were fairly worth $1,110, but that at the same time a charge of $1,110 would be greatly excessive for the estate upon which the burden of this payment is sought to be imposed. The plaintiff is not seeking to recover upon a contract made by the decedent, but is endeavoring to charge against the estate the amount of an expenditure incurred on behalf of the estate. The complaint shows that some expenditure was necessary and proper. It does not show what amount was necessary or proper and for that reason justly chargeable against the estate.

For these reasons, we think the demurrer should have been sustained, with leave to plaintiff to amend its complaint. This conclusion makes it unnecessary to consider any other points made.

The judgment and the order appealed from are reversed.

BEATTY, C. J., does not participate in the foregoing.

ANGELLOTTI, J. (concurring). I concur in the judgment, but not for the reasons stated in the foregoing opinion. I adhere to the views expressed in my dissenting opinion filed on the former decision of this case when the judgment and order appealed from were affirmed. That opinion was as follows:

> "I am unable to concur in the conclusion that a claim for funeral expenses of a deceased person is recoverable by action against his executor or administrator in his representative capacity. In so far as payment of such a claim is sought from the estate, including the determination of the amount to be paid by the estate, it is my opinion that the probate court having jurisdiction of the estate has sole and exclusive jurisdiction, and that the matter is to be determined in the estate proceedings, where all persons interested in the estate may be heard and the amount that the estate shall pay fixed with a view to the circumstances and condition of the estate. This question does not appear to have been suggested in Potter v. Lewin, 123 Cal. 146 [55 Pac. 783]. I see no difficulty in holding that under our law one having a claim for funeral expenses may present his claim to the court in probate for determination. Although not a creditor of decedent who is obliged to present his claim for allowance to the executor or administrator and the judge, he is, by virtue of our statutory provisions in that behalf, a creditor of the estate, entitled to appear in the probate proceeding and there obtain an adjudication as to his claim and an order for the payment of so much thereof as may be found to be a proper charge against the estate. I think that under our statutory provisions this is his sole remedy where he seeks to be paid from the funds of the estate and there is any controversy as to his claim."

I therefore agree with the other members of the court in the conclusion that the demurrer to the complaint should have been sustained.

PHELPS v. GRADY (DAUGHADAY et al., Interveners.) (S. F. 6677.)

1. Descent and Distribution (§§ 75, 84*)—Wills (§§ 722, 742*)—Descent of Real Property—Rights of Heirs and Devisees.

Title to real property of a deceased intestate vests immediately in his heirs, and of a testator in his devisees, which title they may convey, whether residents or nonresidents, without administration, subject only to the payment of claims of local creditors.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Descent and Distribution, Cent. Dig. §§ 243–251, 260–262, 309, 322–325; Dec. Dig. §§ 75, 84;* Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 1728, 1729, 1900–1906; Dec. Dig. §§ 722, 742.*]

2. Executors and Administrators (§ 333*)—Assets—Interest in Estate in Another State.

An order of a probate court in Kansas, administering the estate of a devisee, authorizing the administrator and beneficiaries to transfer certain assets, consisting of an interest in an unadministered estate under administration in California, was valid, and was not objectionable as an attempt by the Kansas court to administer on lands in California which belonged to the California estate.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 1372–1375; Dec. Dig. § 333.*]

3. Descent and Distribution (§ 86*)—Interest in Estate—Assignment—Defect—Estoppel.

Where the heirs of a devisee assigned their interest in the testator's estate to testator's widow, such heirs were estopped thereafter to claim that the title which the widow secured by the assignment was imperfect for lack of local administration.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Descent and Distribution, Cent. Dig. §§ 326–329; Dec. Dig. § 86.*]

4. Fraud (§ 11*)—Deceit—Expressions of Opinion.

While mere expressions of opinion honestly made are not actionable, yet a false statement of an opinion or a false opinion expressed to one entitled to rely thereon may form the basis for an action of deceit.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fraud, Cent. Dig. §§ 12, 13; Dec. Dig. § 11.*]

5. Cancellation of Instruments (§ 34*)—Fraud—Laches.

Where an assignment of the interest of the heirs of a devisee, alleged to have been induced by the assignee's fraudulent misrepresentation as to the value of real property belonging to the estate, was executed in 1904, and the value of the property could have been promptly ascertained by reasonable diligence, and without great difficulty, the failure of the assignor to ascertain the facts and sue to set aside the conveyance for such fraud until 1912 constituted fatal laches.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Cancellation of Instruments, Cent. Dig. §§ 49–54; Dec. Dig. § 34.*]

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; George H. Buck, Judge.

Action by Josephine A. Phelps against John H. Grady, as special administrator of the estate of Phœbe W. Daughaday, deceased, in which Frederick Daughaday and others intervened. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant and interveners appeal. Affirmed.

See, also, 141 Pac. 929.

Thomas E. Curran and Francis Dunn, both of San Francisco, for appellants. Ross & Ross, of Redwood City, and Walter H. Linforth and W. C. Sharpstein, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. John H. Grady was appointed special administrator of the estate of Phœbe W. Daughaday, deceased. Josephine A. Phelps, plaintiff herein, brought this action against him to quiet her title to certain real estate in the county of San Mateo. The heirs of Phœbe W. Daughaday, who were also beneficiaries under her will, sought to intervene, asserting an interest in the land in their ancestor, Phœbe W. Daughaday, which interest was devised to them by her will, and with which interest they allege they were fraudulently induced to part, selling and conveying it to plaintiff in reliance upon certain fraudulent representations made by her. The facts in detail are set forth in San Francisco No. 6668, 141 Pac. 929, this day decided. A decree of partial distribution given in the matter of the estate of Timothy Guy Phelps, under which decree the land in controversy was distributed to plaintiff, was introduced in evidence, as well as the final decree of distribution. Many grounds of attack are advanced against the validity of the decree of partial distribution. They need not be noticed, for, if the result of them is all that appellant contends for, so that the decree should be considered as absolutely void and thus conveying no title, the fact then would be that all of the property remained in the estate until the decree of final distribution, which is not assailed, and which distributed all of the property to Mrs. Phelps.

[1-3] Again, it is argued that by force of the will of Timothy Guy Phelps, deceased, title to real estate vested in Phœbe W. Daughaday, and that the probate court of Kansas had no power to administer on and dispose of real estate situate in California. Wherefore, so runs appellant's argument, the conveyance by the heirs and beneficiaries under the will of Phœbe W. Daughaday to Mrs. Phelps of their interest through the estate of Phœbe W. Daughaday in the estate of Timothy Guy Phelps was abortive and void. But such, however, is not the law. Title to the real estate of a deceased intestate vests immediately in his heirs of a testate in his devisees. That title they may convey without administration, and this they may do whether they be domestic or foreign heirs or devisees. The heirs of a nonresident intestate leaving real estate in California may convey complete title so far as they are concerned to such real estate without ancillary administration in the state of California. True, the title thus conveyed is not a perfect title, in that the title will always be subject to the right of possession in a local administrator for the payment of the claims of local creditors. But with this defect, the heirs who have deliberately parted with their title are not concerned, and can find no fault. The probate court of Kansas in no sense undertook to administer upon lands in California. It had all of the heirs and beneficiaries under the will of Phœbe W. Daughaday before it, and it authorized them, on their request, to make conveyance to Mrs. Phelps of all of their interest in the estate of her husband. If the title thus derived by Mrs. Phelps was in any way incomplete or imperfect for lack of local administration, she, and not her grantors, was the one that suffered thereby. No case cited by appellant denies the power of the heirs or devisees so to convey their title. Indeed, such a denial would be in the face of our express statutory law. All that such cases as In re Pina, 112 Cal. 14, 44 Pac. 332, Turner v. McDonald, 76 Cal. 177, 18 Pac. 262, 9 Am. St. Rep. 189, Estate of Strong, 119 Cal. 663, 51 Pac. 1078, and Blair v. Hazzard, 158 Cal. 721, 112 Pac. 298, declare upon this matter is that the title thus conveyed is still subject to administration, and is therefore and in this sense only not perfect.

[4, 5] A general demurrer to the answer of appellant, setting up the above-mentioned fraud, and a general demurrer to the interveners' complaint, asserting the same fraud were sustained. This ruling presents the one serious question in this case. We waive consideration of certain minor objections of respondent, as that the special administrator, authorized to maintain or defend only such suits as might have been maintained by or against his testatrix, cannot present such a defense in this action, since his testatrix was not defrauded. We pass over also the consideration as to whether or not the heirs and beneficiaries under the will of Phœbe W. Daughaday could rightfully intervene at all in this action, and, conceding this right, come immediately to the question of the sufficiency of their complaint in intervention. In this they allege that in January, 1904, Josephine A. Phelps, plaintiff herein, opened negotiations with them by correspondence for the purchase of their interest in her husband's estate. She represented to them that the value of the estate was about $90,000, and that the value of the entire portion of the estate devised and bequeathed to Phœbe W. Daughaday was only about $3,333.33. They aver that these representations were false and untrue, and were known to Mrs. Phelps to be false and untrue, and were made by her for the purpose of deceiving them. Certain other false representations are declared. It is said that Mrs. Phelps represented that on account of the condition of the estate distribution could not be had for many years, and that the family allowance of $400 a month decreed by the court would, during the progress of the administration, consume a large portion of the estate. The interveners further allege that Mrs. Phelps was the widow of their mother's brother, and that because of this relationship they believed that she would deal with them in all respects fairly and justly, and that so believing they relied upon these representations and parted with their interest to her. Respondent argues that the only one of these allegations with any semblance of strength to support an action for deceit is that which charges the misrepresentation as to the value of the estate, and of Phœbe W. Daughaday's interest therein. And this, it is urged, considering the nature of the estate and its problematical value, must be construed as the expression merely of Mrs. Phelps' opinion, and not as the statement of a fact. True of course it is that expressions of opinion honestly made are not actionable. Equity has no concern with them. But equally true it is that a false statement of an opinion or a false opinion expressed to one entitled to rely upon it may form the basis of an action for deceit, like any other misrepresentation of fact. Barron Estate Co. v. Woodruff Co., 163 Cal. 561, 126 Pac. 351; Henry v. Continental Bldg., etc., Ass'n, 156 Cal. 680, 105 Pac. 960; Brandt v. Krogh, 14 Cal. App. 39, 111 Pac. 275. The complaint in intervention charges deceit upon this kind of a false opinion and in this respect it sufficiently states a cause of action. But in this case the conveyance was executed in 1904. The decree of final distribution in the estate of Timothy Guy Phelps was given in 1907. This action was commenced in 1912, and here for the first time interveners are found asserting the right to avoid their conveyance because of its fraudulent procurement. Excepting upon a proper showing touching their discovery of the fraud their cause of action was barred. One seeking relief under such circumstances is held to stringent rules of pleading. Says the Supreme Court of the United States, in Wood v. Carpenter, 101 U. S. 135, 25 L. Ed. 807:

> "In this class of cases the plaintiff is held to stringent rules of pleading and evidence, 'and especially must there be distinct averments as to the time when the fraud, mistake, concealment, or misrepresentation was discovered, and what the discovery is, so that the court may clearly see whether, by ordinary diligence, the discovery might not have been before made.' * * * A general allegation of ignorance at one time and of knowledge at another are of no effect. If the plaintiff made any particular discovery, it should be stated when it was made, what it was, how it was made, and why it was not made sooner. * * * A party seeking to avoid the bar of a statute on account of fraud must aver and show that he used due diligence to detect it. * * * Concealment * * * which will avoid the statute must go beyond mere silence. It must be something done to prevent discovery. * * * Concealment * * * must be the result of positive acts. * * * Concealment by mere silence is not enough. There must be some trick or contrivance intended to exclude suspicion and prevent inquiry. * * * The circumstances of the discovery must be fully stated and proved, and the delay which has occurred must be shown to be consistent with the requisite diligence."

And this is the rule consistently adopted and adhered to in this state. Robertson v. Burrell, 110 Cal. 578, 42 Pac. 1086; Lady Washington v. Wood, 113 Cal. 486, 45 Pac. 809; Simpson v. Dalziel, 135 Cal. 603, 67 Pac. 1080; People v. San Joaquin, etc., Ass'n, 151 Cal. 797, 91 Pac. 740. The allegations of the complaint touching discovery are as follows:

> "That interveners herein did not discover that the representations made to them by said Josephine A. Phelps, as alleged in paragraphs VII and VIII of this complaint in intervention, were untrue, nor did they nor any of them have any truthful information concerning the matters and subjects covered by said representations until about the month of October, 1911. That on or about the 1st day of October, 1911, said interveners were informed for the first time that some time in the year 1907 said Josephine A. Phelps had entered into a contract to sell a certain portion of the real estate of Timothy Guy Phelps, and a part of the real property described in the complaint herein at a price which seemed to indicate that the value of the entire estate of Timothy Guy Phelps, deceased, was in and during the year 1904 very much greater than had been represented to interveners as above related by said Josephine A. Phelps. That thereupon said interveners made inquiry and investigation, and were informed that in and during the year 1904 the estate of Timothy Guy Phelps, deceased, was of a value many times greater than $90,000."

Frauds are infinite in their variety, and while the rules of equity apply equally to all, when the doctrine of laches or stale demand is invoked, and the question involved is why was not the discovery earlier made, each case must be interpreted and construed under its own facts. To illustrate, if A should employ B as a mining expert to express his opinion upon the probable value of a mine which he contemplated purchasing, and B should report as his opinion that the mine was of great value, and if, relying upon this opinion, A should purchase the mine, expend large sums of money thereon, and meet with failure as the result, he would have no cause of action against B for the latter's mistaken opinion. Years might elapse, and A might never suspect, nor have occasion to suspect, that the opinion so given to him by B was fraudulent. If years thereafter he should come into possession of knowledge that B had conspired with the former owner of the mine to fraudulently represent its value, B's own opinion being that the property was valueless, here would be a clear case, under a proper pleading of these facts, of an active suppression of the fraud by the guilty parties, and a discovery of the facts made possible only under the indicated circumstances. In such a case A's right of action would unquestionably exist no matter how many years had elapsed before discovery was made possible. But no such case is here presented. The false representation, it is asserted, was as to the value of the lands of the estate, which lands were situated in a populous county adjacent to the city and county of San Francisco. The fact that the estate owned these lands is not only not questioned but is declared. While it is conceivable that a person under such circumstances might misrepresent to another at a distance the value of those lands, it is impossible that that person could have concealed knowledge of the true value had the slightest inquiry been made. It cannot be said, therefore, and of course it is not alleged, that Mrs. Phelps ever did or attempted to do anything to conceal from these interveners knowledge of the true value of the land. If, under such circumstances, with every means of information open and patent before them, they may refuse to make inquiries for seven years, they may do so for seventy. There is an absolute failure to show not only due diligence but any diligence in seeking to discover during all this intervening time whether or not they had parted with their property at a fair valuation. The fact that they lived at a distance is, of course, no excuse. They were under no other disability. Says the Supreme Court of the United States:

> "Parties cannot thus, by seclusion from the means of information, claim exemption from the laws that control human affairs and set up a right to open up all the transactions of the past. The world must move on, and those who claim an interest in persons or things must be charged with knowledge of their status and condition, and of the vicissitudes to which they are subject." Case of Broderick's Will, 88 U. S. (21 Wall.) 503, 22 L. Ed. 599.

Herein the words of the circuit court in Naddo v. Bardon (C. C.) 47 Fed. 782, are peculiarly apposite:

> "The conclusion is almost irresistible that the complainant might, and he perhaps would, have continued to sleep quietly and peacefully upon his supposed rights, had it not been for the quickening influences that have, within a comparatively recent period, materially appreciated the value of this property and brought it into prominence."

Independently of any statute of limitation courts of equity uniformly decline to assist a person who has slept upon his rights and shows no excuse for laches in asserting them. Speidel v. Henrici, 120 U. S. 386, 7 Sup. Ct. 610, 30 L. Ed. 718. The interveners are clearly in this position, and for this reason the superior court was justified in finding that their complaint in intervention was without equity, and in sustaining the general demurrer thereto.

The judgment appealed from is therefore affirmed.

We concur: LORIGAN, J.; MELVIN, J.

In re DAUGHADAY'S ESTATE. (S. F. 6668.)

1. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 11*)—ADMINISTRATION—GRANT—NATURE OF PROPERTY.

Where a nonresident died, leaving an equitable claim to real property in the county where an application for issuance of letters of administration is made, the probate court may treat such claim as property justifying the issuance of letters in advance of the establishment of the claim.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 25; Dec. Dig. § 11.*]

2. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 29*)—ISSUANCE OF LETTERS—EFFECT—PROPERTY OF ESTATE.

Where the sole property of a nonresident decedent within the jurisdiction of a probate court, to which an application for grant of letters was made, consisted of an equitable claim to real property within the court's jurisdiction, the grant of such letters would not be considered an adjudication either on the value or validity of the claim, but only that the estate had made a prima facie showing of an equitable claim which justified the issuance of letters.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 177–182, 1411; Dec. Dig. § 29.*]

3. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 20*)—APPLICATION FOR LETTERS — NATURE OF PROPERTY.

Where an application for letters of administration on the estate of a foreign decedent showed that the only property of the decedent within the jurisdiction was an equitable claim to an interest in certain real property therein, the court, on trial of such application, though not required to try the validity and enforceability of the asserted equity, may nevertheless consider its nature, at least to the extent of determining whether it may be made the subject of a decree substantiating and giving it legal validity, and will deny letters if the claim presented has no such reasonable and colorable value.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 83–105; Dec. Dig. § 20.*]

4. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 20*)—GRANT OF LETTERS—PROBATE COURT—DISCRETION.

A probate court has an actual discretion in acting on an application for letters testamentary or of administration, and, while letters will always be granted where administration is necessary, advisable, or desirable, it will not grant them in its discretion if the purpose to be accomplished can as well or better be attained in another forum.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 83–105; Dec. Dig. § 20.*]

5. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 518*)—ANCILLARY ADMINISTRATION—ENFORCEMENT OF RIGHTS.

Testator died in California, leaving a share in his estate, which consisted partly of real property located in California, to his sister, who died testate in Kansas during the administration of testator's estate. After the appointment of an executor in Kansas for the sister's estate, he and the benficiaries under the sister's will, with the consent of the Kansas court, on representations of testator's widow as to the value of his estate, transferred all of their interest under testator's will to the widow for $3,333.33. The sister's estate was thereupon closed, the money so received distributed, and partial and final distribution made of testator's estate in California, where final decrees were entered without opposition. Thereafter certain of the sister's beneficiaries, claiming that they had been defrauded in making such assignment, applied in California for administration on the sister's estate that the administrator when appointed might proceed to set aside the assignment and recover the lawful share of testator's estate that would have been distributed to the sister's executor but for the assignment. Held that, if any one was defrauded in such transaction, it was the sister's beneficiaries, whose rights could be established and enforced with greater expedition in a direct suit in equity, and that their equitable claim was insufficient to justify ancillary administration.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 2299–2309; Dec. Dig. § 518.*]

6. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 12*)—APPOINTMENT—JURISDICTION—SITUS OF ASSETS.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1322, providing for probate of foreign wills and the grant of letters of administration in any county in which the testator shall have left any estate or means, is limited to a county in which there shall be an estate of the testator at the time administration is sought, and was not fulfilled by a situation where the applicant for letters asserted a mere claim to an interest in the proceeds of another estate which he alleged had been assigned through fraud.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 24; Dec. Dig. § 12.*]

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Thos. F. Graham, Judge.

Application by John H. Grady for letters of administration on the estate of Phoebe W. Daughaday, deceased, to which Josephine A. Phelps filed objections. From an order denying the petition, petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 141 Pac. 926.

Thomas E. Curran and Francis Dunn, both of San Francisco, for appellant. Ross & Ross, of Redwood City, and Walter H. Linforth and W. C. Sharpstein, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Timothy Guy Phelps died testate. At the time of his death he was a resident of the county of San Mateo, and his estate was probated therein. By his will he left a legacy of $50,000 to his widow, Josephine A. Phelps, and, in addition thereto, one half of the remainder of his estate. The other half he apportioned amongst certain named relatives, leaving to them interests he designated as "shares." One of these relatives was a sister, Phœbe W. Daughaday, who was a resident of Kansas City, state of Kansas. She there resided until she in turn died testate in 1901. By her will she bequeathed her estate to her son Frederick, and to the heirs of her deceased son Mortimer. Her whole estate consisted of her "share" or interest in the estate of her brother, Timothy Guy Phelps. Her will was duly admitted to probate in the probate court of Wyandotte county, Kan. Her son Frederick was appointed administrator of her estate. Notice to creditors to present their claims was published; but no claim was ever presented for allowance. Thereafter the administrator petitioned the probate court of Wyandotte county for leave "to sell and assign to Josephine A. Phelps all the right, title, and interest of Phœbe W. Daughaday, deceased, in and to the estate of Timothy Guy Phelps." In his petition the administrator alleged:

> "That the estate of Phœbe W. Daughaday consisted of an undivided interest in the estate of Timothy Guy Phelps, deceased, of San Mateo county, Cal.; that said estate consists largely of real estate and mining properties which it is impossible at this time to sell to advantage, and that the income from said estate is not sufficient to pay the expenses thereof; that the heirs of Phœbe W. Daughaday have received through your petitioner an offer of $3,333.33 for their interest in the estate of Timothy Guy Phelps; and that said heirs desire to accept the same, and are willing to join in an assignment with your petitioner of their interest in said estate."

A hearing was had upon this petition, and the court in probate authorized the sale to Josephine A. Phelps of all of the interest of the estate of Phœbe W. Daughaday, her heirs and beneficiaries, in the estate of Timothy Guy Phelps, and ordered Frederick Daughaday, administrator, to join with the other heirs of Phœbe W. Daughaday in executing a deed and assignment of this interest. Pursuant to this order this instrument was executed by all the parties in interest under the will of Phœbe Daughaday. Thereafter the administrator filed his final account, showing his receipt of $3,333.33 from Josephine A. Phelps, and showing, further, that after paying all debts and expenses of administration he had, pursuant to the order of the court, ratably distributed the remainder amongst the heirs and beneficiaries of Phœbe Daughaday's will. This final account was heard and settled, and the probate court of Wyandotte county declared the administration to be at an end, and discharged Frederick Daughaday from his trust as administrator. The estate of Phœbe W. Daughaday was thus finally closed on December 19, 1904. About eight months thereafter the superior court of San Mateo county, sitting in probate, in the matter of Timothy Guy Phelps, made its decree by which a portion of that estate was distributed to the widow, Josephine A. Phelps, the respondent herein. In 1907 the same court, sitting in the matter of the same estate, made its decree settling the final account of the executrix, and distributing the residue of the estate to respondent. This final decree declared:

> "That prior to the 9th day of May, 1905, Josephine A. Phelps, the surviving widow of Timothy Guy Phelps, deceased, purchased of and from all of the heirs of said deceased, and of and from each and all of the devisees and legatees named and mentioned or referred to in and by the last will and testament of said deceased, and of and from all persons and each and every person interested in the estate of said deceased, all of the right, title, interest, estate, and claim of each and every one of said heirs, devisees, and legatees and persons in and to the estate of said deceased, and in and to all of the property real and personal belonging to said deceased at the time of his death, or comprising any portion of his estate; and each and all and every one of said heirs, devisees, legatees, and persons prior to said 9th day of May, 1905, granted, sold, assigned, transferred, and conveyed to and vested in her said Josephine A. Phelps by good and proper and sufficient instruments in writing properly executed to her by them and each of them all of their and each of their rights, interests, titles, estates, and claims in all of the real and personal property of the estate of said deceased, or owned by or belonging to said estate, or in which the estate of said deceased has any right, title, interest, or claim, without exception or reservation, and that said Josephine A. Phelps, as surviving widow of said deceased and devisee and legatee under the last will and testament of said deceased, and as grantee and assignee of all of the heirs of said deceased, and of all of the devisees and legatees under the will of said deceased, and of all persons interested in the estate of said deceased, is now entitled to have distributed to her all of the estate of said deceased, and all the property, real and personal, owned by or belonging to said estate, or in which the estate of said deceased now has any right, title, interest, or claim, without reservation, and as fully as if an exact and particular description of all of the property, real and personal, of said estate and each and every interest therein was here fully and particularly described, mentioned, and set forth."

This final decree was never appealed from, and has long since become final. On the 9th day of January, 1912, John H. Grady, appellant herein, filed his petition in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, setting up the death of Phœbe W. Daughaday, the probate of her will in Wyandotte county, Kan., and alleging that she "left estate in the city and county of San Francisco" consisting of "a certain interest in real estate vested in said deceased under the last will and testament of Timothy Guy Phelps, deceased." The petition further alleged:

> "That your petitioner is a person interested in the estate and in the will of said deceased, being the assignee and transferee of a certain interest from Frederick Daughaday, one of the devisees under the last will and testament of said deceased, and is entitled to have distributed to him said certain interest as assignee and transferee of said Frederick Daughaday."

Respondent met this petition by a contest, setting out the matters of fact above recited, and alleging that Phœbe W. Daughaday had not left any estate in the city and county of San Francisco subject to administration. Code Civ. Proc. § 1322. The petitioner, after his demurrer to this contest had been overruled, filed an answer which admitted all of the facts above set forth, but pleaded that the deed and assignment made by the administrator and other heirs and beneficiaries under the will of Phœbe W. Daughaday had been procured of them by respondent by means of fraudulent representations concerning the value of the interest of Phœbe W. Daughaday's estate in the estate of Timothy Guy Phelps, deceased, and by false representations concerning the condition of the estate and its administration, "and by threats wrongfully made by said Josephine A. Phelps that steps would be taken whereby the interest of said parties and of said Phœbe W. Daughaday in said estate would be rendered valueless, unless they assigned their interests to said Josephine A. Phelps."

Upon the hearing contestant fully and satisfactorily established all of the facts set forth in her contest, and in addition thereto showed, without conflict that the only real estate owned by Timothy Guy Phelps in the city and county of San Francisco at the time of his death consisted of three lots, title to which had been quieted in respondent in an action brought by her under the McEnerney Act; the decree having been given on August 7, 1911. It was further disclosed at the hearing that no creditors of Phœbe W. Daughaday were involved in the controversy, and that the interest of John H. Grady, petitioner, consisted of an assignment from Frederick Daughaday, former administrator of his mother's estate, of "a one-thousandth part of all my right, title and interest in and to my share bequeathed to me by Phœbe W. Daughaday," which, upon the basis of the sale of that interest made by Frederick Daughaday to respondent, amounted to about $1.50. Petitioner, though not denied the opportunity so to do, offered no evidence concerning the asserted fraudulent nature of the transfer of the interest of the Phœbe W. Daughaday estate to respondent, but contented himself with introducing in evidence an answer which he as special administrator of the estate of Phœbe W. Daughaday had offered in an action to quiet title to certain lands in San Mateo county brought by Josephine A. Phelps, respondent herein, against him as such special administrator, which answer set up the same matters touching the fraudulent procurement of the deed and assignment to respondent as have above been stated. He also offered a proposed complaint in intervention in that action, which complaint in intervention was by the beneficiaries of Phœbe W. Daughaday's will and set up the same matters of fraud. He made no offer of evidence in support of any of these allegations contained in his answer, or in the complaint in intervention.

The facts have here been stated with even more elaboration than is perhaps necessary for the discussion of this case; but it will save a repetition of them in the consideration of the appeal in San Francisco No. 6677, in which action the superior court of San Mateo county quieted the title of the plaintiff, Josephine A. Phelps, against the claims of appellant herein, and of the beneficiaries under the will of Phœbe W. Daughaday, who sought in vain to intervene in that action.

With whatever may be its legal ramifications, the question in this case is whether or not Phœbe W. Daughaday left any estate in the city and county of San Francisco calling for administration. The assertion in the petition that she did leave such estate is controverted by the decree of final distribution in the estate of Timothy Guy Phelps as above quoted, which declares that Mrs. Phelps had acquired in the lifetime of Phœbe W. Daughaday all the latter's interest in the estate of Timothy Guy Phelps. However mistaken this decree may have been in fact, it stood and stands as a conclusive adjudication upon the question—an adjudication in rem (Code Civ. Proc. 1908, subd. 1)—binding upon the whole world. If the finality of this decree were not attacked, or attempted to be attacked as it is here, upon the ground of fraud, it would require no discussion to support the declaration that the decree of final distribution was conclusive under these circumstances on the proposition that Phœbe W. Daughaday did not leave estate in the city and county of San Francisco, and that therefore there could be no reason for the issuance of letters of administration upon her nonexistent estate. But the answer of petitioner to the contest asserts that this decree was procured by fraud.

[1-3] We will not here stop to consider the sufficiency of these allegations as measured by the rules of pleading in a court of equity. Rather will we go to the essence of the proposition, which may be thus stated: Where, under an application for letters of administration, it is made to appear that the sole property of the estate is an equitable claim or demand, should the court in probate (1) treat such a claim as property justifying the issuance of letters in advance of its establishment, or (2) should it await the action of a court of equity in establishing the validity of the asserted equity, or, finally, (3) should it, sitting as a court of equity, itself try the controversy, and, as it determines it in favor of or against the asserted equity, so grant or withhold letters of administration? If the third view is the correct one, then the court's determination was perfectly proper, for, as has been said, no scintilla of evidence was offered to substantiate the assertions of fraud. If the second proposition is the sound one, then equally was the court correct, for its refusal to issue letters was in effect to send the petitioner into a court of equity to establish his asserted fraud. If the first proposition is the correct one, then it is to be considered whether the facts disclosed at the hearing presented a case demanding of the court the issuance of letters. Upon these three propositions we hold that the action of the court in probate should not be and is not governed by either the second or the third consideration. We need not discuss this matter with elaboration. It is sufficient to point out that in many cases it would work a hardship if an equitable claim were not recognized as property or estate sufficient to warrant the issuance of letters. Creditors might find it difficult, if sent into a court of equity to establish such a claim, successfully to do so. Heirs may be numerous, scattered, and of divergent views, which might make it difficult for them successfully to enforce the equity. As to the third suggestion, the court in probate should not be called upon to try a contested matter in equity, which arises in the probate court in a sense collaterally as the mere outgrowth of the primary question whether or not the decedent left estate, even if the court in probate, with its circumscribed jurisdiction, is not absolutely without power to try such questions. Yet, on the other hand, for that court to send the petitioner into a court of equity, there first to establish his claim, may result in very real and unnecessary hardship to those interested in the estate. These considerations compel the conclusion that, in proper cases, and upon a proper showing that the property of the estate is an equitable claim, the court in probate should grant letters of administration. In so doing, however, the decree of the court granting letters of administration will in no sense be considered an adjudication either upon the value or validity of the equitable demand, but will be an adjudication solely that the estate makes a prima facie showing of an equitable claim which justifies the issuance of letters of administration. This declaration, however, is not to be stretched to mean that any and every assertion of an equitable right demands of the court in probate the issuance of letters. While the court is not called upon to try, and will not therefore try, the question of the validity and enforceability of such an asserted equity, it is both its right and its duty to consider the nature of the asserted equity, at least to the extent of determining whether, if it be all that it is asserted, it may be made the subject of an equitable decree substantiating it and giving it legal validity; and it will deny letters of administration where the claim presented to it has not such reasonable and colorable value.

Herein the principle is the same (though its application is different) as that which governs the conduct and rulings of courts where one, declaring himself to be a public officer, seeks injunction against unwarranted intrusion and violent ouster at the instance of another claimant to the same office. The courts in such cases do not and cannot try the title to the office; but they inquire into the status of the complainant to the extent of determining whether he has such a colorable right to the office as to justify the law's protection of his possession until his adversary has by legal judgment established his own superior title and consequent right of possession. Scott v. Sheehan, 145 Cal. 692, 79 Pac. 353.

[4] This discussion and this conclusion are manifestly predicated upon the concept that the court in probate has a real discretion in the matter of granting or refusing to grant letters testamentary or of administration. That discretion actually exists. True it is that in the vast majority of cases where such application is made no occasion for its exercise arises, for in the vast majority of cases there are substantial interests to be subserved by administration. Creditors are to be paid, heirship determined, distributive shares fixed, construction of wills had, all resulting in the final decree of distribution, which affords a most valuable and conclusive muniment of title. So it may be said that the probate court will always grant such letters where administration is either necessary or advisable or desirable. But it will not grant them, in its discretion, where the purpose to be accomplished can be as well or better attained in another forum.

[5] Did the petition, then, in this case show such a reasonable and colorable equitable claim as to force the conclusion that it was an abuse of discretion for the court in probate to have refused letters of administration? As presented to that court the facts were that Phœbe W. Daughaday died in Kansas, and was a resident of that state. Her estate was there probated, the rights of all the beneficiaries under her will decreed and determined. All of the interest which her estate had in the estate of Timothy Guy Phelps had been conveyed to Mrs. Phelps under order of the Kansas court. The sale had been effectuated, the price paid, the money distributed to the beneficiaries under the will of Phœbe W. Daughaday, and her estate was finally closed. This, in turn, was followed by decrees of partial and final distribution in the probate court of San Mateo county in this state, which decrees were made without opposition, and have long since become final. If anybody was defrauded by these decrees, it was not Phœbe W. Daughaday, who was dead; it was not this petitioner, who took a thousandth part of the one-half interest of one of the beneficiaries who joined in the conveyance to Mrs. Phelps. If fraud was practiced at all, it was upon those beneficiaries. If those beneficiaries believe themselves to have been defrauded, they can one or all establish their rights by direct action in a court of equity in this state much more expeditiously than through the roundabout medium of ancillary administration upon the estate of Phœbe W. Daughaday.

[6] Still further it should be pointed out that section 1322, Code of Civil Procedure, touching the probate of foreign wills, and providing that administration may be had in any county in which the testator shall have left any estate, means any county in which there shall be estate of the testator at the time administration is sought. But what is the situation here presented? It was shown in this case, as above pointed out, that contestant established title to herself in this very land by a decree in an action which she brought under the McEnerney Act (St. 1906 [Ex. Sess.] p. 78). That decree has become final, and is as binding upon the Daughaday beneficiaries as upon all the rest of the world. It does not appear, and it matters not, whether that decree was based wholly or not at all upon the evidence of the decree of distribution in the estate of Timothy Guy Phelps. If it were obtained wholly upon the evidence afforded by that decree of distribution, and, if that distribution itself had been secured by fraud, nevertheless it would amount to nothing more than the introduction of fraudulent evidence in the trial of a cause, which fact would not militate in the slightest against the validity of the decree, nor be a ground for setting it aside. Bell v. Thompson, 147 Cal. 689, 82 Pac. 327.

From every point of view, therefore, the court rightly exercised its discretion in refusing letters of administration. Indeed we would be inclined to hold that it would have abused its discretion had it acted otherwise. For it is not within the contemplation of the law that the mere assertion of any claim, however visionary and unsubstantial, shall call for the issuance of letters of administration, and to that extent give a form of judicial sanction to unfounded pretensions.

Wherefore the decree of the court is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. CUCCHIETTE. (Cr. 501.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. May 18, 1914.)

1. Rape (§ 7*)—Elements of Offense.

The gist of the crime of rape denounced by Pen. Code, § 263, is the outrage to the person and feelings of the female; any sexual penetration, however slight, being sufficient to complete the crime.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Rape, Cent. Dig. § 7; Dec. Dig. § 7.*]

2. Criminal Law (§ 720*)—Trial—Prosecuting Attorney—Argument.

Where, in a prosecution of defendant for rape on his 13 year old daughter, there was proof that defendant had attempted the crime on other members of his family, comment of the district attorney in argument with reference to such other acts was not error.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; H. Z. Austin, Judge.

Peter Cucchiette was convicted of rape, and he appeals. Affirmed.

W. D. Crichton and C. K. Bonestell, both of Fresno, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment of conviction of the defendant of the crime of rape, perpetrated by him upon the person of his 13 year old daughter. It is not necessary and would not be edifying to review the evidence in this case.

The appellant concedes that the proofs presented by the prosecution would have warranted a conviction of an attempt to commit rape.

[1] We think the evidence goes further, and was sufficient to have justified the jury with the parties before it in finding the defendant guilty of the higher crime, in view of the provisions of the Penal Code relating to this offense:

> "The essential guilt of rape consists in the outrage to the person and feelings of the female. Any sexual penetration, however slight, is sufficient to complete the crime." Penal Code, § 263.

[2] The only other point relied upon by the appellant is that of misconduct on the part of the district attorney in commenting in his argument to the jury upon other illicit acts of the defendant, done or attempted upon other members of his family. We think there is sufficient in the record to have warranted the insinuation of the district attorney that this was not the first time that the defendant had attempted the commission of this bestial and revolting crime.

The judgment is affirmed.

A complaint, in an action of claim and delivery by one who had delivered personalty under a lease contract against a third party, which merely alleged that prior to the commencement of the action demand was made without showing when respondent obtained possession was insufficient as alleging a demand, and hence a demurrer thereto was properly sustained.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; W. R. Guy, Judge.

Action by the Home Payment Jewelry Company against J. B. Smith and another. Judgment on demurrer for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Ben F. Gray and H. G. Bittleston, both of Los Angeles, for appellant. L. E. Dadmun, of San Diego, for respondents.

JAMES, J. Appellant sued to recover possession of personal property consisting of certain articles of jewelry and for damages. A demurrer was interposed to the amended complaint, which was sustained by the trial court. Appellant declined to take advantage of the leave given to further amend, and from a judgment of dismissal this appeal was taken.

In the complaint it was set out that the appellant had delivered to one Mary C. Ames under a lease contract, which was set out in full as an exhibit attached to the amended complaint, certain articles of jewelry of the alleged value of $1,080. The contract as set out provided that the articles of jewelry were leased to the said Mary C. Ames for a term of ten months for the total rental of $1,080, which rental was to be paid, $100 in cash and the balance in monthly payments of $100. The contract also contained these conditions:

> "Second. And I further agree not to let the above goods go out of my possession without first notifying said Home Payment Company and having first obtained their written consent; and I assume all responsibility of loss or damage of said goods for any cause whatsoever.
> "Third. It is also agreed that in the event that I shall fail to pay any monthly installment when due, the said Home Payment Company may at their option take possession of said goods and cancel this lease, and that said Home Payment Company shall be entitled to retain all sums paid by me as a reasonable compensation for the use of said goods and for their trouble and expense in connection with this transaction with me."

[1-3] In the complaint it was alleged that the lessee had failed and refused to comply with the terms and provisions of the contract; that she had paid the sum of $700 on account of rental of the property, but had defaulted in the payment of the balance due; that plaintiff had made demand on her for the payment of the balance, but she had refused to pay the same. This allegation then followed:

> "That after obtaining possession of said property from plaintiff as aforesaid, the said Mary C. Ames, without plaintiff's consent and against the will of plaintiff, concealed said property from plaintiff and transferred and delivered the same to other parties. That prior to the commencement of this action the defendants herein obtained possession of the said aforesaid personal property, either directly or indirectly, from the said Mary C. Ames; and the said defendants are still in possession of said property, and, without plaintiff's consent and against the will of plaintiff, are detaining said property from the possession of plaintiff. That prior to the commencement of this action, plaintiff demanded the possession of said property from the defendants, but the defendants then and there refused, and still refuse, to deliver the possession thereof to the plaintiff. That when defendants obtained possession of said property as aforesaid, plaintiff was, and ever since has been and still is, the owner of said property and entitled to the immediate possession thereof."

General and special grounds of demurrer were assigned. It does not appear by the allegations of the complaint that respondents did not obtain possession of the jewelry from the lessee with the consent of the plaintiff, which it is provided might be given under the terms of the lease contract. If they obtained the possession rightfully, then it was necessary, before an action of claim and delivery could be brought, that demand be made upon them requiring that the property be delivered to the lessor. Bacon v. Robson, 53 Cal. 399; McNally v. Connolly, 2 Cal. Unrep. Cas. 621, 9 Pac. 169. A demand being necessary, it was essential that appellant should have alleged the making of such a demand during the time that respondents held possession of the property. This it did not do. To be sure it was alleged that prior to the commencement of this action demand was made, but it is not shown by any allegation of the complaint at what date the respondents obtained possession of the property. The general ground of demurrer went to this point, and upon the question just suggested the demurrer was properly sustained. The plaintiff was not required to join as a party defendant the lessee named in the contract and to whom the jewelry was first delivered, for an action of claim and delivery will only lie against persons who have possession of property in dispute at the time of its commencement. Richards v. Morey, 133 Cal. 437, 65 Pac. 886.

It will be unnecessary to notice particularly the argument made as to other and special grounds of demurrer. As the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, the judgment of the court was right.

The judgment is affirmed.

1. Pledges (§ 23*)—Pledgees as Bona Fide Purchasers—Priorities.

Under Civ. Code, § 2991, providing that one who has allowed another to assume the apparent ownership of property for the purpose of making any transfer of it cannot set up his own title to defeat a pledge thereof to one who has received the property in good faith in the ordinary course of business and for value, the seller of a diamond ring, under an oral agreement by which the buyer was to pay up an old account, make monthly payments on the ring, and return it if such payments were not made, could not recover the ring from a pledgee in good faith, where to the seller's knowledge the buyer purchased the ring for the purpose of giving it to his wife, and the seller agreed that this might be done, since the buyer was the absolute owner of the ring, at least to the extent of being able to give it away to his wife, and he therefore had more than an apparent ownership.

2. Pledges (§ 23*)—Priorities—Estoppel.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. J. Trabucco, Judge.

Action by Radke & Co. against W. J. Hesthal. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Dan Hadsell, of San Francisco, for appellant. R. F. Mogan and Leon Samuels, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This is an action in the nature of replevin brought to recover possession of a diamond ring, or the sum of $1,100, the alleged value thereof, from the defendant as the pledgee of said personal property.

The facts of the case, which are practically undisputed, are briefly these: On March 16, 1909, one J. McKinery, who had been a customer of the plaintiff in previous dealings, came to the plaintiff's store, desiring to purchase a diamond ring, which he said he wished to give to his wife. He already owed the plaintiff several hundred dollars, and plaintiff therefore declined to sell him the ring outright and entirely on credit, but finally delivered it to him upon an oral agreement that he was to pay up the old account and begin paying $50 a month on account of the purchase of the ring; and, in case of his failure so to do, he was to return the ring, and the transaction was not to be regarded as a sale. McKinery received possession of the ring, but neither paid anything upon his old account nor upon the purchase price of the ring. Shortly thereafter he pledged the ring to the defendant for a loan of $500, and not long after making the pledge, and within a month of the time of his receiving the ring from the plaintiff, he informed the plaintiff of the fact of the pledge, and promised it "to make good and pay for the ring." The plaintiff relied upon McKinery's assurance that he would make good and pay for it, and hence took no action against him, and made no attempt to demand or recover the ring from the defendant until several months later, when, McKinery having left the state, plaintiff for the first time claimed the ownership and demanded the return of the ring from the defendant. This action for its recovery was begun in January, 1910.

[1] We think that these undisputed facts bring the case clearly within the terms of section 2991 of the Civil Code, which reads as follows:

> "One who has allowed another to assume the apparent ownership of property for the purpose of making any transfer of it, cannot set up his own title, to defeat a pledge of the property, made by the other to a pledgee who has received the property in good faith, in the ordinary course of business, and for value."

It is conceded by the plaintiff that the transaction was something more than a mere conditional sale of this article of personal property, for the avowed purpose of its purchase was that he should be invested with much more than the apparent ownership of the property. He was to become the absolute owner thereof to the extent of being able to give it away to his wife; and to this the plaintiff agreed. We think this brings the case squarely within the terms of the section above quoted, and hence must be held to bar the right of the plaintiff to recover the property in the hands of the pledgee who, it is conceded, received it in good faith and in the ordinary course of business and for value.

[2] We think, also, that for another reason the plaintiff is not entitled to recover in this case. Within a few days after it had delivered possession of the ring to McKinery upon the arrangement above stated, it learned from his own lips that he had pledged the ring to the defendant for a loan of several hundred dollars. The plaintiff was thus put upon notice that its purchaser was asserting an ownership and right of possession contrary to the alleged agreement for its conditional sale. It was also advised as to the possession and asserted rights of the pledgee. Under such conditions the plaintiff was not only content to accept the assurance of McKinery that he would make good and pay for the ring, but it was also content to allow the pledge transaction to stand without objection or attack for several months, and until Mc-

Kinery had apparently been permitted to place himself beyond the reach of either the plaintiff or the pledgee. We are of the opinion that section 3543 of the Civil Code should be given application to such a state of facts:

> "When one of two innocent persons must suffer by the act of a third, he by whose negligence it happened must be the sufferer."

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. CRUSE. (Cr. 312.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. May 18, 1914.)

1. INFANTS (§ 20*)—OFFENSES—"DEPENDENT PERSON."

Under an information charging that accused caused and contributed to the dependency of a girl 18 years old, and that she was in danger of growing up to lead an immoral life, and was then and there a dependent person, the state must not only prove accused's wrongful acts, but that the girl, by reason of such acts, was in danger of becoming a dependent person within the general juvenile act of 1909 (St. 1909, p. 213), as amended by St. 1911, p. 659, § 1, subd. 16, defining a dependent person as one under the age of 21 years who is in danger of growing up to lead an idle, dissolute, or immoral life.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Infants, Cent. Dig. § 20; Dec. Dig. § 20.*]

2. INFANTS (§ 20*) — OFFENSES — EVIDENCE — ADMISSIBILITY.

In a prosecution for causing and contributing to the dependent state of a girl 18 years of age, evidence held sufficient to support a conviction.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Infants, Cent. Dig. § 20; Dec. Dig. § 20.*]

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 829*)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS.

In a prosecution for causing or contributing to the dependent state of a girl 18 years of age, where the court fairly charged on all the elements of the offense, the refusal of more detailed charges, which were not essential to a proper consideration of the case, was not error, though in such prosecutions the accused should be given the full measure of every legal right.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 2011; Dec. Dig. § 829.*]

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 814*)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS.

The failure of the court to give offered instructions as to the good character of accused is not error, where no evidence thereof had been introduced.

5. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 785*)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—CREDIBILITY OF WITNESSES.

In a prosecution for causing or contributing to the dependent state of a girl 18 years of age, the refusal of an instruction that the moral delinquency of the girl complainant could not be considered as affecting her credibility was not error.

6. INFANTS (§ 20*) — PROTECTION — LAWS — PROSECUTIONS UNDER.

In a prosecution for the commission of certain acts claimed to have rendered a girl 18 years of age a dependent person, the state is not bound to show that the acts were committed at or about the time laid in the information, but a conviction may be had on evidence showing the commission of the acts within one year before the filing of the information.

7. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1104*)—TRIAL—APPEAL—TRANSCRIPT.

Upon appeal from a judgment of conviction, the appellate court cannot, on mere supplemental transcript of the reporter, review the action of the trial court in attempting to set aside the judgment and resentence accused, where the appeal was perfected before the acts complained of occurred.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Franklin J. Cole, Judge.

Samuel Cruse was convicted of causing and contributing to the dependent state of a girl 18 years of age, and he appeals. Affirmed.

R. G. Swaffield and P. M. Swaffield, both of Long Beach, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and George Beebe, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

JAMES, J. Appeal from a judgment following conviction on the charge that appellant did cause and contribute to the dependent state of a girl 18 years of age. The judgment provided as follows:

> "No cause having been shown why judgment should not be entered, you, Samuel Cruse, should be and are now fined by this court in the amount of five hundred dollars, and, in case said fine is not paid, you shall be confined in the county jail of Los Angeles county for the term of six months."

No complaint is made as to the sufficiency to this judgment in form.

[1, 2] The information charged that on the 15th day of March, 1913, in the county of Los Angeles, appellant caused and contributed to the dependency of the girl named; and it is alleged that the latter was then and there a dependent person within the meaning of the acts of the Legislature, in that she was in danger of growing up to lead an immoral life "by reason of the acts of the defendant." An allegation followed setting forth that the particular offense was that appellant had had upon one occasion sexual intercourse with the girl named. Under this information it was necessary for the people to establish, not only the fact that the act of intercourse described had been committed, but also that the girl mentioned in the information was, prior to the filing of the charge against appellant, a dependent person within the meaning of the statute, and that the offending conduct of appellant caused or contributed to that condition. People v. Pierro, 17 Cal. App. 741, 121 Pac. 689. The amendment to the general juvenile act of 1909 (Stats. 1909, p. 213), as found in the Statutes of 1911, at page 658, defines the term "dependent person." Such person is first declared to be one under the age of 21 years. Then follows 16 subdivisions describing various conditions and habits which give to the person the character of a "dependent." Section 1, subd. 16, declares that any person under the age of 21 years "who from any cause is in danger of growing up to lead an idle, dissolute or immoral life" is a dependent. Section 26 of the same act declares that any person who shall "encourage, cause, or contribute to the dependency or delinquency of such person" shall be guilty of a misdemeanor. The punishment prescribed is a fine not exceeding $1,000, or imprisonment in the county jail not more than one year, or both the fine and imprisonment. Appellant presents for consideration a number of questions involving the matter of the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the judgment; of alleged errors of the court in giving and refusing to give certain instructions. It must be admitted at the outset that, had the case been submitted to the jury upon the evidence introduced by the prosecution alone, there would have been serious doubt as to the sufficiency of such evidence to sustain the conviction. The appellant was a motor car conductor; one of the terminal points of his runs being at the city of Long Beach. The girl complainant lived a few miles outside of that city and traveled frequently to town, where she performed errands and also attended business college. She testified that she became acquainted with appellant while traveling upon cars where he was employed. She testified that on a particular day in March, 1913, she met the appellant at Long Beach by chance about 1 o'clock as she was on her way to attend her classes; that appellant persuaded her to take a walk with him in the direction of the beach, and that the two went down some steps past an old bathhouse; that appellant, while they were at the rear or side of the bathhouse in an obscure place, endeavored to persuade her to submit to his desires, which she refused; that thereupon he pulled her down, and that she tried to get away, but that he caught her skirts and so held her, and finally by force and against her will pushed her over upon the ground, where he held her securely and there committed the act complained of, all of which time, she testified, she was using her strength to release herself from his grasp, but which she was unable to do. All of this testimony coming from the girl went to show that a forcible rape had been committed. Further than this, the girl testified that she, neither before nor after that time, had ever had such intercourse with any man. Her mother was called as a witness, and from her testimony it appeared that she had always exercised such reasonable control of the girl as might be expected of a mother, and that the daughter had always conducted herself in an orderly and proper manner, and that she had not been allowed to "keep company" with any man. The testimony of the father and the younger sister of the girl complainant all tended to corroborate the statements of the mother as to the fair character possessed by the girl. The mother testified that she knew nothing of the alleged commission of the act complained of until a number of months afterward, when it was discovered that the girl was pregnant. Upon the case thus made, viewed in the light of this evidence introduced by the prosecution, it would seem that the girl was not a dependent or delinquent child, for it could not be properly said that, with the disposition thus ascribed to her, and the fact that the act of intercourse committed with her was accomplished by force and against her will, there was danger of her "growing up to lead an idle, dissolute or immoral life." It might as well be said where, for instance, a married woman is assaulted and outraged, and she chances to be under the age of 21 years, that she thereupon becomes a delinquent person, and that the perpetrator of the outrage could be prosecuted as one having caused the woman to become of that character. Appellant denied that he had committed the act complained of, and introduced on his part evidence which tended to show that the girl was in the habit of loitering about the railway yards; that she conversed with men generally there; and that he had heard her use language which indicated that prior to his acquaintance with her she had had illicit relations with other men. The jury, of course, was entitled to take the whole evidence into consideration in determining what its verdict should be. If the jury believed the testimony introduced by and for the appellant which tended to show that the disposition of the girl complainant was prior to the date of the commission of the alleged offense such as to indicate a lewd and immoral character, and if the testimony was believed that the act of intercourse had been committed by the appellant with the complainant as charged, then the verdict of guilty cannot be said to lack support in the evidence. The testimony introduced by the defendant tended to show the proneness of the girl to yield to immoral persuasions, and to show as a matter of reasonable probability that, if appellant did commit the act charged with her, the result would be to give to her the character of a delinquent within the meaning of the definition contained in the statute.

[3-6] A great many instructions offered by the defendant were refused, many of which might well have been given by the trial judge, in order that the defendant might have had a more detailed statement of the propositions material to be submitted given to the jury. It is said by the Supreme Court in the case of People v. Baldwin, 117 Cal. 249, 49 Pac. 187, in discussing a case similarly conditioned as to the evidence:

> "In this class of prosecutions the defendant, owing to natural instincts and laudable sentiments on the part of the jury, and the usual circumstances of isolation of the parties involved at the commission of the offense, is, as a rule, so disproportionately at the mercy of the prosecutrix's evidence that he should be given the full measure of every legal right."

An appellate court, however, in considering the matter of the instructions given and refused, will not reverse a case where it appears that the court has stated in a generally clear, though brief, form the propositions of law applicable to the issues tried. The charge to the jury as given by the court in this case must be said to have been fair and in general substance sufficient. It will serve no useful purpose to discuss the other points made in detail. Where it is contended that the court in isolated paragraphs of the instructions omitted to state important matters necessary to be taken into account, the answer is that the instructions as a whole, and when considered together, as they must be considered, presented all of the matters necessary to a proper consideration of the case. The omission of the court to give the offered instruction as to the good character of appellant, where no evidence was offered in support thereof, was not error. People v. Griffith, 146 Cal. 339, 80 Pac. 68. The instruction given to the effect that the moral delinquency of the girl complainant was not to be considered as affecting her credibility, which was the substance of the instruction, is sustained by the authorities. People v. Wilmot, 139 Cal. 103, 72 Pac. 838. The trial judge instructed the jury that it was immaterial on what day or night the offense charged in the information was committed, provided the jury believed from the evidence that it was committed, and that it was committed within one year prior to the filing of the information in the case. Appellant argues that the jury in their consideration of the case should have been limited to a time at or about the precise date fixed in the information. This court held adversely to a similar contention as made in the case of People v. Carmean, 138 Pac. 117.

[7, 8] It seems that the trial judge, at the instance of appellant, and some time after the judgment appealed from was pronounced, attempted to vacate that judgment and resentence appellant, for the reason that it was claimed that the arraignment at the time of the first sentence was not sufficiently made. The question as to whether the trial judge could under such circumstances resentence appellant is not properly here presented, as it is shown only by a supplemental transcript of the official reporter, and, further, because the appeal from the judgment here considered was taken prior to the time when the proceedings on the resentencing of appellant were had. After the appeal had been so taken and was pending, the trial judge had no authority to make any order which would affect that judgment. Upon the face of the record it appears that the judgment appealed from was regularly entered.

A careful examination of the entire record does not disclose any errors which may be said to have injuriously affected appellant in his right to a fair trial.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frederick W. Houser, Judge.

Action by the First National Bank of Long Beach against H. B. Ziegler. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed, with direction to enter judgment for plaintiff on the facts admitted by the pleadings and determined in the findings.

John E. Daly and James H. Daly, both of Long Beach, for appellant. Myron W. Tilden and W. A. Sumner, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

JAMES, J. Action brought on a promissory note dated April 12, 1908, and made payable "on demand after date." The suit was commenced on the 12th day of April, 1912. Defendant had judgment upon the finding of the court that the cause of action was barred by the provisions of section 337, subdivision 1, of the Code of Civil Procedure. Plaintiff has appealed from the judgment and presents the judgment roll. The only matter in controversy on this appeal is whether the trial court correctly determined that the four-year period of limitation had fully run against plaintiff's cause of action. If the day upon which the note was dated is to be included in the computation of the time, then the trial judge was correct in his conclusion; if that day is to be excluded, then plaintiff's action was in time, and it should have had judgment. Section 312 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides as follows:

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

> "Civil actions, without exception, can only be commenced within the periods prescribed in this title, after the cause of action shall have accrued, unless where, in special cases, a different limitation is prescribed by statute."

Section 337 of the same Code, which was pleaded by the defendant, provides that an action upon any contract founded upon an instrument in writing executed within this state must be commenced "within four years." Reading this section, as it must be read, in connection with the provision contained in section 312 which we have italicized, results in the limitation here invoked being read in this form:

> "An action upon any contract obligation or liability founded upon an instrument in writing executed within this state, must be commenced within four years after the cause of action shall have accrued."

It has been held that a note containing the condition that this note did as to payment, to wit, "on demand after date," should be considered as a note payable immediately after the making thereof. O'Neil v. Magner, 81 Cal. 631, 22 Pac. 876, 15 Am. St. Rep. 88. Without assenting finally to the law as it is so declared in the case just cited, it may be assumed that the note in suit did mature on the day of its making, for by so assuming respondent's contentions are presented in their strongest light. The note in suit, then, matured on the 12th day of April, 1908. In computing the time constituting the period embraced within a statute of limitation, courts in the earlier decisions have differed as to whether the day of maturity should be included. The later cases, however, are quite uniformly harmonious in their holding that that day should be excluded, especially where the provisions of the statute are, as in our statute, that the time shall be computed after the cause of action shall have accrued; and, as fractions of a day are not considered, it has been sometimes declared in the decisions that no moment of time can be said to be after a given day until that day has expired. In an early Massachusetts case (Presbrey v. Williams, 15 Mass. 193) the Supreme Court of that state held that "the action was not brought within six years next after the cause of action accrued" on a demand note, where, by including the day of the date of the note, the full period prescribed had expired on the day preceding that when action was commenced. For a number of years this case was considered by appellate courts of neighboring states, by some criticized and seldom followed. In a later case in the same Massachusetts court (Seward v. Hayden, 150 Mass. 158, 22 N. E. 629, 5 L. R. A. 846, 15 Am. St. Rep. 183), the contrary rule was declared, and the court there said:

> "We think the decisions in these and in some other cases in this court are so inconsistent with that in Presbrey v. Williams as virtually to have overruled it, and it can therefore no longer be considered an authority in this commonwealth."

Under statutes of limitation in substance the same as ours, the Connecticut Supreme Court determined that the day of the date of the note was to be excluded in computing the period of limitation, and a like holding was made under similar statute and in a similar case by the Supreme Court of New York. See Blackman v. Nearing, 43 Conn. 56, 21 Am. Rep. 634; Cornell v. Moulton, 3 Denio (N. Y.) 12. While a different statute was being considered in the case about to be mentioned, the argument by our Supreme Court is favorable to the view announced in the decisions last cited. Dingley v. McDonald, 124 Cal. 90, 56 Pac. 790.

The judgment is reversed, with direction to the trial court to enter judgment in favor of plaintiff on the facts as admitted by the pleadings and determined in the findings.

plaintiff prayed for the sum of $50 per month as temporary alimony. The defendant defaulted. The lower court made its findings of fact in favor of the plaintiff, and among other things specifically found that:

> "The sum of $50 per month permanent alimony is a reasonable sum to be allowed plaintiff for her support and maintenance."

Thereupon the plaintiff was granted an interlocutory decree of divorce, and in addition to declaring that the plaintiff was entitled to be divorced from the defendant, it was ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the defendant pay to the plaintiff "the sum of $50 per month permanent alimony" until the further order of the court. The interlocutory decree was duly entered as of the date of its making. No appeal was taken therefrom, and upon the expiration of one year a final decree of divorce was made and entered, which failed to award to plaintiff an allowance for her maintenance, and made no reference to the "permanent alimony" previously allowed her in the interlocutory decree. The defendant paid $50 per month to the plaintiff as directed by the interlocutory decree from the date of its making to the date of the entry of the final decree, but failed and refused thereafter to make any further payments to the plaintiff. Upon the affidavit of plaintiff the defendant was cited to show cause in the court below why he should not be punished for contempt in refusing to comply with the mandate of the interlocutory decree. Upon the hearing of the order to show cause the defendant contended, and the lower court held, that the interlocutory decree, in so far as it related to the payment of permanent alimony, was not enforceable after the entry of the final decree, and that, inasmuch as the latter decree made no provision for alimony, the defendant was not in contempt. Upon that ground alone the lower court ordered the citation in contempt dismissed and respondent discharged. From this order the plaintiff has appealed.

[1, 2] We cannot consider the merits of the question presented by the briefs for the reason that the order appealed from, being one in a contempt proceeding, is not a reviewable order. Such was the common law. 9 Cyc. 61. It is the law generally (see note to Mullin v. People, 22 Am. St. Rep. 417), and it is expressly so provided in section 1222 of the Code of Civil Procedure. People v. Latimer, 160 Cal. 716, 720, 117 Pac. 1051; Tyler v. Connolly, 65 Cal. 28, 33, 2 Pac. 414; People v. Kuhlman, 118 Cal. 141, 50 Pac. 382; In re Vance, 88 Cal. 262, 26 Pac. 101. Certiorari will lie when the proceedings are absolutely void for want of jurisdiction. People v. Latimer, supra; Muir v. Sup. Ct., 58 Cal. 361; Maxwell v. Rives, 11 Nev. 213; Phillips v. Welch, 12 Nev. 158; Young v. Cannon, 2 Utah, 560. In this case, if plaintiff's position be correct, the trial court in effect refused to enforce a plain provision of a judgment in which case mandamus would seem to be the proper remedy. Crocker v. Conrey, 140 Cal. 213, 73 Pac. 1006; People v. Latimer, supra. In 9 Cyc., at page 65, it is stated that the extraordinary writ of mandamus will issue in contempt proceedings when the applicant has a clear right, and no other specific and adequate remedy.

The appeal is therefore dismissed.

2. Criminal Law (§ 413*)—Evidence—Self-Serving Declaration.

Statements made to police officers by accused, prior to a homicide by him, that he was afraid of the main witnesses for the people was properly excluded as self-serving.

3. Homicide (§ 253*) — Evidence — Sufficiency.

Where, on the trial of a Chinese for murder, four Chinese witnesses testified that they saw accused kill decedent, and accused produced evidence in support of his alibi and in support of the theory that the state's witnesses were seeking the lives of both decedent and accused, a conviction of murder in the first degree will not be disturbed on appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; William P. Lawlor, Judge.

Henry Quan Chuck was convicted of murder in the first degree, and he appeals. Affirmed.

H. H. Davis, of San Francisco, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the State.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment upon a verdict of conviction of the defendant of murder in the first degree, with his punishment fixed at life imprisonment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The facts as presented by the chief witnesses for the prosecution were briefly these: Four Chinese persons were in the basement of a Chinese store on Jackson street in San Francisco upon the 20th day of June, 1913, about 10 o'clock in the evening, when the defendant entered and asked for Fong Hung, the deceased. He was told that he was not in, but one of those present offered to telephone for him, which he did, and Fong Hung presently appeared, and defendant asked him for a loan of $25 to which the deceased replied that "he had no money." The defendant then asked "What are you going to do about it?" to which the deceased answered, "What are you going to do about it?" and started to walk away. The defendant drew a pistol and fired several shots at the deceased, killing him almost instantly. He then threw away the weapon and fled up the street to another building. The officers who appeared presently on the scene, attracted by police whistles blown by the Chinese witnesses to the murder, went into this building, and at first arrested another Chinese who was acting suspiciously, and brought him to the spot of the crime, where the witnesses declined to identify him, but informed the officer that the defendant was the person who had done the shooting. They went back immediately and found the defendant in the building which the murderer had been seen to enter, and apprehended him. When brought to the scene of the homicide the four witnesses identified him as the murderer; and, when called as witnesses in the case, all testified positively that they had seen him do the deed. The defense relied chiefly upon an alibi, which was not, however, established to the satisfaction of the jury, who returned a verdict of murder in the first degree.

[1] The first point made by the defendant upon this appeal is that the court erred in its refusal to give an instruction upon the subject of manslaughter. This contention of the defendant must be based, under the authorities, upon the claim that there is sufficient evidence in the case upon which the jury might predicate a verdict of manslaughter. The only bit of evidence which the defendant can find to base this claim upon is that contained in the brief interchange of words between the defendant and the deceased just before the homicide. The bare words of that conversation do not suffice to disclose or suggest a quarrel, nor to show any incitement by the deceased to any such heat of passion on the part of the defendant as would serve to justify a jury in reducing the defendant's crime from murder to manslaughter; and that the jury who heard the evidence of this conversation did not so regard it is plain, for they refused by their verdict to reduce the defendant's crime even to murder in the second degree, although they were instructed that they might do so. We must conclude, therefore, that this episode immediately preceding the homicide was not of sufficient importance to have entitled the defendant to have an instruction upon the subject of manslaughter given, or to have the judgment reversed because the court, having also heard all the evidence, refused to so instruct the jury. The case of People v. Wright (Sup.) 138 Pac. 349, cited by the appellant, is in entire harmony with these views.

[2] The appellant further contends that the court erred in sustaining the objection of the prosecution to a number of questions put to witnesses for the evident purpose of showing that a relation of enmity existed on the part of the four main witnesses for the people toward the defendant, and that he stood in respect to them in an attitude of fear, for example, Officer Sutton, called for the people, was asked on cross-examination this question: "Did Quan Chuck ever complain to you of being afraid of his life?" to which an objection was sustained, and very properly so; for a statement of this kind, made by the defendant some time before the homicide, would be evidently a self-serving declaration, and as such inadmissible upon any possible theory of the case. In short, all of the testimony sought to be elicited from the police officers regarding the defendant's fear of his accusers, and his various acts indicative of such fear, were either hearsay or conclusions not properly admissible in evidence.

The same observation applies to the testimony of the defendant himself. His conclusions as to the reasons for the enmity of his accusers were properly stricken out; but his direct testimony as to their acts of hostility was in each case admitted and allowed to remain in evidence.

[3] The defendant predicates his effort to procure the admission of much of this sort of proof upon his theory of the case, which is that he was not the perpetrator of, and was not present at the time and place of the crime; but that the four witnesses against him were enemies both of the deceased and of himself; that it was they who killed the deceased, and, being the only witnesses to their own crime, conceived and attempted to execute the double crime of swearing it off upon him. Counsel for the defendant argues plausibly that since all of the parties and eyewitnesses to this homicide are Chinese, and most of them of the highbinder type, this court ought to go behind the direct evidence fastening the crime upon the defendant, to discover and declare the existence of the dark conspiracy above set forth. However plausible this argument may be, the only available place for its presentation was to the jury in the trial court. Before this Court of Appeal all parties, all nationalities, and all proofs must be placed upon the same footing, and be estimated by the same inflexible rules of law. In the case at bar four Chinese witnesses testified that they saw this defendant commit this crime. The defendant on his part produced his proof in support of his alibi, and also in support of his theory that the witnesses against him were seeking the life of both the deceased and himself, because of the fact that he had been an informer against them in relation to other offenses against the law. The jury believed the eyewitnesses to the crime and disbelieved the defendant's alibi. Upon such a state of the record it is plain that had the parties and witnesses been of European extraction the verdict of the jury would not be disturbed; and the same rule must be applied to a case where all of the parties and witnesses are of Asiatic extraction; for otherwise our judicial system would cease to be the administrator of uniform and impartial law.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

WOLBRECHT v. FRENCH et al. (Civ. 1527.)

1. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES (§ 121*)—PREFERENCES TO CREDITORS.

A creditor receiving preference from a debtor must take only enough property to satisfy his debt, and, where he pays a cash difference to be used by the debtor for his own purposes, the entire transaction is rendered invalid and null and void as to a protesting creditor.

2. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES (§ 121*)—PREFERENCES TO CREDITORS.

To sustain a conveyance from a debtor preferring a creditor of more property than needed to satisfy the demand of the creditor, the property must be of such a nature as to make its severance or division impracticable, or that the debtor intends in good faith to use the proceeds in paying other creditors.

Where a wife, at the time of a conveyance to her by her husband, knew that his intent was to hinder and delay plaintiff, a creditor, and participated with him in carrying out the fraud, etc., the court, in setting aside the conveyance, erred in giving her a lien for any amount of money in preference to plaintiff's claim.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; W. A. Sloane, Judge.

Action by Allis Wolbrecht against S. Anne French and husband. From a judgment declaring a lien on property in favor of defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed, with directions.

Haines & Haines, of San Diego, for appellant. L. E. Dadmun, of San Diego, for respondents.

JAMES, J. Appellant is a judgment creditor of respondent W. D. French. S. Anne French is the wife of the latter. On October 5, 1908, W. D. French was indebted to appellant in a large sum of money, and on the 7th day of July, 1910, appellant brought an action to secure judgment on account of that indebtedness. Writ of attachment was issued therein and levy made upon the interest of respondent W. D. French in a certain lot of land in the county of San Diego. This action progressed to judgment which was rendered on April 20, 1911, in appellant's favor for the principal sum of $1,482.50. Execution was issued on the judgment and, prior to the commencement of this action, was returned by the sheriff wholly unsatisfied. On August 26, 1909, respondent W. D. French had executed to his wife a grant deed purporting to convey his interest in the land upon which attachment was levied, but this conveyance was withheld from record until September 28, 1910, some months after appellant commenced her action against respondent W. D. French. At the date of the conveyance by French to his wife he was indebted to her in the sum of $300 upon two certain promissory notes theretofore given by him, and the further sum of $50, money advanced by his wife to him at various prior times. At all times prior to the making of the conveyance by French to his wife and all times subsequent thereto, respondent W. D. French was wholly insolvent, and his wife at the time she accepted the conveyance from him knew of that fact and knew of the indebtedness of her husband to appellant. The instrument of conveyance was in form an absolute deed and was made pursuant to the agreement with S. Anne French that it should be in satisfaction of the antecedent indebtedness due by the husband of the sum of $350, and in further consideration that $100 in money should be advanced by her to him, and the further consideration that the property should be mortgaged and the sum of $300 secured by such mortgage should be delivered to respondent W. D. French for his use. The wife at the time of the making of the deed and the agreement had knowledge of the purpose of her husband to hinder, delay, and defraud the plaintiff from the enforcement of her demand against the land so conveyed, and with that knowledge proceeded to carry out the agreement mentioned. One James H. Parker did make a loan of $300 upon the interest of the Frenches in the property, without knowledge, however, of any intent on the part of the mortgagors to hinder, delay, or defraud the plaintiff. After appellant obtained her judgment in the action hereinbefore referred to and had failed to secure satisfaction thereof by execution, she brought this suit to secure a decree declaring null and void the conveyance made by French to his wife as being in fraud of her rights as a creditor. The court in the findings of fact which were filed determined the facts to be in substance as they have been hereinbefore set forth. In the conclusions of law, however, it was determined that appellant's lien against the property was subject to the lien of S. Anne French for the total amount of money which she had advanced to her husband before, at, and after the date of the conveyance mentioned, and subject also to the lien of the mortgage made to James H. Parker. The appeal was taken from that portion of the judgment which adjudges that S. Anne French is entitled to a lien upon the premises described therein. No brief has been filed on the part of respondents and no oral argument was made on their behalf.

[1-3] Appellant insists that the conveyance to the wife by the husband, under the condition of the facts as found by the trial judge, was wholly void and conferred no title as against appellant's claim as an existing creditor, citing, among other cases, Burke v. Koch, 75 Cal. 356, 17 Pac. 228, and section 3439, Civil Code, which provides that every transfer of property or charge made thereon, "with intent to defray or defraud any creditor or other person of his demands, is void against all creditors of the debtor, and their successors in interest." It should be remembered that the court determined that S. Anne French took the conveyance from her husband with full knowledge of his insolvency and with full knowledge that he intended thereby to prevent the plaintiff from securing satisfaction of her debt. Conveyances have sometimes been upheld which have the effect of giving preference to one creditor over another. It is established as a rule, however, that such creditor receiving preference must take only enough property to satisfy his debt, and that, where he bargains to pay an added cash difference which is desired to be used by the debtor for his own purposes, such fact invalidates the entire transaction and renders the conveyance null and void as against the protesting creditor. In order to sustain a conveyance of a greater amount of property than might be necessary to satisfy the demands of the creditor receiving preference, it must be made to appear that the property is of such a nature as to make its severance or division impracticable, or that the debtor intends in good faith to use the proceeds derived therefrom in satisfaction of debts owing to other creditors. Appellant has called attention to several decisions which affirm these propositions. Sly v. Bell, 131 Iowa, 184, 108 N. W. 227, 117 Am. St. Rep. 417; Jackson v. Citizens' Bank & Trust Co., 53 Fla. 265, 44 South. 517. The court here found in effect, not only that the wife had knowledge of the fraudulent intent of her husband in making the conveyance to her, but that she participated in the carrying out of that fraud by arranging to take the title out of the reach of appellant and to give back to the husband a sum of money greater than the amount of the indebtedness found to be owing by him to her. Upon the facts as found, the court erred in determining that the right of appellant to have subjected to the payment of her debt the real property described in the complaint was subject to the lien of S. Anne French as security for the payment of any amount of money.

The judgment is reversed, with direction to the court to enter, upon the findings of fact as made, such a judgment as is consistent with the conclusions announced in this opinion.

PEOPLE v. CRADLEBAUGH. (Cr. 495.)

1. Officers (§ 39*)—"De Facto Officer."

A de facto officer is one who actually assumes and exercises the duties of a public office under color of a known and authorized appointment, but who has failed to comply with all of the requirements of the law prescribed as a precedent to the performance of the duties of the office.

2. Sheriffs and Constables (§ 20*)—De Facto Deputies.

A person who, after having been commissioned a deputy by the sheriff of a county, openly and notoriously assumed to perform the duties of the office was a de facto public officer, notwithstanding the failure to file his appointment with the county clerk as required by Pol. Code, § 4024.

The words "public officer," as used in Pen. Code, § 149, providing that every public officer who, under color of authority, without lawful necessity, assails or beats a person, is punishable by a fine of not exceeding $1,000 and imprisonment, etc., include a de factor officer.

Appeal from Superior Court, Contra Costa County; R. H. Latimer, Judge.

R. B. Cradlebaugh was convicted for assault committed under color of his authority as a public officer, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Thomas B. Dozier, of San Francisco, and E. B. Taylor, of Martinez, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., for the People.

LENNON, P. J. The defendant was charged, in an information filed in the superior court of the county of Contra Costa, with the offense defined by section 149 of the Penal Code, which reads as follows:

"Every public officer who, under color of authority, without lawful necessity, assails or beats any person, is punishable by a fine not exceeding $5,000, and imprisonment in the county jail not exceeding five years."

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

The defendant was convicted, and sentenced to pay a fine of $1,000, and to be imprisoned in the county jail for one year. The appeal is from the judgment, and from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial.

The information charged:

"That on the 19th day of September, A. D. 1913, the * * * defendant, R. B. Cradlebaugh, alias R. B. Henry, was a public officer, to wit, a duly appointed, qualified, and acting deputy sheriff in and for the county of Yuba, state of California, under George H. Voss, who was then and there the duly elected, qualified, and acting sheriff of said county; that on the said 19th day of September, 1913, and while the said defendant was acting as such deputy county sheriff, at the county of Contra Costa, * * * he, the defendant, did then and there unlawfully and willfully and violently, and under color of authority, assail, strike, and beat, without lawful necessity, and without any just cause or provocation, one Alfred Nelson, while he, the said defendant, had then and there the said Alfred Nelson under arrest and in his custody and control by virtue of a warrant of arrest, and by virtue of his office as such deputy sheriff."

The insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict, and the refusal of the trial court to give certain requested instructions, are the only points urged for a reversal.

It is conceded that the evidence sufficiently shows the commission of the assault; but it is claimed that the evidence is insufficient in the particular that it does not show that the defendant was at the time of the assault a regularly appointed deputy sheriff of the county of Yuba. Upon this phase of the case the evidence in substance is that on the 8th day of September, 1913, George H. Voss, sheriff of the county of Yuba, in writing appointed the defendant a deputy sheriff of said county; that thereupon the defendant, before Edward B. Stanwood, the district attorney of said county, swore and subscribed to the oath of office as such deputy sheriff, which oath, in the usual and ordinary form, was indorsed upon the sheriff's written appointment. It was not shown, or attempted to be shown, that such appointment had ever been filed with the clerk of Yuba county. To the contrary, the testimony of Sheriff Voss, uncontradicted and received without objection, clearly shows that the writing in question had never at any time been filed with said clerk.

Section 4024 of the Political Code provides that the appointment of a deputy to a county officer must be made in writing and filed in the office of the county clerk, and further expressly declares that:

"Until such appointment is so made and filed, and until such deputy shall have taken the oath of office, no one shall be or act as such deputy."

The gravamen of the offense of which the defendant was convicted consists primarily of an assault by a public officer under color of authority. It is not disputed that the evidence shows that at the time of the assault alleged and proved against him the defendant was acting under color of the assumed authority of a public peace officer; but it is insisted, nevertheless, that the evidence of the defendant's failure to file his appointment as such officer affirmatively established the fact that he was not a public officer within the meaning of section 149 of the Penal Code, and that therefore the evidence upon the whole case was lacking in proof of an essential element of the offense for which the defendant was prosecuted and convicted.

[1] It may be, as counsel for the defendant contends, that the defendant was not a de jure public officer at the time of the assault; but we cannot accede to the proposition that he was not a de facto officer. A de facto officer may be defined to be one who actually assumes and exercises the duties of a public office under color of a known and authorized appointment, but who has failed to comply with all of the requirements and conditions by law prescribed as a precedent to the performance of the duties of the office. State v. Carroll, 38 Conn. 449, 9 Am. Rep. 409; Oakland Paving Co. v. Donovan, 19 Cal. App. 488, 126 Pac. 388; People v. McDowell, 70 Hun, 50, 23 N. Y. Supp. 950.

[2] In the present case the defendant was in writing appointed a deputy sheriff by the duly elected, qualified, and acting sheriff of the county of Yuba. The defendant had taken the oath of office as such deputy, and was openly and notoriously assuming to perform the duties of the office. Having been commissioned a deputy by the sheriff, and having acted at the time of the assault under color of such commission, the defendant was undoubtedly a de facto public officer, notwithstanding the failure to file his appointment with the county clerk. State v. Underwood, 75 Mo. 230; State v. Quint, 65 Kan. 144, 69 Pac. 171; State v. Dierberger, 90 Mo. 369, 2 S. W. 286.

Generally speaking, the obligations and responsibilities of a de facto officer while in the performance of the duties of his office are, so far as the public and third persons are concerned, in legal effect the same as those of an officer de jure. State v. Dierberger, supra; Oakland Pav. Co. v. Donovan, supra; People v. White, 24 Wend. (N. Y.) 539; Adams v. Tator, 42 Hun (N. Y.) 384. And the rule in this behalf applies with equal force to deputy de facto officers. State, etc., v. Muir, 20 Mo. 303.

[3] The words "public officer," as used in section 149 of the Penal Code, are broad enough to cover and include a de facto officer; and, this being so, the evidence upon the whole case sufficiently supports the verdict of the jury finding the defendant "guilty of the crime of a public officer under color of authority, without lawful necessity, assaulting, and beating one Alfred Nelson as charged in the information."

The requested instructions of the defendant which were refused by the trial court in effect called for an acquittal of the defendant if the jury found that he was a de facto, and not a de jure, officer. For the reasons stated in disposing of the point relating to the alleged insufficiency of the evidence, the requested instructions were rightfully refused.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. SCOTT. (Cr. 237.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 12, 1914.)

1. JURY (§ 136*)—CHALLENGES—NUMBER OF PEREMPTORY CHALLENGES.

One charged with rape of a female under the age of consent is entitled, under the statute, to ten peremptory challenges only.

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1169*)—EVIDENCE—DECLARATIONS—BIRTH—HARMLESS ERROR.

Where, on a trial for rape of a female under the age of consent, the evidence showed that the offense was committed in August, 1912, and the father of prosecutrix gave the year of her birth as 1898, and testified that he knew the birth independently of a record, except the exact date, the error in permitting him to testify to the exact date from a date on a slip of paper copied from an entry in a Bible, which in turn was copied from an entry in the family Bible, was not reversible, for the particular month of the birth of prosecutrix was immaterial.

3. RAPE (§ 54*)—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

A conviction of rape of a female under the age of consent may be had on her uncorroborated testimony.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Rape, Cent. Dig. §§ 123, 125, 126; Dec. Dig. § 54.*]

4. RAPE (§ 59*)—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

An instruction, on a trial for rape of a female under the age of consent, that, while the law does not require that the prosecutrix shall be supported by any other witness or by corroborating circumstances, the law requires that the jury examine her testimony with caution sufficiently cautions the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Rape, Cent. Dig. § 132; Dec. Dig. § 59.*]

5. RAPE (§ 38*)—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

On a trial for rape of a female under the age of consent, evidence of subsequent acts of intercourse between the same parties is admissible, not as independent substantive offenses on which a conviction can be had, but as corroborative evidence showing a continuous illicit relationship.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Rape, Cent. Dig. § 95; Dec. Dig. § 38.*]

6. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 678*)—OFFENSE—ELECTION BY PROSECUTION.

The better practice is to require the district attorney at the beginning of the trial to elect the particular act for which a conviction is sought; but the purpose of the rule will be accomplished if, at any time before the submission of the case, the jury is clearly informed as to the particular offense of which they are asked to find accused guilty.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1580–1583; Dec. Dig. § 678.*]

7. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1166½*)—OFFENSE—ELECTION BY PROSECUTION—PREJUDICIAL ERROR.

Where the information alleged that the offense of rape of a female under the age of consent was committed on or about August 15th, and there was no evidence of any criminal act on more than two occasions, one on August 9th, and the other three weeks later, and the evidence clearly identified the two events, the refusal of the court to require the district attorney to elect, except by stating that he would rely on the evidence establishing the act committed on or about August 9th, was not prejudicial, especially in view of a charge that, where one is charged with rape, evidence of improper familiarity between the parties is admitted to prove their disposition, and to render it more probable that the act charged in the information was committed on August 9th, and for no other purpose.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 3114–3123; Dec. Dig. § 1166½.*]

8. RAPE (§ 59*)—INSTRUCTIONS—MISLEADING INSTRUCTIONS.

Where the information charged accused with rape of female under the age of consent on or about August 15th, and the evidence showed a rape on August 9th, and another three weeks later, and the district attorney elected to rely on the evidence of rape on or about August 9th, an instruction that the precise time at which the offense was committed need not be stated in the information, but it may be alleged to have been committed at any time before the filing thereof, was not misleading, but was merely given because the information alleged that the offense was committed on or about the designated date.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Rape, Cent. Dig. § 132; Dec. Dig. § 59.*]

9. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1171*)—MISCONDUCT OF PROSECUTING ATTORNEY—ACTS CONSTITUTING—HARMLESS ERROR.

Where the court, for the benefit of a witness, explained the meaning of the term "integrity," the action of the district attorney in stating that he understood the term to include "moral uprightness" was not misconduct, prejudicial to accused.

10. WITNESSES (§ 268*)—CROSS-EXAMINATION—EXTENT.

Where a witness testified that he had a conversation with a witness of accused as to the character of accused, a question on cross-examination, the witness of accused denying the conversation, as to whether he had discussed the conduct of defendant in peeping into the window of a young lady, was within the legitimate scope of cross-examination.

11. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1170½*)—HARMLESS ERROR—IMPROPER QUESTIONS ON CROSS-EXAMINATION.

Where the evidence of the guilt of accused is so strong that it is incredible that the verdict would have been otherwise if the district attorney had not asked a witness on cross-examination an improper question, the misconduct of the district attorney was not ground for reversal.

12. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1172*)—EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS—HARMLESS ERROR.

Where, on a trial for rape of a female under the age of consent, a physician testified as to the physical condition of prosecutrix, and accused showed that prosecutrix had been criminally intimate with others prior to the alleged offense, an instruction that any female under the age of 16 years is incapable of consent, and any one having intercourse with her is guilty, though he obtains her consent, and that whether prosecutrix consents or resists, or whether she had previously been guilty of misconduct with another, is immaterial, given while the court was dealing with a hypothetical case, was not prejudicial to accused, for the jury could merely have understood that, if they were satisfied that accused had committed the act charged, it was no defense that prosecutrix had been previously guilty of misconduct with another.

15. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 769*)—INSTRUCTIONS—NECESSITY.

It must be assumed that the jury are fair and intelligent men, and require no special admonition as to an obvious fact, so that an instruction relating thereto is properly refused.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1803–1806; Dec. Dig. § 769.*]

16. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 829*)—INSTRUCTIONS—REFUSAL OF INSTRUCTIONS—ERROR.

Where the court, on a trial of rape of a female under the age of consent, charged that neither sympathy for or prejudice against accused, a dentist, or any other person, should influence the verdict, but the jury must look alone to the evidence and from it make the decision, refusal to charge that the fact that accused is a dentist could not be considered against him was not erroneous.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 2011; Dec. Dig. § 829.*]

17. RAPE (§ 46*)—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

On a trial for rape of a female under the age of consent, obscene printed articles shown to prosecutrix by accused while she was in accused's dental chair, and prior to the commission of the offense, were admissible in evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Rape, Cent. Dig. § 105; Dec. Dig. § 46.*]

18. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 404*)—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

Where, on a trial for rape of a female under the age of consent, prosecutrix went with the sheriff to the office of accused, a dentist, and the sheriff obtained certain suppositories, and prosecutrix testified that one used by accused when the offense was committed was like those secured by the sheriff, and that accused obtained them at the same place, they were properly received in evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 873, 891–893, 1457; Dec. Dig. § 404.*]

19. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 475*)—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY—EXPERT TESTIMONY.

Where, on a trial for rape of a female under the age of consent, capsules taken from the office of accused were received in evidence, a chemist was properly permitted to testify as to the result of a chemical analysis of the capsules, and a physician was properly permitted to testify as to their probable effect when used as testified to by the prosecutrix.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1063; Dec. Dig. § 475.*]

20. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1165*)—HARMLESS ERROR—ERRORS NOT AFFECTING RESULT.

Where a conviction was just, and would have been reached if error complained of had not been committed, the error must be disregarded.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; Emmet Seawell, Judge.

E. W. Scott was convicted of crime, and he appeals. Affirmed.

W. F. Cowan and Phil Ware, both of Santa Rosa, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, of Sacramento, for the People.

BURNETT, J. The defendant was convicted of the crime of rape in having carnal intercourse with a female under the age of consent, and he has appealed from the judgment and the order denying his motion for a new trial.

[1] The claim that he should have been allowed 20 peremptory challenges has been determined several times by the Supreme Court adversely to his contention. It is sufficient to refer to People v. Sullivan, 132 Cal. 94, 64 Pac. 90, wherein, alluding to the earlier construction of the statute allowing only 10 such challenges, it is said:

> "The construction thus given to the section was made nearly 20 years ago, and, as the Legislature has not seen fit to make a change in the statute, we do not feel authorized to recede from the construction then given."

[2] The court was clearly right in denying defendant's motion to strike out all of the testimony of the girl's father as to the daughter's age. In opposition to the ruling, it is claimed that he had no independent recollection on the subject, but testified only from a date on a slip of paper which was copied from an entry in a Bible, which in turn was copied from an entry in the family Bible. Whether the witness should have been permitted to refer to the slip or not is of no consequence, since he testified positively of his independent recollection as to her age. He declared:

> "I think I should know when the birth was; I was right there in the house. I know the birth independently of the record, except the exact date. I might get mixed up on that. I know the age independent of the Bible record."

He gave the year as 1898. The offense was committed in August, 1912. It is manifest, therefore, that the particular month of her birth was unimportant. In fact, the evidence as to her being under the age of consent is so conclusive that any technical error in admitting testimony upon the subject would and should be disregarded.

[3] We cannot agree with appellant that:

> "The court erred in instructing the jury as to the rule in considering the testimony of the prosecutrix."

The part of the instruction of which complaint is made is the following:

> "The court further instructs the jury that it is not essential to a conviction in this case that the prosecutrix should be corroborated by the testimony of other witnesses as to the particular acts constituting the offense. It is sufficient if you believe from her evidence and all the other testimony and circumstances in proof in the case, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the crime charged has been committed."

[4] It has been held many times that in such prosecution the jury may convict on the uncorroborated testimony of the prosecutrix. It is sufficient to cite People v. Keith, 141 Cal. 686, 75 Pac. 304. If this were not the rule, it is quite clear that many offenses of this character would go unpunished. For reasons readily suggested, though, it is entirely proper for the court to caution the jury to weigh the testimony of the prosecutrix with the utmost care, that no wrong be done to the defendant. The trial court in the case before us was careful to sound this warning in the following language:

> "While it is true that the law does not require in this character of cases that the prosecuting witness be necessarily supported by another witness, or by corroborating circumstances, still I charge you that the law does require in this class of cases that you examine her testimony with caution."

That the court did not "more carefully and distinctly warn the jury of the danger of convicting the defendant on the testimony alone" of the prosecutrix is no ground for reversal. People v. Currie, 16 Cal. App. 736, 117 Pac. 941.

[5] It was not error for the court to permit evidence of subsequent illicit intimacy and intercourse between the same parties. In People v. Koller, 142 Cal. 624, 76 Pac. 501, it is said:

> "And while we recognize that there is a conflict in the authorities as to the admissibility of evidence of subsequent acts, we are of the opinion that the better rule, and the one sanctioned by the weight of authority, is that acts of improper familiarity, or illicit intimacy, or relations between the parties, subsequent as well as prior to the act charged in the information relied on by the prosecution for a conviction, are admissible as corroborative evidence, where they tend to show a continuous illicit relationship."

The court proceeds, however, to state that they are not admissible as independent substantive offenses upon which a conviction can be had, and they are only admissible at all after the prosecution has selected some particular act which constitutes the offense upon which reliance is had for a conviction.

[6] And that brings us to one of the two points most strongly urged by appellant, that is, that the district attorney did not make the selection which the law requires. For an exposition of the rule particular attention is directed to People v. Castro, 133 Cal. 13, 65 Pac. 14, and People v. Williams, 133 Cal. 165, 65 Pac. 323. In the former it is said:

> "The state, at the commencement of the trial, should have been required to select the particular act upon which it relied to make good the allegation of the information."

In the latter opinion it is declared:

> "In this case, as well as in any other, the prosecution must charge a specific offense, and the conviction, if one is had, must depend upon the proof of that offense alone. Other incidents are important only as tending to prove the one specific offense for the alleged commission of which defendant is on trial."

[7] The better practice is, of course, to designate at the beginning of the trial the particular act for which a conviction is sought; but it is manifest that the purpose of the rule will be accomplished if, at any time before the case is submitted, the jurors are clearly informed as to the particular offense of which they are asked to find the defendant guilty. When the prosecutrix was on the stand, and was being questioned, the record shows the following:

> "Mr. Cowan: * * * And we also ask at this time that the district attorney elect upon which date—as I understand his statement yesterday to the jury there were three different times that the offense was committed— Mr. Lea: Oh, no. Mr. Cowan: We ask that he elect the date. The Court: I understand the offense was alleged to have been committed on the 9th day of August. Mr. Lea: On or about the 9th day of August."

This answer of the district attorney might have left the matter in uncertainty in view of certain considerations hereafter to be noticed. But when the whole record is regarded, we think there could be no doubt in the minds of the jury as to the particular charge upon which they were called to pass. There is no evidence whatever of sexual intercourse on more than two occasions, one on the 9th of August, and the other about three weeks later. The district attorney, however, did not claim that in the latter occurrence the coition was complete. Indeed, it clearly appears from his opening statement that only the first of these was regarded as measuring up to the offense charged in the information, and that for this he expected a conviction. He said:

> "On or about the 9th day of August we expect to show that she again visited his office, and that he tried to have intercourse with her, and did take her on his lap and finally take her into the back room, where his bedroom was located, and laid her on the bed, and had intercourse with her, she consenting to it; that he gave her a sum of money that day and told her to say nothing about it. On a later period she visited the office a few times after that and had work done at times, and that on a later date he endeavored to have intercourse with her, and took her in and put her on his bed for that purpose, but, finding that she was in her period of monthly sickness, he desisted. That the charge is based on the occasion on which the intercourse occurred."

The evidence clearly identifies these two events, and, in view of the district attorney's statement, we think there could be no ground for misapprehension on the part of the jury as to which they were called upon to find a verdict. It may be said also that, from a colloquy between the court and district attorney in the beginning of the examination of the prosecutrix, the only reasonable inference would be that the prosecution was based on the first of these occurrences. The court also declared, in an instruction to the jury, that:

> "In cases where a person is charged with the crime of rape, evidence of improper familiarity on the part of the defendant towards and with the prosecutrix is received and admitted in evidence to prove the adulterous disposition of the person charged, and as having a tendency to render it more probable that the act of sexual intercourse charged in the indictment was committed on August 9, 1912, and for no other purpose."

[8] It is true that the court further instructed the jury that:

> "The precise time at which the offense was committed need not be stated in the indictment; but it may be alleged to have been committed at any time before the filing thereof, except where the time is a material ingredient in the offense."

This, however, was given for the reason that the information alleged the offense was committed "on or about" the 15th day of August; but, in view of what we have set forth this instruction could not have misled the jury as apprehended by appellant.

The other contention most confidently urged by appellant relates to the alleged misconduct of the district attorney.

[9] When the court, for the benefit of a witness, explained the meaning of the term "integrity," the district attorney stated that he understood it to include "moral uprightness." That was in the course of a running argument, and, granting that the district attorney placed a wrong interpretation upon the expression, we cannot assume that he was thereby guilty of willful misconduct. Indeed, "moral soundness" is one of the definitions of the term, and probity, uprightness, and rectitude are given in one of the standard dictionaries as synonymous of integrity. The district attorney was therefore not without plausible reason for his contention; but at any rate we cannot impute to him improper motives, nor believe that the jury was misled in violation of the rights of the defendant. Two other instances of misconduct are specified: The first is involved in a question asked of Dr. C. J. Fredericks, as follows: "Did you discuss about the defendant being seen peeping into the window of a young lady?" the doctor answering, "No; I never did, for I never saw him doing anything like that at all." The other relates to the following question asked on cross-examination of the witness W. C. Moran: "Didn't you ever hear that he was found looking in at windows of young ladies?" the witness having testified on direct examination that the defendant's general reputation for truth, honesty, and integrity "was the very best."

[10] As to the first of these, it may be said that the witness Fredericks had contradicted witness Wood, who testified, in reply to questions asked on cross-examination, that he had a conversation with the former as to the character of defendant. The question, therefore, asked of Fredericks, to which exception is taken, was within the legitimate scope of cross-examination. This was probably the view first taken of it by defendant, as no objection was made to the question.

[11] It may be that the district attorney should have refrained from asking said question of witness Moran; but, if we were to so hold, it would, in our opinion, be a gross miscarriage of justice to set aside the verdict for the mere asking of said question. The evidence of defendant's guilt is so strong and persuasive that it is incredible that the verdict would have been otherwise if the declared misconduct of the district attorney had not occurred. We consider this case easily distinguishable from People v. Derwae, 155 Cal. 592, 102 Pac. 266, and People v. Tufts, 139 Pac. 79.

[12] The prosecution requested the court to give the following instructions:

> "The court instructs you that it is the law of the state of California that any female under the age of 16 years shall be incapable of consenting to an act of sexual intercourse, and that any one committing an act of sexual intercourse with a female under such age, and not his wife, is guilty of the crime of rape, notwithstanding he obtained her consent. Therefore whether such child consents or resists is wholly immaterial."

It is admitted by appellant that the foregoing "is unquestionably good law"; but complaint is made of the action of the court in modifying the proposed instruction by substituting for the last sentence the following:

> "Therefore, whether such female consents or resists, or whether such female had previously had intercourse with another, if such be the fact, is wholly immaterial."

The ground of the criticisms is found in these considerations: A physician had testified as to the girl's physical condition, from which the inference would follow that coition had taken place. The jury might readily accept this as a circumstance against the defendant. Appellant, however, offered evidence tending to show that the prosecutrix had been intimate with two boys prior to the alleged offense of defendant. Such evidence, if given credit, would destroy the effect of her physical condition as evidence of appellant's guilt. It is claimed, though, that said instruction would lead the jury to reject said evidence as immaterial to the case.

This, however, is not a fair interpretation of the language used by the court. There was no intimation in the instruction that the jury should not consider such evidence for the purpose of reaching a conclusion as to whether defendant had committed the offense charged in the information. The court was dealing with a hypothetical case, that is, with one where it was established that intercourse had taken place with a female under the age of consent. In such case, the jury were told, it was immaterial whether there had been previous intercourse. The instruction, in the connection in which it was given, could be interpreted as meaning nothing more nor less than, if the jury were satisfied that defendant had committed the act charged in the information, it would be no defense that the prosecutrix may have had previous sexual intercourse with another. Such is the law. People v. Davenport, 13 Cal. App. 632, 110 Pac. 318; People v. Currie, 16 Cal. App. 731, 117 Pac. 941.

[13, 14] There was no error in the refusal of the proposed instruction that:

> The prosecution "must prove to you to a moral certainty, and beyond a reasonable doubt, that the defendant, and not some other person, committed the act of penetration as charged in the indictment."

Under the evidence there was no possible room for uncertainty or discussion as to whether the defendant or some other person committed the act charged in the information. In other words, there was no kind of showing or pretense that any other person committed said act. If it was intended that the jury should be instructed that the prosecution must prove to a moral certainty, and beyond a reasonable doubt, that the defendant committed the act, or else he must be acquitted, we find the legal proposition amply covered by the instructions given.

[15] The court refused a hypothetical instruction concluding with the direction:

> "Then I instruct you that you are to entirely disregard the evidence of a ruptured hymen as tending in any manner to establish the guilt of the defendant of the charge embraced in the indictment."

The instruction could mean only that, if the jury believed that a certain physical condition was produced by the act of another, it should not be considered as evidence against the defendant.

If the jurors needed such instruction, they were certainly lacking in an essential qualification for jury duty, that is, the possession "of ordinary intelligence." We must assume, however, that they were fair and intelligent men, and required no special admonition as to such an obvious and rudimentary principle of just conduct.

[16] The same suggestion may be made as to the action of the court in striking from a proposed instruction the words "nor the fact that the defendant is a dentist." The contention was that such circumstance should not operate to the prejudice of defendant. There is no reason to suppose that the jury would be so remiss as to look with disfavor upon that circumstance. Besides, the situation was entirely covered by this admonition given by the court:

> "Neither sympathy for nor prejudice against the defendant or any other person should influence your verdict. You must look alone to the evidence in this case and from it make your decision. The defendant is entitled to the calm, unbiased, and deliberate judgment upon the truthfulness of the charge against him."

[17] Two printed articles of an exceedingly libidinous and obscene character were introduced in evidence. The prosecutrix identified them as articles shown her by defendant while she was in the dental chair and prior to the commission of the offense charged in the information. She testified: "He just handed them to me and said, 'Here is a couple of pieces I could read.' I asked him where he got them, and he said a gent had given them to him." Being asked, "And what, if anything—did you look at the articles?" she answered, "Yes, sir; I glanced at them." That they were likely to constitute a lure to concupiscence and were used for that purpose is quite evident from the record. Any act or declaration of defendant tending to show a desire or purpose on his part to have illicit relations with the prosecutrix or any solicitation or representation made by him to excite a similar desire on the part of his victim, or to overcome her natural aversion to wantonness, would be relevantly and clearly connected with the crime and therefore admissible. A printed statement, shown to the prosecutrix, would, of course, stand upon the same footing as a similar oral or written declaration of defendant under similar circumstances.

[18] There is no more room to doubt the correctness of the ruling in permitting the introduction in evidence of certain suppositories found in defendant's office after the commission of the offense. The prosecutrix went with the sheriff to the office where he obtained them, and she testified that the "capsule" used by defendant when the offense was committed was just like those secured by the sheriff, and that the defendant "got it at the same place." The principle is the same as that involved in the introduction of a bottle containing strychnine found in the home of the defendant that was allowed in the case of People v. Wilkins, 158 Cal. 535, 111 Pac. 612. Therein, referring to the bottle, it is said:

> "Its identity and integrity were both sufficiently established to justify its admission in evidence."

See, also, People v. Lewis, 9 Cal. App. 281, 98 Pac. 1078.

[19] The witness Price, an analytical chemist, was permitted to give the result of a chemical analysis of certain of the capsules found as aforesaid by the sheriff. This evidence was certainly proper if the capsules themselves were admissible.

The testimony of a physician as to the probable effect of these capsules when used in the manner testified to by the prosecutrix was legally pertinent, and its weight was for the jury. The relation to the charge was not too remote to render the foregoing circumstances proper subjects of consideration.

We have thus noticed, in the order presented by him, the various points made by appellant, and we are satisfied no sufficient reason exists to justify an interference with the verdict of the jury.

[20] If it should be conceded that any error was committed, it should be disregarded, for the reason that we are convinced that:

"The result was just, and it would have been reached if the error had not been committed." People v. O'Bryan, 165 Cal. 66, 130 Pac. 1042.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; HART, J.

PEOPLE v. HO KIM YOU.

SAME v. CHEW BOCK HUE.

(Cr. 455, 456.)

1. HOMICIDE (§ 162*)—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

Where the theory of the prosecution was that defendants aided and abetted codefendants in committing a murder, it was not error to permit the prosecution to prove that two days prior to the homicide defendants and codefendants were traveling on the same train in the direction of the scene of the homicide, and that codefendants were armed, to connect defendants with the crime.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. § 303; Dec. Dig. § 162.*]

2. WITNESSES (§ 268*) — EXAMINATION — CROSS-EXAMINATION.

Where, on the trial of defendants, charged with aiding and abetting codefendants in committing a murder, a witness testified that he heard a codefendant say to the other codefendant, "Start shooting," but did not hear the name of any person mentioned, a question whether the witness had at any time before testified that codefendant had said to the other codefendant that he should shoot a person named was legitimate cross-examination.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. §§ 931–948, 959; Dec. Dig. § 268.*]

3. WITNESSES (§ 387*)—CROSS-EXAMINATION—IMPEACHMENT.

A question asked on cross-examination, whether at any time witness had testified to a fact in conflict with his testimony, implies that the witness had given such testimony, and, in the absence of a specific objection that it assumes a fact not in evidence, is properly allowed, and is not within Code Civ. Proc. § 2052, declaring that, before a witness may be impeached by prior testimony, the testimony, if in writing, must be shown him.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. §§ 1228–1232; Dec. Dig. § 387.*]

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1170½*)—HARMLESS ERROR—ERRONEOUS EXCLUSION OF EVIDENCE.

The error, if any, in sustaining objections to questions on cross-examination seeking to elicit facts subsequently established without objection is not prejudicial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 3129–3135; Dec. Dig. § 1170½.*]

5. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 696*)—EVIDENCE—MOTION TO STRIKE OUT.

A motion to strike out certain answers of a witness on the ground that they are not responsive must be specifically directed to the unresponsive part of the answers, and, when directed to the answers in their entirety, parts of which are responsive, it is properly denied.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1639–1644; Dec. Dig. § 696.*]

6. WITNESSES (§ 268*)—CROSS-EXAMINATION—LIMIT—DISCRETION OF TRIAL COURT.

Where a witness had on cross-examination testified in detail as to the dress and appearance of defendant, a Chinese, on the occasion referred to by the witness, the sustaining of an objection to a further question whether defendant wore American clothes, and how he was dressed, was within the discretion of the trial court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. §§ 931–948, 959; Dec. Dig. § 268.*]

7. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 696*)—EVIDENCE—MOTION TO STRIKE.

A motion to strike out testimony constituting hearsay or the expression of an opinion of the witness should be granted, where the question was answered before counsel had an opportunity to object.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1639–1644; Dec. Dig. § 696.*]

8. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1170*)—HARMLESS ERROR—ERRONEOUS RULINGS ON EVIDENCE.

The error in refusing to strike out improper evidence to prove a fact is not prejudicial, where proper evidence justifies the jury in finding the fact.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 3145–3153; Dec. Dig. § 1170.*]

9. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 696*)—EVIDENCE—OBJECTIONS—TIME TO MAKE.

Where a witness answered a question before objection was made, and the party complaining did not claim that he did not have an opportunity to object before the giving of the answer, the objection to the question came too late.

10. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1170½*)—HARMLESS ERROR—RULINGS ON EVIDENCE.

Where the testimony of a witness on the trial was not in conflict with his testimony at the preliminary examination, any error on the cross-examination of the witness as to his testimony at the preliminary examination for the purpose of showing a conflict between his testimony on the trial and at the preliminary examination was not prejudicial.

11. Criminal Law (§ 622*)—Separate Trials—Prejudicial Error.

Where two defendants asked that they be tried separately from a codefendant, and separate and independent juries were impaneled—one for the trial of defendants and the other for the trial of the codefendant—but the trial of both cases proceeded simultaneously before both juries, who heard witnesses for the prosecution, up to a certain point, when the cases were separately tried, defendants could not complain that they were denied a separate trial, where their counsel stated in open court that he had no objection to the impanelment of two juries and the concurrent trial of the two cases.

12. Homicide (§ 234*)—Parties—Principals—Evidence.

The mere presence of defendants at or near the scene of a homicide actually committed by codefendants is not of itself sufficient to support a conviction of defendants as aiders and abettors, but is a circumstance which, when coupled with other circumstances, may show complicity in the crime.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 482–493; Dec. Dig. § 234.*]

13. Homicide (§ 234*)—Parties—Evidence—Sufficiency.

Evidence held to sustain a conviction of defendants as aiders and abettors of codefendants actually committing a homicide.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 482–493; Dec. Dig. § 234.*]

14. Criminal Law (§ 1170½*)—Rulings on Evidence—Harmless Error.

The error in overruling objections to questions on cross-examination of witnesses to show that defendants and codefendants, separately tried, had been several times arrested for carrying concealed weapons, and that one defendant had been previously arrested under an assumed name for assault with intent to murder, was harmless, where in each instance the answer was in the negative.

15. Criminal Law (§ 1170½*)—Rulings on Evidence—Harmless Error.

The mere asking of an improper question on the cross-examination of a witness for defendants cannot be deemed prejudicial, especially where the court charged the jury to be governed solely by the evidence admitted, and not by any matters outside thereof which might have been injected into the case by counsel on either side.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 3129–3135; Dec. Dig. § 1170½.*]

16. Criminal Law (§ 1170½*)—Harmless Error—Misconduct of Prosecuting Attorney—"Highbinders."

Misconduct of the prosecuting attorney in the cross-examination of witnesses, in seeking to show that defendants, tried as aiders and abettors of codefendants in the commission of a murder, were lawless and desperate men, was not ground for reversal, where competent evidence, received without objection, showed that defendants and codefendants, who were Chinese, were highbinders; the term "highbinder" meaning a rough, one of a Chinese secret society composed of blackmailers.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 3129–3135; Dec. Dig. § 1170½.*]

17. Criminal Law (§ 1171*)—Misconduct of Prosecuting Attorney—Effect.

Misconduct of the prosecuting attorney, intended and likely to result in prejudice to defendants, does not justify a new trial where, on the whole case, the misconduct was removed by a proper admonition of the trial court or was offset by competent evidence concerning the matters involved in the misconduct, and there is no presumption that misconduct prejudices the jury, where it was admonished by the court to disregard the same.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 3126, 3127; Dec. Dig. § 1171.*]

18. Criminal Law (§ 1171*)—Misconduct of Prosecuting Attorney—Effect.

Where defendants would have been convicted without the misconduct of the prosecuting attorney in making improper suggestions and asking improper questions on cross-examination, the misconduct will not warrant a reversal of a conviction.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 3126, 3127; Dec. Dig. § 1171.*]

19. Criminal Law (§ 1186*)—Misconduct of Prosecuting Attorney—Effect.

Though Const. art. 6, § 4½, requires the court on appeal to affirm a conviction regardless of any error, where, on a consideration of the evidence, the court is of the opinion that the conviction has not resulted in a miscarriage of justice, the court on appeal will order a new trial for misconduct of the prosecuting attorney, where the guilt of defendants is doubtful, and the misconduct contributed materially to the conviction.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 3215–3219, 3221, 3230; Dec. Dig. § 1186.*]

20. Criminal Law (§ 1186*)—Misconduct of Prosecuting Attorney—Effect.

The determination by the court on appeal whether an irregularity in pleading or procedure in a criminal case contributed to a miscarriage of justice depends on the opinion which the justices form of the guilt or innocence of defendants after weighing the evidence, and, where the court finds that the evidence is evenly balanced or the guilt of defendants is doubtful, a conviction will be reversed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Monterey County; B. V. Sargent, Judge.

Ho Kim You and Chew Bock Hue were convicted of murder, and they separately appeal. Affirmed.

Carroll Cook, R. Porter Ashe, and Elliot M. Epsteen, all of San Francisco, and Daugherty & Lacey, of Salinas, for appellants. Attorney General Webb, for the People.

LENNON, P. J. The information in this case jointly charged the defendants Ho Kim You and Chew Bock Hue and two other Chinamen, On Git and Yee Yum, with the crime of murder. The defendants Ho Kim You and Chew Bock Hue, were convicted of murder in the first degree. Life imprisonment was fixed by the jury as the penalty. The appeal is from the judgment and from an order denying a new trial.

The facts of the case, upon which the people relied for a conviction, briefly stated are these: On the night of April 27, 1912, at about 8 o'clock, five Chinese were engaged in a poker game at No. 20 Soledad street, Salinas City, Monterey county. These five Chinese were Lee Lung Kai, Chin Taw, Lee Poi, Lee Hing, and Toi Kai. They were gathered about a high table, and while engaged in gambling the codefendants, On Git and Yee Yum, entered the room, drew pistols and began shooting. As the result of the shooting Lee Lung Kai, Chin Taw, and Lee Poi were killed. Immediately after the codefendants On Git and Yee Yum quitted the premises a fourth Chinaman was killed in the street, but by whom it does not appear. The defendants Ho Kim You and Chew Bock Hue did not participate in the shooting, but were standing in or near the door of the building at the time the shooting commenced. The circumstances preceding and immediately attending the shooting were testified to by the survivors of the poker game, Lee Hing and Toi Kai, who positively identified On Git and Yee Yum as the persons who did the shooting. Toi Kai testified that the codefendant Yee Yum on entering the room said to On Git, "Start shooting;" that thereupon On Git shot twice at Lee Lung Kai; that Yee Yum shot at Chin Taw; that On Git also shot at Chin Taw; that Yee Yum and On Git then turned their guns upon and began shooting at Lee Poi. The story as told by Toi Kai was corborated in detail by the testimony of Lee Hing. In addition to the foregoing, evidence a railroad brakeman named Andrews testified upon behalf of the people that on April 25, 1912, two days before the homicide, his train, south bound, left San Francisco at 8 o'clock p. m. and that after passing San Mateo he observed four Chinese passengers, whom he positively identified as the defendants, On Git, Yee Yum, Ho Kim You, and Chew Bock Hue. The witness testified that On Git was in the rear end of the smoking car; that Yee Yum occupied a forward seat in the same car; that Chew Bock Hue and Ho Kim You were respectively in the front and rear seats of another car; that On Git and Chew Bock Hue were respectively armed with an automatic and an ordinary pistol, which they each carried on the left hip. The testimony of the witness Andrews was followed and supplemented by the testimony of the conductor of the train, who said, in substance, that on the same trip testified to by Andrews four Chinamen boarded the train at San Mateo with tickets for Castroville; that two of them were armed; that two of them were in the smoker and the other two in the ladies' car; that they all left the train at Castroville, and proceeded to the south side of the depot to the rear of the train and in the vicinity of the freight sheds; that he could not identify any one of them; that the pistols which two of them carried were black-handled; that one pistol was an automatic and the other an old-style revolver. The prosecution also introduced in evidence four railroad tickets which had been issued at San Mateo on April 25, 1912, and which the conductor witness testified he collected from the four Chinamen whom he observed upon the train on that date.

The other evidence offered in the case by the prosecution was to the effect that on the 2d day of May, 1912, five days after the homicide, these four defendants were arrested as they were about to depart in an automobile which had been brought from Santa Cruz by a Chinaman to Moss' Landing, about 12 miles from Salinas and 3 miles from Castroville. Incidentally the evidence upon the whole case shows that On Git, Yee Yum, Ho Kim You, and Chew Bock Hue were members of the Chinese highbinder society known as the Sing Suey Ying tong; and that during the months of March and April, 1912, this tong was at war with the Hop Sing tong of highbinders.

As against the showing made by the people's case the defendants introduced the defense of an alibi, and in support thereof produced two Chinese witnesses, Tom Git and Chow Soon, the former a merchant doing business at San Mateo, and the latter a merchant doing business in Stockton. Both of these witnesses testified that the defendants Ho Kim You and Chew Bock Hue were in the city of San Mateo on the evening of April 27th, the date of the homicide, at an hour which would have precluded the possibility of their being in Salinas City at the time of the homicide. The evidence of these Chinese witnesses was fortified by the testimony of John J. Reilly, who testified, in substance, that he had been a police officer in San Mateo for about four years; that his detail included San Mateo's Chinatown; that he was on duty in March and April, 1912, and that on the night of April 27, 1912, at about 9 o'clock he saw the defendant Ho Kim You and defendant Chew Bock Hue at the store of Wing Hing Sing at Railroad avenue in the city of San Mateo; that he knew both of these Chinamen well because they had been in San Mateo for several weeks.

The codefendant On Git was separately tried and convicted. The judgment in his case was recently affirmed upon appeal to this court. The defendants Ho Kim You and Chew Bock Hue were tried together. Each of said defendants, however, has taken a separate appeal to this court, and both cases come here upon independent records, but, inasmuch as the record and the points presented in each case are precisely the same, we shall consider the two appeals together as if they had been perfected and presented upon a single record.

[1] The defendants Ho Kim You and Chew Bock Hue were tried and convicted upon the theory that they had aided and abetted the commission of the homicide, and were therefore principals within the meaning of section 31 of the penal Code. Over objection the trial court permitted the prosecution to prove that two days prior to the homicide the defendants Ho Kim You and Chew Bock Hue, and the codefendants On Git and Yee Yum, were traveling on the same railway train in the direction of Salinas, the scene of the homicide, and that the codefendant On Git and the defendant Chew Bock Hue were then armed with pistols. We see no error in the ruling. The circumstances, although slight in themselves, nevertheless, when considered in conjunction with the evidence adduced upon the entire case, tended in a material measure to connect the defendants with the perpetration of the homicide, and were therefore rightfully admitted in evidence, notwithstanding that such circumstances incidentally included proof of the fact that two of the codefendants may at the same time have been violating the law against carrying concealed weapons. People v. Ebanks, 117 Cal. 652, 49 Pac. 1049, 40 L. R. A. 269.

[2] The record shows, as a part of the cross-examination of Lee Hing, the following questions, answers, and rulings of the trial court:

"Q. Was there anything said before any shooting commenced at all? A. Yee Yum told On Git—saying to him, 'Shoot Lee Lung Kai.'

"Q. You heard Lee Lung Kai's name mentioned? A. No; he says, 'Start shooting.'

"Q. Well, what did he say? Did he say, 'Start shooting?' or did he say 'Shoot Lee Lung Kai?' A. He says, 'Start shooting.'

"Q. Did Wong Duck tell you that on this trial you should say 'to shoot Lee Lung Kai'?

"Mr. Hanley: I object; that is not a proper means of cross-examination.

"The court: He may answer.

"A. No; nobody taught me.

"Q. Did you ever at any time before testify that he told him to shoot Lee Lung Kai?

"Mr. Hanley: I object; that is not the proper way to lay a foundation. If any such testimony has ever been offered, it should be shown to him.

"The Court: The objection is sustained.

"Mr. Cook: We are trying to prove a negative.

"The Court: The objection is sustained."

The objection noted in the excerpt above quoted, we think, should have been overruled. The question objected to called for an answer which, if it had been in the negative, the jury, in the absence of a satisfactory explanation, might have deemed inconsistent with the present testimony of the witness, and therefore the question was well within the lines of legitimate cross-examination. People v. Dole, 122 Cal. 486, 55 Pac. 581, 68 Am. St. Rep. 50.

[3] Although the question, strictly construed, was without a proper foundation, in that it was not preceded by express proof of the fact that the witness had previously given testimony concerning the homicide, nevertheless such question implied that the witness had given such testimony, and therefore, in the absence of a specific objection that it assumed a fact not in evidence, should have been allowed. People v. Hart, 153 Cal. 261, 94 Pac. 1042. Obviously the objection and the court's ruling were grounded upon the erroneous assumption that the witness could not, under the provisions of section 2052 of the Code of Civil Procedure, be required to answer the question until the record of his previous testimony had been shown to him. In no sense can the question objected to, standing alone, be considered an impeaching question; and therefore it did not fall within the inhibition of the code section last cited. People v. Jones, 160 Cal. 358, 117 Pac. 176. Such question, dependent on the character of the answer, might have been subsequently employed as the foundation for the attempted impeachment of the witness; but plainly its primary purpose was to test "the memory, the bias, the accuracy or the sincerity of the witness." People v. Manasse, 153 Cal. 10, 94 Pac. 92. A negative answer would have satisfied the primary object of the question; while, on the other hand, an affirmative answer might have been met and overcome by the introduction in evidence of a record of the previous testimony of the witness. A proper objection, however, would have given counsel for the defendant an opportunity to obviate the defect in the question. The objection as made did not afford any such opportunity; and therefore the ruling of the court deprived counsel for the defendant of the right to proceed along a legitimate line of cross-examination. People v. Hart, supra.

[4] The error of the ruling, however, was subsequently cured by counsel for the defendant reading in evidence the record of the testimony given by the witness at the coroner's inquest, which, although in the main conforming to his testimony given at the trial of the case in the court below, contained no statement that he had heard Yee Yum say to On Git, "Shoot Lee Lung Kai." It will thus be seen that the object of the question objected to was ultimately accomplished by another method, which was not only much more effective, but somewhat to the detriment of the prosecution, in that the witness was not given an opportunity to explain why his testimony at the coroner's inquest did not contain all of the details testified to by him upon the trial of the present case.

[5] There was no error in the ruling of the trial court refusing to strike out certain answers of the same witness upon the ground that those answers were not responsive to the questions. The defendants' motion to strike out, in order to prevail, should have been specifically directed to the unresponsive part of the answers. Having been directed to the answers in their entirety, the motion in each instance was properly denied.

[6] Complaint is made that counsel for the defendant was not permitted to ask this same witness upon cross-examination whether, at a time when the defendant was pointed out to him, he (the defendant) wore slippers or American clothes, and how he was dressed. The record shows that the witness in question had previously testified upon cross-examination and with considerable detail concerning the defendant's dress and appearance upon the occasion referred to; and it does not appear to us that the court abused its discretion in refusing to permit further cross-examination upon the same lines.

[7, 8] H. J. Shannon was a witness for the people. He, in company with a Chinaman named S. K. Lee, drove the automobile from Santa Cruz in which the defendants were arrested at Moss' Landing. Among other things this witness testified that when the automobile arrived at Moss' Landing Lee got out and "went to look for four Chinamen." The motion to strike out the quoted statement should have been granted. The question was answered before counsel had an opportunity to object, and the testimony of the witness in the particular stated was either the expression of a mere opinion, or else it was hearsay. But the error of the ruling was inconsequential in view of the fact that the circumstances following the arrival of the automobile at Moss' Landing, as later narrated without objection by the witness (Shannon), tended strongly to show that Lee got out of the automobile to look for four Chinamen. In this behalf the witness testified that he waited quite a while after Lee left the automobile, and finally saw a "bunch of Chinamen; * * * there were four Chinamen, and they all got into the car;" whereupon the witness "asked them where the other fellow [Lee] was, and they said he would not come, * * * and two of them got out and started to look for him [Lee]." It was further shown without objection that the witness asked the four Chinamen who would pay for the use of the car, and they replied that their friend Lee would pay. Clearly this testimony would have justified the jury in arriving at the conclusion that Lee did get out of the automobile at Moss' Landing to look for four Chinamen and that he eventually found them.

[9, 10] The witness Reilly for the defense, during the course of his cross-examination, testified, in effect, that he saw the two defendants Ho Kim You and Chew Bock Hue at about the hour of 9 o'clock on the evening of the homicide at the store of Wing Hing Sing in San Mateo, and that one of the defendants was inside the store, and the other standing on the street outside the store. The witness was then asked, "Didn't you say upon the preliminary examination that you saw them [the defendants] in the store at the telephone?" The witness replied, "No, sir," whereupon counsel for the defendants objected to the question being answered until the transcript of the testimony given by the witness at the preliminary examination was shown to him. The objection was overruled. It will be noted that the question was answered before the objection was made. It is not claimed, nor does it appear, that counsel did not have an opportunity to object before the answer was given. This being so, the objection to the particular question under consideration came too late, and therefore was rightfully overruled. The cross-examination, however, was continued to a slight extent upon the same lines, and evidently subject to the same objection. When pressed further, the witness answered, in effect, that he was not positive as to whether or not he had stated in his previous testimony that he had seen both defendants inside the store at the telephone. The trial court had previously sustained a similar objection of the prosecution; and, assuming (as evidently the trial court did) that this latter testimony was given subject to the previous objection, consistency, if not the law (Code Civ. Proc. § 2052), should have prompted the trial court to sustain the objection of the defense. However, it must be an exceptionally clear case of resulting injury to justify a reversal for such an error; and we are satisfied, after a perusal of the entire testimony of the witness, that, if he did testify at the preliminary examination as claimed by the prosecution, such testimony was not inconsistent with his testimony at the trial to the effect that he had, at a specified hour on the night of the homicide, seen one of the defendants in the store and the other outside on the street. This being so, the ruling did not result in substantial injury to the defendants.

Several other rulings of the trial court are complained of; but upon examination we find that they are of minor importance, and were not erroneous.

[11] The record shows that the codefendant Yee Yum and the defendants in the present case, at one stage of the preliminary proceedings in the trial court, demanded separate trials. It seems, however, that two separate and independent juries were impaneled at the same time, one for the trial of the defendant Yee Yum, and the other for the trial of the defendants in the present case, Chew Bock Hue and Ho Kim You. Thereupon the trial of both cases proceeded simultaneously before both juries up to a certain point in the evidence; that is to say, the principal witnesses for the people, Lee Hing and Tai Kai, gave their testimony but once and in the presence of both juries. Upon the conclusion of their testimony the trial of Ho Kim You and Chew Bock Hue was halted, and the jury sitting upon their case temporarily excused. The trial of the defendant Yee Yum then proceeded separately. We think that the record on appeal in each of the cases now before us as originally presented warrants the inference that the then counsel for the defendants, who conducted both trials, consented to the concurrent trial of both cases; and the record, as amended by a further transcription of the proceedings had in the court below, shows that Mr. Cook, counsel for the defendants, who was in charge of the trial of the case, and who was also one of the counsel for the codefendant Yee Yum, expressly stated in open court that he had no objection to the impanelment of two juries and the concurrent trial of the two cases. This being so, none of the defendants will now be heard to complain that their demand for a separate trial was denied, or that they were prejudiced by the procedure thus adopted.

[12, 13] The claim is made that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict against these particular defendants in this: That it was not shown that they aided and abetted the codefendants On Git and Yee Yum in the commission of the homicide. Assuming all of the evidence for the people to be true, it is the contention of counsel for the defendants that the fact of their presence at or near the entrance of the room in which the homicide occurred was not, either alone or in conjunction with the other facts of the case, legally sufficient to warrant the finding implied from the verdict that the defendants had aided and abetted the commission of the homicide.

With this contention we do not agree. Of course the mere presence of the defendants Ho Kim You and Chew Bock Hue at or near the scene of the homicide would not in and of itself support the verdict; but such presence was a circumstance which, when coupled and considered with all of the circumstances immediately preceding, attending, and following the homicide, tended strongly to show complicity in the crime. People v. Woodward, 45 Cal. 293, 13 Am. Rep. 176. It must be conceded that the evidence adduced upon behalf of the people shows, if true: (1) That all of the defendants belong to the same highbinder society known as the Suey Sing tong, and that this tong was at war at the time of the homicide with the highbinder society known as the Hop Sing tong; (2) that prior to the homicide all four of the defendants resided in the same house in San Mateo; (3) that two days prior to the homicide the defendants in these cases, Ho Kim You and Chew Bock Hue, and the two codefendants, On Git and Yee Yum, who actually did the shooting, traveled by rail upon the same train in the direction of Salinas City from San Mateo to Castroville, and that On Git and Chew Bock Hue were armed with pistols; (4) that, notwithstanding the fact that each of the defendants occupied separate seats in separate cars of the train and were apparently unacquainted with one another, they all left the train at Castroville, and assembled at the south end of the station in the rear of the train and in the vicinity of the freight sheds; (5) that the defendants in these cases, Ho Kim You and Chew Bock Hue, were seen standing at the door of the building in which the homicide occurred at the time of the homicide; (6) that five days after the homicide all four of the defendants were arrested between 11 and 12 o'clock at night at Moss' Landing about 12 miles from Salinas, just as they were about to enter an automobile that had been brought from Santa Cruz by a fellow tongman.

It will thus be seen that the evidence, direct and circumstantial, shows that, although the defendants were well acquainted with one another, nevertheless immediately preceding the homicide their movements were studied and stealthy, with the apparent purpose of avoiding attention and creating the impression that they were utter strangers to one another. That this was their purpose is evidenced by their conduct on the train on the way to Salinas, and their subsequent concerted and clandestine meeting in an obscure part of the railway station at Castroville. Added to all of this is the further fact, incriminating and unexplained, that the defendants Ho Kim You and Chew Bock Hue were in an isolated spot in the dead of night in the company of On Git and Yee Yum several days after the homicide, within a comparatively short distance of Salinas City. The cumulative effect of all of the circumstances immediately preceding, at the time of and following the homicide, readily responds to the inference that the defendants Ho Kim You and Chew Bock Hue were willfully and knowingly stationed at the door of the premises where the homicide occurred, as sentinels to watch for and warn against outside interference with the murderous work of the codefendants On Git and Yee Yum. This being so, the conclusion is inevitable that the evidence upon the whole case, direct and circumstantial, is amply sufficient to sustain the verdict upon the theory that the defendants in question aided and abetted the commission of the homicide.

Counsel for the defendants complain of the misconduct of the special prosecutor who was associated with the district attorney in the trial of the case. Several assignments of misconduct are made, and we shall note them in the order of their making.

The first objection under this head relates to a question propounded upon cross-examination to the witness Reilly, and will be best shown by the following excerpt from the record:

"Q. You know Judge Cook, don't you? A. Yes.

"Q. Did you see him * * * before the On Git case? A. No, sir.

"Q. Did you go up to his office? A. No, sir.

"Q. * * * Then the conversation that Judge Cook had with Frank Sargent that you asked $500 in the On Git case is not true, is it?

"Mr. Cook: I assign the statement * * * as prejudicial error, maliciously made to prejudice the jury, as no such statement was made by me to Mr. Frank Sargent or anybody else. I never saw this man and never talked with him.

"Mr. Hanley: That is not true.

"The Court: The jury will entirely disregard the statement made by Mr. Hanley, and the question is disallowed. You gentlemen will pay no attention to that statement.

"Q. That is not true? A. That is not true."

It is insisted that the mere asking of the question concerning the alleged conversation of Judge Cook with Frank Sargent was an intentional infringement of the rule of professional conduct which should govern prosecuting officers in the trial of a criminal case; and that such conduct was sufficiently grievous to warrant the reversal of the judgment. It would be a wild and wide stretch of imagination to say that the form of the question under discussion was the result of ignorance or inadvertence. To the contrary, it is very evident that the question was deliberately framed and asked for the purpose of placing before the jury in a highly irregular manner a matter which, if true, might have been rightfully and decently developed in evidence without violating the settled and well-understood rules of criminal procedure. The disposition of the special prosecutor to disregard the procedure provided by law, even in a case where a man was on trial for his life, is well illustrated by his persistence in repeating the objectionable question in the very teeth of the declaration of the trial court that the question would not be allowed. This was a deliberate defiance of the mandate of the law, which the trial court might well have punished as a contempt of court, or by an order excluding the offender from further participation in the trial of the case. This point will be finally disposed of later on in this opinion.

[14] Certain rulings of the trial court made upon the cross-examination of Chow Soon and Tom Git, witnesses for the defense, were undoubtedly erroneous. The purpose of this cross-examination in part was to elicit certain alleged facts concerning the private life of the witness Chow Soon, and in part to show that the defendant Chew Bock Hue and the codefendant On Git had been several times arrested for carrying concealed weapons, and that the defendant Chew Bock Hue had been previously arrested under the name of Ah Joe for the crime of assault with intent to commit murder. The questions objected to, however, failed of their purpose, in so far as the answers of the witnesses were concerned. In each instance the answer was in the negative. Therefore the error of the rulings in question must be held to have been harmless. People v. Brown, 76 Cal. 573, 18 Pac. 678; People v. Barney, 114 Cal. 554, 47 Pac. 41; People v. Chin Hane, 108 Cal. 597, 41 Pac. 697.

[15] It is insisted, nevertheless, that the mere asking of the questions last noted was prejudicial misconduct. No justification is attempted, and none could be made, of the cross-examination of the witness Chow Soon upon the subject of his having lived with a prostitute in Salinas. The fact that the witness was a Chinaman should not have operated to suspend the rules of evidence which ordinarily govern the impeachment of witnesses, nor does such fact mitigate the offense of willfully violating those rules. It must be presumed, however, that the jury knew and understood that the mere asking of a question did not constitute evidence; and the trial court of its own motion ultimately charged the jury to be governed in its deliberations solely by the evidence which was given by the witnesses, and not to be influenced by any matters outside of the evidence which might have been injected into the case by counsel on either side. Presumably the jury heeded the charge of the court. People v. Bradbury, 151 Cal. 675, 91 Pac. 497; People v. Burke, 18 Cal. App. 72, 122 Pac. 435.

[16] Equally indefensible is the cross-examination of the witness Tom Git. Conceding for the purpose of this discussion that the direct examination of this witness warranted cross-examination as to the presence of the defendants in San Mateo in the afternoon and evening of April 27, 1912, the date of the homicide, nevertheless it was highly improper for the special prosecutor to include in his questions the claimed collateral criminal conduct of the defendant Chew Bock Hue or any of his codefendants. Such questions were plainly intended to impress the jury with the belief that the defendant Chew Bock Hue was a lawless and desperate character and the associate of men of like character. That impression in turn was well calculated to induce the belief in the minds of the jury that the defendant Ho Kim You, on trial with Chew Bock Hue, was likewise an associate of lawless and desperate men. Such a belief, as a matter of course, must have had some weight with the jury to the detriment of the defendants; and therefore we would have some difficulty, even under the provisions of article 6, § 4½, of the Constitution, in affirming the judgment, were it not for the conceded fact that elsewhere in the record is to be found competent testimony, offered and received without objection, which tended to show that the defendants on trial and each of the codefendants were "highbinders, belonging to the Chinese fraternity known as the Sing Suey Ying tong, and that during the months of March and April, 1912, this tong was at war with the * * * Hop Sing tong or highbinders and hatchetmen." The term "highbinder," although of local origin, is generally understood as meaning "a rough, and now specifically one of a Chinese secret society said to be blackmailers." Webster's Dictionary. It is a matter of common knowledge that the several Chinese highbinder societies existing in this state frequently declare war upon one another, and that such wars are usually fought to the death by the gun and hatchet men of the opposing forces. In short, it is a matter of common knowledge that a highbinder is a man of evil character and murderous tendencies. Therefore it may be fairly said that the irregularity of suggesting to the jury, through the medium of the questions under discussion, that the defendant Chew Bock Hue and each of his codefendants were men of lawless and desperate character was without substantial prejudice, in the face of the fact, subsequently shown by proper proof, that all of the defendants were not only the associates of highbinders, but were themselves highbinders.

[17] It is the rule generally that misconduct intended and likely to result in prejudice will not suffice to justify the granting of a new trial if upon the whole case it can be said that the possible effect of the claimed misconduct was subsequently removed by a proper admonition of the trial court to the jury, or that such effect was offset by the introduction of competent evidence concerning the matters and things involved in such misconduct. Regardless of the varying and, at times, in the past, inconsistent application of the rule in this behalf, we are convinced that the weight of authority in this and other jurisdictions favors the assertion that there is no presumption that misconduct will prevail with a jury to the detriment of a defendant in the face of an admonitory charge to disregard the same; but that, to the contrary, the presumption is ordinarily that the jury heeded the charge of the court. People v. Kramer, 117 Cal. 647, 49 Pac. 842; People v. Salas, 2 Cal. App. 537, 84 Pac. 295; People v. Amer, 8 Cal. App. 137, 96 Pac. 401; Lanigan v. Neely, 4 Cal. App. 760, 89 Pac. 441; People v. Bradbury, 151 Cal. 675, 91 Pac. 497; People v. Burke, 18 Cal. App. 72, 122 Pac. 435. A careful consideration of the record and the evidence presented in the present case convinces us that the harm resulting from the mere asking of the questions complained of was in some instances minimized by the answers of the witnesses, and in the remaining instances counterbalanced by competent testimony; and that upon the whole such harm was ultimately undone by the trial court's admonition and charge to the jury to disregard the matters irregularly suggested, and be guided in arriving at a verdict solely by the evidence rightfully received.

[18] If, upon a consideration of the evidence rightfully and regularly adduced upon the whole case, the guilt of the defendants appeared to us to be reasonably doubtful, we would have but little difficulty and less hesitation in declaring that the misconduct complained of contributed to the verdict, and that as a consequence the conviction of the defendants was a miscarriage of justice. But, in addition to the fact that, in our opinion the effect of the several instances of misconduct was overcome, either by the charge of the court or by the subsequent introduction of competent and relevant evidence to the same point, we are not prepared to say, after a painstaking examination of the entire evidence, that the trial and conviction of the defendants did result in a miscarriage of justice. A calm, careful, and impartial consideration of the evidence in all of its various phases and angles, and, without reference to, or consideration of, the improper suggestions contained in the misconduct complained of reasonably satisfies us of the guilt of the defendants. And in addition we are convinced that the defendants would have been convicted without the aid of interposition of the irregular and improper suggestions of the special prosecutor. Therefore such irregularities cannot be held to be a controlling or even a contributing, cause of the verdict. It follows that the misconduct complained of will not warrant a reversal of the case. People v. Lawlor, 21 Cal. App. 63, 131 Pac. 63.

[19] We cannot refrain from saying, however, that conduct on the part of prosecuting officers of the character under discussion not only impairs the orderly and effective administration of justice, but is well calculated to bring the profession of the law into disrepute. The increasing instances of flagrant and willful violations of the elementary rules of procedure which are being constantly called to our attention confirms us in the belief that the impression is abroad, or at least is entertained by some members of the profession, that the provisions of the recently adopted section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution furnish a cure for all the ills of procedure and practice resulting from irregularities, great or small, ignorantly or intentionally perpetrated during the course of a criminal trial. This is indeed an erroneous impression, which can and will be corrected, and the safe and sane administration of justice assured by a resort to the remedy of ordering a new trial where the guilt of the defendant is to us doubtful, and it further appears to our satisfaction that the irregularity contributed materially to the procurement of the verdict. People v. O'Bryan, 165 Cal. 55, 130 Pac. 1042; People v. Fleming (Sup.) 136 Pac. 291; People v. King (App.) 137 Pac. 1076.

Although section 4½, above referred to, makes it the duty of this court to affirm a judgment of conviction in a criminal case regardless of any error as to any matter of pleading or procedure, where, upon a consideration of the entire record, including the evidence, we are of the opinion that the conviction has not resulted in a miscarriage of justice, nevertheless it might be well for trial courts and prosecuting officers generally to keep in mind, in conjunction with their oaths of office, the fact that such provisions of the Constitution were not "designed to repeal or abrogate the guarantees accorded persons accused of crime by other parts of the same Constitution, or to overthrow all statutory rules of procedure and evidence in criminal cases." People v. O'Bryan, supra.

[20] Incidentally it may not be amiss to state that the determination of this court as to whether or not an irregularity in pleading or procedure has contributed to a miscarriage of justice in any given case must depend largely, if not entirely, upon the opinion which the justices of this court collectively form of the guilt or innocence of the defendant after having weighed the evidence in the individual case before us. In short, our determination as to what is or is not a miscarriage of justice must in every case be a mere matter of opinion which, in view of the varying facts of each case, cannot be based upon any hard and fast rule, but necessarily must be formed from the cold record without the valuable and oftentimes indispensable aid of hearing and seeing the witnesses who testified at the trial. Therefore trial courts and prosecuting officers, in the trial of criminal cases, should adhere closely to the settled lines of criminal procedure at every stage of the case, and thereby be assured that they are neither aiding in, nor contributing to, a miscarriage of justice, which, in cases where the evidence is evenly balanced, or the guilt of the defendant appears to us to be doubtful, will surely be reversed.

The judgment and order appealed from in each of the above-entitled causes are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. YEE YUM. (Cr. 454.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. May 13, 1914. Rehearing Denied June 12, 1914.)

Appeal from Superior Court, Monterey County; B. V. Sargent, Judge.

Yee Yum was convicted of murder in the first degree, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Carroll Cook, R. Porter Ashe, and Elliot M. Epsteen, all of San Francisco, and Daugherty & Lacey, of Salinas, for appellant. Attorney General Webb, for the People.

LENNON, J. In this case the defendant was charged with the crime of murder. He was convicted of murder in the first degree, and the punishment was fixed by the jury at imprisonment for life. Defendant has appealed from the judgment and from the order denying a new trial.

The main features of the case presented by the transcript are in all essential respects identical with the facts set forth in the companion case of People, etc., v. Ho Kim You (Crim. No. 456) 141 Pac. 950, this day decided. The defense interposed by the defendant in this case was also an alibi, and was supported by testimony which varied from the testimony offered by the defense in the case of Ho Kim You only in the particular that Dr. Bernal testified that the defendant Yee Yum was in his office in San Francisco at the hour of 8 o'clock on the night of the homicide. The points presented in this case were all presented in practically identical form in the case of Ho Kim You, and there decided adversely to the defendant. It would serve no useful purpose to review them in detail here.

For the reasons stated in the opinion in the case of Ho Kim You, the judgment and order appealed from in the present case are affirmed.

We concur: RICHARDS, J.; KERRIGAN, J.

PEOPLE v. RADER. (Cr. 321.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. May 15, 1914.)

1. Assault and Battery (§ 92*)—Criminal Prosecutions—Sufficiency of Evidence.

On the trial of a husband for assaulting his wife with a deadly weapon, evidence held sufficient to support a verdict of guilty.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Assault and Battery, Cent. Dig. §§ 137–139; Dec. Dig. § 92.*]

2. Criminal Law (§§ 1116, 1125*)—Appeal—Record—Matters Presented for Review.

The denial of motions to set aside the information and in arrest of judgment could not be reviewed, where the record did not show the grounds upon which they were made.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 2924, 2949; Dec. Dig. §§ 1116, 1125.*]

3. Criminal Law (§ 968*)—Motions in Arrest of Judgment—Grounds.

Under Pen. Code, § 1185, authorizing motions in arrest of judgment founded on any of the defects in the indictment or information mentioned in section 1004, the regularity of the preliminary examination before the committing magistrate could not be raised on a motion in arrest of judgment; section 1004, specifying the grounds of demurrer to the indictment or information, not authorizing a demurrer for irregularities in such examination.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 2423–2432, 2435–2444; Dec. Dig. § 968.*]

4. Criminal Law (§ 1159*)—Appeal—Review—Questions of Fact.

The duty and privilege of determining questions of fact arising out of a conflict in the evidence rests exclusively with the trial judge and jury, and an appellate court cannot weigh the evidence and determine whether that offered by accused raised a reasonable doubt.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 3074–3083; Dec. Dig. § 1159.*]

5. Criminal Law (§ 706*)—Misconduct of Prosecuting Attorney.

On the trial of a husband for assaulting his wife, a witness, having denied that he told accused's father that the prosecution was being carried on through motives of revenge, was asked by the district attorney to tell what was said in the conversation between him and the father, and answered that the father said he thought they should be lenient with accused and give him another trial, and that he told him that he thought accused had had all the trial that any man could ask for, "since he has been turned out," whereupon the district attorney said: "You said since he was turned out; what was that part of the conversation that you had at that time with R?" Held, that the asking of this question was not prejudicial or objectionable conduct on the part of the prosecuting officer, as it merely repeated what the witness had already stated without objection.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1661; Dec. Dig. § 706.*]

6. Witnesses (§ 350*)—Cross-Examination of Accused in Criminal Prosecutions.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 2051, providing that a witness may be impeached by showing that he has been convicted of a felony, the district attorney was entitled to ask accused, on his cross-examination, whether he had previously been convicted of a felony, though the charge in the information that he had been so previously convicted had been stricken out for some reason, and though it was apparently claimed that accused had been pardoned, as upon advice of his counsel or the court he could have had the benefit of an instruction as to how he would be entitled to answer under such circumstances.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. §§ 1140–1149; Dec. Dig. § 350.*]

7. ASSAULT AND BATTERY (§ 88*)—CRIMINAL PROSECUTION—EVIDENCE—THREATS.

On the trial of a husband for assaulting his wife with a deadly weapon, evidence of prior threats to commit bodily violence toward the wife was properly admitted to show his purpose and intent.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Assault and Battery, Cent. Dig. §§ 128, 131, 132; Dec. Dig. § 88.*]

8. WITNESSES (§ 387*)—CROSS-EXAMINATION OF ACCUSED IN CRIMINAL PROSECUTIONS.

Where, on the trial of a husband for assaulting his wife with a deadly weapon, accused denied having made threats of violence against his wife prior to the date of the alleged assault, it was proper cross-examination for the district attorney to state particular details showing the contrary of such denial and to ask whether or not the things so stated were true.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. §§ 1228–1232; Dec. Dig. § 387.*]

9. WITNESSES (§ 391*)—INCONSISTENT STATEMENTS—REBUTTAL.

Where a husband on trial for assaulting his wife denied threats of violence against the wife previous to the date of the alleged assault, it was within the discretion of the court to allow witnesses in rebuttal to show the making of such threats, even though the matter might have been more proper for proof as part of the main case.

10. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1171*)—MISCONDUCT OF PROSECUTING ATTORNEY.

In a criminal case, though the prosecuting counsel in his argument was most emphatic and plain spoken in his denunciation of accused, there was no prejudicial error, where he called attention to the testimony, when his language was challenged as improper, thereby enabling the jury to determine for themselves whether his conclusions were justified, and, when the court instructed the jury that certain inferences drawn by him were too broad and not to be considered, a portion of the remarks were withdrawn.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 3126, 3127; Dec. Dig. § 1171.*]

11. WITNESSES (§ 61*)—COMPETENCY OF HUSBAND AND WIFE FOR OR AGAINST EACH OTHER.

Under Pen. Code, § 1322, providing that neither husband nor wife is a competent witness for or against the other in a criminal action or proceeding, except in the case among others of criminal violence upon one by the other, a wife was a competent witness on the trial of her husband for assaulting her with a deadly weapon.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. §§ 163, 174–176; Dec. Dig. § 61.*]

12. ASSAULT AND BATTERY (§ 56*)—CRIMINAL OFFENSES—ELEMENTS.

Where a husband drew a pocketknife, at the same time seizing his wife about the head and stating that he was going to kill her, it was not necessary to constitute an assault with a deadly weapon that he should have actually cut her with the knife exhibited.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Assault and Battery, Cent. Dig. §§ 80, 81; Dec. Dig. § 56.*]

13. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1170*)—APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR.

On the trial of a husband for assaulting his wife with a deadly weapon, it was immaterial that his ill feeling towards the wife was caused by the conduct of her immediate relatives, and the sustaining of objections to questions asked her calculated to show this fact was not prejudicial error.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 3145–3153; Dec. Dig. § 1170.*]

14. ASSAULT AND BATTERY (§ 66*)—CRIMINAL OFFENSES—JUSTIFICATION.

That the motive or animus prompting an assault with a deadly weapon has been produced by improper statements or conduct of third parties, or even of the assaulted party, does not justify the assault where it is not necessary in self-defense.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Assault and Battery, Cent. Dig. §§ 94, 95; Dec. Dig. § 66.*]

15. WITNESSES (§ 268*)—CROSS-EXAMINATION—SCOPE.

On the trial of a husband for assaulting his wife, where she did not testify to any acts of accused or as to his whereabouts subsequent to the assault, a question asked her on cross-examination, as to whether he did not continue to live with her up to the date of the arrest, was not strictly proper cross-examination, and while the court, in the exercise of a reasonable discretion, might have properly admitted it as tending to affect her credibility as a witness, its exclusion was not error, especially where he made no attempt to prove this fact directly.

16. ASSAULT AND BATTERY (§ 89*)—EVIDENCE—PRELIMINARY PROOF—SUFFICIENCY.

On the trial of a husband for assaulting his wife with a knife, where the wife, in response to a question as to whether the knife shown her was, according to her best recollection, the knife with which accused threatened to cut her testified without qualification that it was the knife, the knife was sufficiently identified to be received in evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Assault and Battery, Cent. Dig. § 128; Dec. Dig. § 89.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Kings County; J. W. Mahon, Judge.

Frederick H. Rader was convicted of assault with a deadly weapon, and he appeals. Affirmed.

W. R. McQuiddy, of Hanford, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and George Beebe, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

JAMES, J. Defendant was convicted of having committed an assault with a deadly weapon upon the person of his wife, and was sentenced to imprisonment in the state prison for a term of 18 months. He has appealed from that judgment.

[1] The evidence introduced on behalf of the people was that furnished chiefly by three witnesses, one being the wife of appellant and the other two her father and sister. This testimony showed that appellant, on the night of the 11th of October, 1913, engaged in a wordy controversy with his wife, the subject being the matter of her persisting in attending a certain church, to which he objected; that finally he became enraged and drew a pocketknife, at the same time seizing her about the head and stating that he was going to kill her. At that moment the sister interfered, and the father entered the room at about the same time; whereupon appellant desisted in his attack and dropped the knife back into his pocket. Other evidence was introduced showing that at times prior to the date of the alleged assault appellant had uttered threats against the life of his wife and had previously attempted to cut her with a knife. On his own behalf the defendant denied in toto the narrative of the alleged occurrence as detailed by the three witnesses mentioned, and introduced the testimony of other witnesses to show that on the night in question he was not at home until an hour much later than that fixed by the witnesses as the time when the assault occurred.

[2, 3] A motion was made to set aside the information. The clerk's record, referring to proceedings had on that motion, contains the following statement:

> "Thereupon defendant by his counsel moves the court to set aside the information in this action upon the grounds stated, which motion after argument thereon was denied."

Nothing appears in the record from which it can be learned what grounds appellant based this motion upon, or what evidence, if any, was offered or showing made in support thereof. There is therefore no matter here presented upon which a review of the ruling made on the motion can be predicated. It will be deemed to have been correctly made. At the time appellant appeared before the trial judge for sentence a motion in arrest of judgment was made, based principally upon the ground that defendant had been improperly held to answer for trial to the superior court. The transcript of a part of the record of the proceedings had before the committing magistrate was offered in evidence in support of the motion. Appellant's counsel states in his brief that the objections raised by his motion in arrest of judgment were the same as those presented on the motion to set aside the information. Looking to the record, which must be the sole guide on a consideration of this appeal, it is not made to appear what the grounds of the motion to set aside the indictment were. If the appellant desired to have the question of the correctness of the ruling of the trial judge, made upon the last-mentioned motion, examined on appeal, he should have presented a showing of the grounds of the motion and offered his proof in support thereof, first to the trial judge and then have brought the record of those proceedings before this court. He would not be permitted to raise the question as to the regularity of the preliminary examination on the motion in arrest of judgment. The sections of the Code providing for the making of a motion in arrest of judgment and specifying the grounds thereof do not authorize this. Pen. Code, §§ 1185, 1004.

[4] It is contended that the evidence was insufficient to warrant the conviction of appellant. This claim may be answered briefly: The statement of the general substance of the evidence introduced on behalf of the prosecution, as hereinbefore set forth, shows that there was ample evidence upon which to find the verdict returned by the jury. Counsel for appellant would have this court weigh the evidence and determine whether that offered by appellant was sufficient to raise a reasonable doubt in his favor as against the proof made by the prosecution. Appellate courts have not the duty nor privilege of determining questions of fact arising out of a conflict in the evidence; that duty rests exclusively with the trial judge and jury.

[5] A number of objections were made to the admission and rejection of testimony. On cross-examination the witness George W. Sain was asked whether he had not said to the father of appellant that the prosecution was being carried on through motives of revenge. He replied that he had not so stated, and the district attorney then asked him what was said at the conversation between the witness and Rader. The witness replied that Rader, Sr., had said:

> "I think you ought to be lenient with Fred and give him another trial."

> "I told him that I thought he had had all the trial that any man could ask for since he has been turned out. * * *"

This question followed:

> "You said since he was turned out; what was that part of the conversation that you had at that time with Andrew Rader?"

This question was objected to and the objection was sustained. Because of the asking of the question, it is claimed the district attorney was guilty of prejudicial misconduct. No prejudicial or objectionable conduct on the part of the prosecuting officer was shown. The witness had stated without objection details of the conversation between himself and Rader, Sr., and the statement objected to was only by way of repetition of what the witness had already said.

[6] The information filed against appellant contained in the first instance, in addition to the charge of assault with intent to commit murder, an accusation that appellant had previously been convicted of a felony. This charge of a prior conviction was stricken out before trial (for what reason does not appear). The defendant offered himself as a witness and testified on his own behalf. On cross-examination he was asked whether he had not been previously convicted of a felony. The question was objected to and the conduct of the district attorney in asking it was assigned as wrongful and prejudicial to the rights of defendant. The witness answered that he had so been convicted, and when asked for what felony his answer was stopped by an objection which the court sustained. The court then instructed the jury that no consideration was to be given to evidence relating to a former conviction. The district attorney was entitled to ask of appellant, as of any defendant voluntarily giving testimony in aid of his defense, whether he had not been previously convicted of a felony. If, as it seems to be intimated, appellant had been previously convicted and pardoned for some offense, he could have, upon advice of his counsel or the court, had the benefit of an instruction as to how he would be entitled under such circumstances to answer the question. The question of the district attorney in the general form in which it was framed was pertinent, proper, and altogether permissible under the situation as the evidence disclosed it. Code Civ. Proc. § 2051. It may be noted that the district attorney by his first question did not point to any particular felony of which appellant may have been previously convicted, but asked him generally as to whether he had not suffered such previous conviction.

[7-9] Evidence of prior threats to commit bodily violence toward his wife was properly admitted against appellant, at least as tending to show the purpose and intent of appellant at the time he is charged with having committed the assault. People v. Chaves, 122 Cal. 134, 54 Pac. 596; People v. Piercy, 16 Cal. App. 13, 116 Pac. 322. On his direct examination the appellant was asked whether he had at any time prior to the date of the alleged assault threatened to cut his wife with a knife, or kill or shoot her. He replied that he had not. It was proper cross-examination for the district attorney to state particular details showing the contrary of that statement and ask for appellant's answer as to whether or not those things so stated were true; and it was within the discretion of the court to allow witnesses to be called in rebuttal of the denials of appellant, even though the matter may have been, as is suggested by counsel, more proper for proof as part of the main case of the people. It is not shown that appellant did not have an opportunity to produce all of the evidence he could or desired to produce on all matters at issue.

[10] Special counsel assisting the district attorney during the argument to the jury was truly most emphatic and plain spoken in his denunciation of appellant. When his choice of language was challenged as being improper, he relieved the objectionable statements of their improper character by calling attention to the testimony from which his inferences were drawn, and so the jury had the opportunity of determining for themselves whether the prosecutor's conclusions were justified. The court also at one juncture instructed the jury directly that certain inferences drawn by the prosecutor were too broad and that they were not to be considered. A portion of the objectionable remarks were thereupon withdrawn. As the record discloses the occurrences at the argument, it does not appear that the conduct of the prosecuting officer should be deemed to have prejudiced the jury against appellant.

[11] It is next claimed that the wife of appellant was not a competent witness to give testimony against him. This objection is based upon the provisions of section 1322 of the Penal Code, which generally prohibit a wife or a husband from testifying against the other in a criminal action. The prohibitive terms of the section, however, are modified by this clause of exception: "Except * * * in cases of criminal violence upon one by the other." Appellant was directly charged with an act of criminal violence committed against his wife.

[12] It was not necessary, in order to establish the commission of the crime, that appellant should have actually cut his intended victim with the knife which he exhibited. People v. Piercy, supra, and cases therein cited.

[13, 14] Whether the cause of ill feeling of the husband toward his wife was engendered by the conduct of the immediate relatives of the latter was immaterial, and there was no prejudicial error committed in sustaining objections to questions asked of the wife calculated to show that the interference of relatives had brought about that condition of feeling. An assault with a deadly weapon is not justified by a showing that the motive or animus prompting it has been produced by improper statements or conduct made by third parties, or even by the complainant. It is not claimed that the alleged assault was made in necessary self-defense of the person of appellant.

[15] The wife of appellant did not testify on direct examination to any acts of defendant occurring after the night when the alleged assault was committed, or as to his whereabouts from that time up to the date of his arrest, which occurred about seven days later. On cross-examination she was asked whether the appellant did not continue to live with her up to the date of his arrest. This line of examination was objected to on the ground that it was not within the scope of proper cross-examination and that it was immaterial and irrelevant. The objection was sustained. The matter sought to be elicited was, strictly speaking, not proper cross-examination, although the court in the exercise of a reasonable discretion in regulating the examination of the witness might have properly admitted the testimony as tending in some degree, if the jury might so view it, to affect the credibility of the witness. The defendant on his own behalf testified fully in denial of all of the alleged facts upon which the charge was founded, but he did not testify, nor offer to testify, as to what relations he had sustained toward his wife after the night of October 11th. The record does not show that appellant was prevented from proving directly the facts which he sought to bring out on the cross-examination of his wife.

[16] It is objected that the court erred in admitting in evidence the knife claimed to have been the one with which the assault was committed, for the reason that sufficient identification thereof was not shown. The evidence gives no point to this objection. The wife of appellant when asked whether, according to her best recollection, the knife shown her was the knife with which appellant threatened to cut her, replied: "Yes, sir; that's the knife." The strength of this positive statement as to the identity of the knife was not weakened by any qualifying words of the witness.

There are a great many more instances specified by counsel for appellant where it is claimed the court committed prejudicial error in rulings upon the admission and rejection of testimony. Those that have been considered furnish a fair illustration of the general nature and force of these objections. It will not be advantageous or profitable to go to the great length necessary to a detailed discussion of these objections. A careful examination of the matters submitted does not warrant the claim that the alleged errors pointed out were such as to affect any substantial right of appellant. His conviction was made upon sufficient evidence, in substance competent and relevant to the charge contained in the information. The instructions given by the court to the jury presented a correct and sufficiently full statement of the law applicable to the issues.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. YEE KING. (Cr. 488.)

CRIMINAL LAW (§ 925½*)—NEW TRIAL—MISCONDUCT OF JURORS—UNAUTHORIZED VIEW.

Misconduct of jurors in visiting alone the scene of the crime is to be considered harmless, and not ground for new trial; it not being shown they saw or heard anything different from or contradictory of the evidence, or that their inspection resulted in an understanding of the evidence, or of any fact in the case, different from that conveyed to them by the testimony and diagram in evidence.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Yee King was convicted of murder, and, from the judgment and from an order denying new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

Oliver Dibble, T. I. Fitzpatrick, and J. J. Greeley, all of San Francisco, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

LENNON, P. J. This is an appeal from the judgment and from the order denying a new trial in a case where the defendant was convicted of murder in the second degree and sentenced to serve 20 years in the state prison.

The evidence adduced upon the entire case is substantially as follows: John C. Catlin, a witness for the people, testified that shortly before the commission of the homicide, at about the hour of 9 o'clock in the evening, he was walking down Stockton street towards its intersection with Washington street in San Francisco, in what is known as the Chinatown district. He came to the corner of Stockton and Washington streets, and continued along Stockton street about 125 feet when he heard a shot, and turning around saw the forms of three men, one of whom seemed to be struggling with the other two. He turned back to the scene of the encounter. There were four more shots. The witness noticed the flashes directed towards the body of the one man who seemed to be struggling with the other two, and who, after a futile effort to ward off his assailants, fell to the ground mortally wounded. Thereupon the assailants turned and ran in a northwesterly direction across Stockton street. Corporal Charles Goff, a police officer, who, at the moment of the shooting, was about half a block from the scene thereof, ran towards the point from which the report of the shots came, and saw two men running in a northwesterly direction. One wore a light gray suit and the other a dark suit. As he was pursuing them the man with the gray suit turned and fired. The officer, however, continued, and finally overtook him, whereupon the latter pointed his pistol at the officer's body but, without firing, turned and continued his flight. The officer managed to fell him with a blow of his hand, and after a struggle arrested and handcuffed him. The man arrested was Yee King, the defendant in this case. The autopsy surgeon found three bullet wounds in the body of the deceased.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

The defendant took the stand and admitted that he was present at the scene of the shooting, and also that he carried a revolver similar to the one taken from him by the arresting officer, but denied that he was one of the assailants of the deceased, claiming that he was merely an innocent bystander. He admitted his flight, but stated that he fled because the two assailants of the deceased were about to attack him.

Incidentally it was shown in evidence that one Ah Moon, jointly charged with the defendant, was also arrested while running from the vicinity of the crime by Police Officers Nielson and O'Dowd at about the same time that Officer Goff arrested the defendant.

In addition to the foregoing there is the testimony of three other witnesses, who were present in the vicinity of the homicide at the time the shots were fired, and thereafter saw the flight and arrest of Yee King and Ah Moon.

But one point is presented for a reversal, and that involves the refusal of the trial court to grant the defendant's motion for a new trial, which was based entirely upon the grounds:

> "(1) That the jury received evidence out of court other than that resulting from a view of the premises; (2) that the jury were guilty of misconduct by which a fair and due consideration of the case was prevented."

The several remaining grounds of the motion for a new trial were not pressed at the argument of the motion, and they are not presented for consideration upon this appeal.

In support of the grounds of the motion for a new trial hereinbefore specified, certain affidavits were offered and received in evidence, wherein it was alleged that two of the jurors impaneled to try the cause had visited and viewed the scene of the homicide while the trial was in progress and before the taking of evidence had been concluded. Upon the hearing of the motion for a new trial special counsel for the people, while conceding the conduct of the two jurors in question to be as stated in the affidavits, objected that such conduct was not in and of itself sufficient to justify a new trial; and for that reason at first insisted that the motion be submitted for the court's decision upon the showing made by the defendant. The trial court, however, after stating that it had in mind the rule and its exceptions, that a juror will not be permitted to impeach his own verdict, suggested, out of an abundance of caution and in furtherance of justice, that the two jurors in question should be sworn and interrogated concerning the motive for their visit to the scene of the homicide and their conduct while there. Finally counsel for the people consented to this course, and also stipulated that such testimony might be considered as the equivalent of additional affidavits upon the question in controversy.

Under the circumstances of the present case, the procedure suggested and adopted was not only proper (People v. Chin Non, 146 Cal. 561, 80 Pac. 681), but does credit to court and counsel; and they are indeed to be commended for the caution and liberal sense of justice thus displayed. Thereupon the jurors in question were sworn, and the examination developed the following facts: During a noon recess in the trial of the case jurors E. B. Lindauer and John T. Welby met, and walked to the scene of the homicide, and while there "for a second or two" discussed certain features of the case to the extent of commenting upon and pointing out to one another certain objects and locations which were designated and delineated upon a detailed diagram of the scene of the homicide previously offered and received in evidence upon the actual trial of the case. Both jurors testified that they did not disclose the fact of their visit to the scene of the homicide to their fellow jurors, and that the incident was not subsequently referred to or discussed in or out of court at any time during the actual trial of the case or while the jury was deliberating upon the verdict.

It is not only conceivable but ordinarily very likely that an unauthorized view by jurors of the scene of a crime will result in the acquisition of material knowledge for or against the defendant concerning many essential features of a case which may be contrary to that conveyed by the evidence adduced at the trial. In such a situation it would indeed be difficult to say that the verdict of the jury was not induced in part at least by evidence received out of court other than that resulting from an authorized view of the premises. Such, however, is not the situation in the present case. The record shows that the jurors in question, upon their visit to the place of the crime, noted and commented only upon matters and things which had been previously presented for their consideration by the evidence adduced at the trial in open court. In short, the showing made upon the hearing of the motion for a new trial merely developed the fact that the unauthorized evidence received out of court was in effect but a reproduction of certain particular evidence previously adduced in court. No affirmative showing was made in the affidavits or by the testimony received upon the hearing of the motion for a new trial that the two jurors in question had seen or heard at the place of the homicide anything different from or contradictory of the evidence adduced at the trial; or that their unauthorized inspection of such place had resulted in an understanding of the evidence in the case concerning the relative situation of the parties and witnesses to the homicide, or any other fact in the case, which was in any wise different from that conveyed to them by the testimony of sworn witnesses and the details of the scene of the crime as depicted upon the diagram already in evidence at the trial.

This being so, it cannot be fairly said that the showing made in support of the motion for a new trial would have warranted the court below in finding that the visit of the two jurors to the scene of the homicide resulted in substantial injury to the defendant. That such visit was an irregularity amounting to serious misconduct must be conceded; but such misconduct is not per se sufficient to warrant the granting of a new trial. Prejudice must be shown to have followed; and, in the absence of an affirmative showing of resultant injury to the defendant in the present case, the verdict must stand. People v. Hope, 62 Cal. 291; People v. White, 20 Cal. App. 156, 128 Pac. 417; People v. Kramer, 117 Cal. 647, 49 Pac. 842; State v. Perry, 121 N. C. 533, 27 S. E. 997, 61 Am. St. Rep. 683; State v. 1. DAMAGES (§ 5*)—"GENERAL DAMAGES."

General damages are those which necessarily and by implication of law result from the act or default complained of; or, otherwise stated, are those which involve the loss which naturally flows from and is presumed from the contract and its breach.

3. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 349*)—FAILURE TO CONVEY—SPECIAL DAMAGES.

The element of the measure of damages, stated by Civ. Code, § 3306, for breach of an agreement to convey real property—the expenses properly incurred in examining the title and preparing the papers—is special; so that for recovery therefor the fact that such expenses were incurred, and the amount thereof, must be alleged.

4. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 351*)—FAILURE TO CONVEY—GENERAL DAMAGES.

That the measure of damages for breach of contract to convey land is declared by statute (Civ. Code, § 3306) does not change the nature or element thereof—the price paid—from general damages to special damages.

5. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 351*)—FAILURE TO CONVEY—COMPLAINT—DAMAGES—"BAD FAITH."

There being no allegation of bad faith, none of the damages alleged by the complaint, in an action for breach of contract to convey land, are to be deemed based on bad faith, within Civ. Code, § 3306, declaring recoverable, in case of bad faith, in addition to what is otherwise recoverable, the difference between the agreed price and the value of the land.

6. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 349*)—FAILURE TO CONVEY—COMPLAINT—DEMURRER.

That the complaint, in an action for breach of contract to convey land in consideration of land conveyed, and $100 paid by plaintiff to defendant, alleging the damages suffered to be $2,000, fails to state the value of the land conveyed by plaintiff to defendant, while subject for special demurrer, does not make it open to general demurrer.

7. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 349*)—FAILURE TO CONVEY—COMPLAINT.

The complaint for breach of defendant's contract to convey land in consideration of land conveyed and money paid by plaintiff to defendant is not insufficient because failing to allege demand, and refusal thereof, for reconveyance and repayment of the land conveyed and money paid by plaintiff.

The complaint alleging that by written contract plaintiff agreed to convey land and pay $100 to defendant, and did so, and defendant agreed to convey to plaintiff certain land, but had failed to do so, and that by reason of defendant's breach of the contract, plaintiff is damaged $2,000, for which sum he prays judgment, states a good cause of action for recovery of general damages only, which, under Civ. Code, § 3306, are the price paid and interest.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank R. Willis, Judge.

Action by S. D. Moore and another against Carl D. Fredericks and another. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Cyril H. Bretherton, of Los Angeles, for appellants. A. J. Mitchell, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

SHAW, J. Action to recover damages for breach of contract whereby defendants agreed to convey real estate to plaintiffs.

Defendants appeal upon the judgment roll from a judgment by default in favor of plaintiffs, entered after the overruling of defendants' general demurrer to the complaint.

The complaint alleged the making of a written contract between the parties whereby plaintiffs agreed to convey to defendants certain real estate and to pay them $100 in cash, and defendants on their part agreed to convey to plaintiffs certain lands fully described therein; that plaintiffs on their part fully complied with the terms of the contract by paying the $100 and conveying to defendants the lands as required by the agreement; that defendants on their part made default in the performance of the contract, in that they neglected and failed to convey to plaintiffs the lands so agreed by them to be conveyed; that by reason of defendants' breach in the performance of the terms of said contract plaintiffs are damaged in the sum of $2,000, for which sum they prayed judgment.

[1-5] Appellants insist the complaint fails to state a cause of action, and hence the court erred in overruling the demurrer interposed thereto. In addition to the making of the contract and the breach thereof by defendants, as shown by the complaint, it is alleged that by reason of such breach plaintiffs have been damaged in the sum of $2,000, for which judgment is demanded. While appellants concede the sufficiency of these allegations in stating a cause of action for the recovery of general damages, they insist that any damages resulting from breach of the contract must necessarily have been special in their nature. "General damages are those which necessarily and by implication of law result from the act or default complained of." Ency. of Law, vol. 8, p. 542. Or, as said in Wallace v. Ah Sam, 71 Cal. 197, 12 Pac. 46, 60 Am. Rep. 534, they are those which "involve the loss which naturally flows from, and is presumed from, the contract and its breach." Special damages are the natural, but not necessary, result of the act complained of. Section 3306, Civil Code, which declares a rule for the measure of damages in this character of actions provides:

"The detriment caused by the breach of an agreement to convey an estate in real property, is deemed to be the price paid, and the expenses properly incurred in examining the title and preparing the necessary papers, with interest thereon; but adding thereto, in case of bad faith, the difference between the price agreed to be paid and the value of the estate agreed to be conveyed, at the time of the breach, and the expenses properly incurred in preparing to enter upon the land."

Damages due to expenses incurred in examining the title and preparing necessary papers in a given transaction and for which recovery may be had do not necessarily arise from the breach of a contract to convey real estate; hence they are special, and the fact that such expenses are incurred and the amount thereof, in order to recover therefor, must be specially pleaded. Not so, however, as to damages for failure to convey real estate where the consideration therefor has been paid. For such breach on the part of the one in default damage follows not only as the natural, but presumably necessary, result thereof. The fact that the statute prescribes a rule for ascertaining the amount of such damages in no wise changes their general character. We may indulge in the presumption that plaintiffs in drawing their pleading had in mind the statute declaring the measure of their damage. It is not alleged that any expenses were incurred in examining the title or preparing the papers; nor are there any allegations showing bad faith under which a recovery might be had for the "difference between the price agreed to be paid and the value of the estate agreed to be conveyed," and hence we cannot assume that any part of the damage alleged to have been sustained was based upon facts not alleged. The action, as stated in the complaint, was to recover the price paid, which, in this instance, was the value of plaintiffs' land so by them conveyed to defendants, plus the sum of $100 cash.

[6, 7] It is urged that the complaint fails to state how or in what manner plaintiffs have suffered damage in the sum of $2,000. In reply to which it may be said that, while the complaint, by reason of not stating the value of the land conveyed by plaintiffs, might have been subject to a special demurrer for uncertainty in this respect, none was interposed, and the defect, if such exists, is not reached by the general demurrer. The contention that the complaint is insufficient by reason of the fact that it fails to allege a demand for a reconveyance of their property and repayment of the $100 and refusal on the part of defendants so to do is without merit.

[8, 9] Our conclusion is that the complaint stated a cause of action for the recovery of general damages only, in the sum of $2,000, alleged to have resulted from defendants' breach of contract, and, since the facts alleged were not denied, it was the duty of the clerk, under the provisions of section 585, Code of Civil Procedure, upon entering default, to immediately enter judgment in accordance with the demand in the complaint.

1. PROSTITUTION (§ 4*)—PANDERING—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

On a trial for pandering, evidence held sufficient to support a conviction for an attempt to commit the crime.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Prostitution, Cent. Dig. § 4; Dec. Dig. § 4.*]

2. PROSTITUTION (§ 1*) — PANDERING — ATTEMPTS.

A person who procured for a female a room in a house of prostitution, with intent that she should occupy it for purposes of prostitution, was guilty of an attempt to commit the crime of pandering, where though she occupied such room for a short time, she refused to engage in sexual intercourse; the nature of the crime of pandering not being such as to preclude the possibility of an attempt.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Prostitution, Cent. Dig. §§ 1, 2; Dec. Dig. § 1.*]

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 44*)—ATTEMPTS—ACTS CONSTITUTING.

To constitute an attempt to commit a crime, accused's acts must go so far that they would result in the accomplishment of the crime unless frustrated by extraneous circumstances.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 51; Dec. Dig. § 44.*]

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 865*) — VERDICT — COERCING AGREEMENT.

Where, on a trial for pandering, an instruction, given after the jury had retired as to their right to find accused guilty of an attempt to commit the crime, was given in response to the jury's request for an instruction on the subject, it could not be regarded as an attempt to coerce the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 2069; Dec. Dig. § 865.*]

5. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 112*)—VENUE—OFFENSES COMMITTED PARTLY IN TWO COUNTIES.

Where accused in Los Angeles offered to arrange for the prosecutrix to stay in San Francisco in a house of prostitution, wrote the keeper of such house, and made the necessary arrangements, and assisted the prosecutrix in leaving Los Angeles, and she was met in San Francisco by such keeper and taken to such house, accused could be prosecuted for an attempt to commit the crime of pandering either in Los Angeles county or in the city and county of San Francisco under Pen. Code, § 781, providing that when the acts constituting or requisite to the consummation of an offense occur in two or more counties, the jurisdiction is in either county.

6. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 371*)—EVIDENCE—OTHER OFFENSES—SHOWING INTENT.

On a trial for pandering, evidence as to the commission of previous similar offenses by accused was admissible to show the intent with which he sent the prosecutrix to the keeper of a house of prostitution.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; William P. Lawlor, Judge.

Samuel Grubb was convicted of an attempt to commit the crime of pandering, and he appeals. Affirmed.

E. T. Barrett and Carl E. Lindsay, both of San Francisco, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Dep. Atty. Gen., for the People.

KERRIGAN, J. The defendant was charged by information with the crime of pandering, alleged to have been committed by willfully and feloniously procuring for a female person a place as an inmate of a house of prostitution. He was tried, and convicted of an attempt to commit pandering, and sentenced to 3½ years' confinement in a state prison.

[1, 2] From the record it appears that the defendant, upon learning from the prosecutrix (both of whom were at that time residing in Los Angeles) that she would like to go to San Francisco and there take up her residence, suggested to her that he could arrange for her to stay with a lady friend of his in that city, who, he said, had been his mistress, and who was at the present time there conducting a house of prostitution at 620 Jackson street. With the consent of the prosecutrix the defendant communicated with the keeper of that house, whose name was Rose Marks, and ultimately it was arranged that the prosecutrix should go to San Francisco and stay with Rose Marks for the purpose, according to the testimony of the prosecutrix, of engaging in the lodging house business. The communications passing between the defendant and Rose Marks, as narrated to the witness Wiskotchill by the defendant, are testified to by the witness as follows:

> "He said he did write a letter to this Rose Marks, asking her if she could use another girl in this house, * * * and that he received a reply from Rose Marks saying yes; that she could use another girl. He said he then answered that letter and said he would send her up."

The defendant assisted the prosecutrix in leaving Los Angeles, and she was met at San Francisco by Rose Marks, as had been previously arranged between the latter and the defendant, and was immediately escorted by her to the Jackson street resort. Upon arriving there Rose Marks assisted the prosecutrix to remove her wraps, and showed her to a room, saying, "Now this will be your room." The latter remained in that house that night four or five hours, and during that time was importuned to engage in sexual intercourse by visitors to the brothel, but refused all such importunities. About 2 o'clock that night the prosecutrix and Rose Marks left the Jackson street house and spent the remainder of the night at a hotel. The next day they returned to 620 Jackson street for a short time, and then went house hunting, apparently looking for a place where they, as partners and keepers, could conduct the business of prostitution. The record also shows that about a year prior to the circumstances giving rise to this case the defendant was in Los Angeles looking for girls for Rose Marks' house, and that upon that occasion he sent a girl to her house in San Francisco, who remained there for several months as a prostitute.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

Whatever may have been the intent and purpose of the prosecutrix in coming to San Francisco, whether, as she claimed, to keep a respectable lodging house with Rose Marks, or to engage in prostitution, it is plain that the evidence warrants the conclusion that the defendant intended that she should occupy a room in the house of Rose Marks for the latter purpose. He did all he was in a position to do to effect that end, and the realization of his purpose was only defeated by the refusal of the prosecuting witness to engage in prostitution in the room procured for her. The evidence, therefore, supports the verdict of an attempt to commit the crime charged, unless, as asserted by defendant, there is no such crime known to our law as an attempt to commit pandering.

It is not disputed by appellant that a person prosecuted for a crime may be convicted of an attempt to commit it; but it is asserted that there are some crimes the nature of which precludes the possibility of an "attempt" to commit them; that the person charged is either guilty of the completed offense or not at all, and that the offense of pandering comes within this class. As an illustration the crime of assault with intent to commit rape is cited, where the attempt to commit the rape is the assault itself. And the reason why it is not possible to commit the offense of an attempt to pander is stated by the appellant to be that the essential ingredient in this crime, as charged against the defendant, is an intention on the part of the female, for whom a room or place is procured, to occupy it for the purpose of prostitution, and that where no such intent is shown to exist, all other acts are mere preparation, and that when such intent is shown to exist, the crime is complete, and is not an attempt.

So far as the general proposition is concerned as to the impossibility of attempting to commit the offense of procuring a place for a female person as an inmate of a house of prostitution, we think it quite clear that such an attempt is possible. An illustration readily occurs to the mind. If A., being a prostitute, requests B., her friend, to procure for her a room for the purpose of prostitution in the house of C., and B. applies to C. for such room, and his request is refused, it seems quite clear that an attempt to commit the crime has been made by B., but has failed of completion by the refusal of C. to give the room. And, while the case is not so clear as the illustration given, it also seems to us that if B. procures from C. a room in the latter's house of prostitution for A., having reason to believe and with the intent that A. will occupy it for the purpose of prostitution, and C. in concert with B. introduces A. into that room for that purpose, an attempt has been made by B. to commit the crime of procuring a place for A. as an inmate of a house of prostitution, although the offense is not completed because A., for reasons totally disconnected with B., refuses to occupy the room for the purpose indicated. But for the refusal of A. to occupy the place for the purpose intended by B., B.'s offense would have been complete.

[3] To constitute the crime of an attempt to commit a crime, the acts of the defendant must go so far that they would result in the accomplishment of the crime unless frustrated by extraneous circumstances. 1 Whart. Crim. Law (10th Ed.) § 181; Clark & Marshall's Law of Crimes (2d Ed.) § 123. In the present case, the acts of the defendant would have resulted in the commission of the offense with which he was charged, but for the refusal of the prosecuting witness above indicated, and this refusal we hold to be the extraneous circumstances which prevented the completion of the crime.

These views are not in conflict with the case of People v. Matsicura, 19 Cal. App. 75, 124 Pac. 882. There the defendant was convicted of the crime of pandering, and not of an attempt; and, as the evidence there showed that the female person had not become an inmate of the house, and that a room had not even been selected for or allotted to her, the court held that the crime of pandering had not been committed. That case would be authority that the defendant here was not guilty of the completed offense, but it does not support his contention that he could not be convicted under the evidence of an attempt to commit it. On the contrary, the logical sequence of the reasoning in that case would lead to and support the conclusion arrived at in the case at bar.

[4] The defendant, as we have seen, was charged with the crime of pandering; and in the original charge to the jury no reference was made to their right to find him guilty of an attempt to commit such crime. After retiring, the jury returned into court for further instructions, and the court then instructed them on the subject of an attempt to commit the offense; and it is claimed by the defendant that the circumstances under which they were so charged amounted to an intimation by the court that it desired a conviction.

From a careful reading of the record it appears that a request for instructions as to an attempt was made by the jury, and hence it cannot be said that the trial judge, by giving them such instructions, attempted to coerce the jury.

[5] The interviews between the defendant and the prosecuting witness and some of the assistance rendered by him to her, which constituted the attempt to commit the crime charged, took place in the county of Los Angeles; and for that reason the defendant claims that the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, where the case was tried, had no jurisdiction. The crime, as we have already seen, comprised a series of acts committed, some in Los Angeles, and some in San Francisco, under which circumstances the superior court of either of said counties had jurisdiction. Pen. Code, § 781.

[6] Over the objection of the defendant testimony was admitted tending to show that about a year prior to the commission of the offense here charged, the defendant at Los Angeles procured a place for another woman as a prostitute, at 642 Jackson street in San Francisco, also kept by Rose Marks, and that he told that woman that he was in Los Angeles trying to get girls for Rose Marks, who ran a house of prostitution in San Francisco. The defendant's intent in sending the prosecuting witness to Rose Marks was an essential ingredient in the crime charged, and in fact was the only substantial, controverted point in the case. It is plain that evidence of previous similar offenses by the defendant was admissible for the purpose of showing guilty intent. People v. Arnold, 17 Cal. App. 68, 74, 118 Pac. 729. It follows, therefore, that the court committed no error in admitting this testimony.

The judgment and order denying the defendant's motion for a new trial are affirmed.

The Juvenile Court Law of 1909, as amended in 1911 (St. 1909, p. 213; St. 1911, p. 658), does not authorize an appeal from an order of the Juvenile Court providing for sending a dependent child to a school at the expense of its mother.

2. Infants (§ 19*)—Juvenile Court—Bill of Exceptions—Authentication.

Under the Juvenile Court Act of 1913 (St. 1913, p. 1304) § 30, providing relative to appeals that if the appellant questions the sufficiency of the evidence to warrant the findings, the evidence shall be incorporated in a bill of exceptions to which the opposite party may propose amendments, and which shall be settled by the judge, and that after the settlement thereof appellant shall file the original bill with the clerk of the Juvenile Court, who shall transmit it to the Appellate Court, with his certificate that it is correctly engrossed, and Code Civ. Proc. § 650, providing that, when settled, a bill of exceptions must be signed by the judge with his certificate that it is allowed and then filed with the clerk, a bill of exceptions on an appeal from the Juvenile Court could not be considered where there was nothing to show that it was ever settled, allowed, or signed by the judge who tried the case, except the clerk's certificate that it was regularly settled and allowed by the judge.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Fred H. Taft, Judge.

In the matter of Helen Fowler, a dependent person. From an order, Alice P. Fowler appeals. Appeal dismissed.

A. J. Copp, Jr., of Los Angeles, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and George Beebe, Dep. Atty. Gen., for respondent.

SHAW, J. From such record as is presented, it appears that on November 25, 1912, Alice P. Fowler filed in the superior court a petition alleging that her daughter, Helen Fowler, 13 years of age, was a dependent person within the meaning of the act of the Legislature, entitled, "An act concerning dependent and delinquent minor children," etc., approved March 8, 1909, and amended April 5, 1911.

[1, 2] At the hearing of the matter on December 1, 1913, the court made an order as follows:

"December 1. Hearing; declared dependent; continued one week; remain in Juvenile Hall until further order."

And later made the following order:

"December 8. Remain in Juvenile Hall one week."

Thereafter the court made an order as follows:

"December 15. Hearing. To go to Montecito and board and go to public school at $25 per month at mother's expense; or, if mother arranges, she may go to Miss Orton's Pasadena School at mother's expense."

The appeal prosecuted by Alice P. Fowler purports to be from this last order. The proceedings under which Helen was declared a dependent person were had and taken, as appears from a copy of the petition, pursuant to the provisions of the juvenile act of 1909, as amended in 1911. These acts contain no provision for appeal from an order of the character here involved. Section 30 of the juvenile court law of 1913 (Stats. 1913, p. 1304) provides that an appeal may be had to the District Court of Appeal, and further provides the mode and manner of authenticating the record to be reviewed. By said section it is made the duty of the judge to find the facts of the case in the form of a special finding, and in case the sufficiency of the evidence to warrant the findings is questioned, the same shall be incorporated in a bill of exceptions prepared by the appellant, and the opposite party may propose amendments to such bill, which, after settlement by the judge, shall be engrossed and a copy thereof served upon the opposite party and the Attorney General, and the original thereof, together with proof of service, filed with the clerk of the juvenile court, "who shall immediately transmit the same to the court to which the appeal is taken, with his certificate that such bill of exceptions is correctly engrossed." Section 650, Code of Civil Procedure, relating to the settlement of bills of exception, provides that when settled the bill must be signed by the judge. While in the case at bar the clerk certifies that the bill of exceptions presented is correctly engrossed, there is nothing showing that it was ever settled, allowed, or signed by the judge who tried the case. True, the clerk further certifies that it was "regularly settled and allowed by the judge," but we know of no law which permits a bill of exceptions to be authenticated merely by the clerk of the court certifying that the judge has duly settled and allowed it. Neither under the act in accordance with which the procedure purports to have been taken, nor under the act of 1913, is there any record presented authenticated in a manner which entitles appellant to a review of the question presented. It is therefore unnecessary to discuss the validity of the act of 1913. Suffice it to say that the record presented, even were it properly authenticated, fails to present any facts upon which appellant bases her contention that the law was not passed by the Legislature.

[3] While the appeal, for the reasons given, must be dismissed, it may not be improper to call attention to the fact that the order is unintelligible and uncertain in meaning to a degree that would render it difficult of enforcement, and suggest that if the law and facts warrant the court in so doing, it should make such further order or orders with reference to the care and custody of the child and payment by appellant for services rendered it, so as to remove any doubt as to the intent and meaning of the order, as well as specify the time during which it shall continue.

The appeal is dismissed.

5. PARTIES (§ 94*)—MISNOMER.

That plaintiff was only a voluntary, unincorporated association instead of a corporation as appeared by its name, was no defense to an action by plaintiff for money received by defendants for its benefit.

BURNETT, J. The action was to recover the sum of $942.61, which plaintiff alleged had been received by the defendants for the use and benefit of plaintiff. The appeal is by A. G. George alone and is from the judgment on the judgment roll. Defendant George filed an answer and cross-complaint, the first paragraph of which is as follows:

"This defendant has no information or belief sufficient to enable him to answer paragraph 1 of said complaint, and therefore denies that the Sociedade do Espirito Santo ever was or is now a corporation, or ever was organized or existing under or by virtue of, or pursuant to the laws of the State of California, or any other state."

In the second paragraph of said answer and cross-complaint is the following statement:

"This defendant has no information or belief sufficient to enable him to answer, and therefore denies that prior to the bringing of this action, or at all, the plaintiff demanded from said defendants, or any of them, the payment of said sum of $942.61."

On motion these averments were stricken out, and this action of the court and its order sustaining a demurrer to appellant's cross-complaint constitute the grounds for his contention that the judgment should be reversed.

There seems to be no merit in the appeal and extended consideration of the points made by appellant is deemed unnecessary. Indeed, we may as well adopt the succinct statement in respondent's brief as a sufficient justification of the action of the lower court. This brief, to which no reply has been made by appellant is as follows:

[1] "1. If it was error to strike out paragraph 1 of defendant George's answer, the error was without injury. The answer of the defendant Santa Clara Valley Bank contained a like denial on information and belief, and the court made its finding of fact on the issue thus raised.

[2] "2. It was not error to strike out paragraph 2 of the defendant George's answer. He had actual knowledge of whether demand had been made upon him, and his denial thereof on information and belief was an evasion of the statute. A defendant cannot deny knowledge of his own acts; nor can he deny knowledge of allegations which include personal transactions with him. In such cases a positive answer is required. 1 Ency. of Pl. & Pr. p. 813; Brown v. Scott, 25 Cal. 189, 196; Loveland v. Garner, 74 Cal. 298, 300, 15 Pac. 844; Gribble v. Col. Brew. Co., 100 Cal. 67, 34 Pac. 527.

[3, 4] "3. The demurrer to the cross-complaint was properly sustained. Defendant George did not file his cross-complaint on behalf of the members of any unincorporated association but as an individual. The prayer of his cross-complaint does not demand any relief for himself, but asks the court to order the money paid to some unincorporated association that is not a party to the action. There was therefore a defect of parties cross-defendant and a defect of parties cross-complainant.

"Said cross-complaint is uncertain for the reasons stated in paragraph 5 of plaintiff's demurrer to the cross-complaint. The sustaining of the demurrer to the cross-complaint was without injury to the defendant George for the reason that the defendant Santa Clara Valley Bank demurred to said cross-complaint and said demurrer was overruled. Answer was filed to said cross-complaint by the defendant bank, and all the issues raised by the cross-complaint were tried by the court and determined by the findings."

[5] Indeed, an examination of the record discloses the fact that the only material issue was whether said $942.61 belonged to an incorporated or to an unincorporated association known by the name of "Sociedade do Espirito Santo." But, as we may presume the identity of the thing from the identity of the name, the only serious controversy seems to have been over the question whether said society was incorporated or not. This, of course, would be no matter of defense, and if it had been it could have been settled by an examination of the public records.

At any rate, the cause was determined by the court upon its merits, and no good reason whatever has been suggested for interference with the judgment. It is therefore affirmed.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; HART, J.

PEOPLE v. McGEE. (Cr. 249.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 23, 1914. Rehearing Denied June 23, 1914.)

1. BRIBERY (§ 1*)—OFFENSES.

Accused, who was engaged by the sheriff to obtain evidence of the illegal sale of intoxicating liquors, verified a complaint charging S. with an unlawful sale. Before trial, he informed the district attorney that he would not testify unless the county paid him certain sums claimed to be due, and the district attorney said that he would be compelled to testify. Between then and the trial he accepted money from S. to absent himself from the trial. Held, that accused, though not under subpœna, was one about to be called as a witness within Pen. Code, § 138, declaring that any person who is about to be called as a witness, who receives or offers to receive a bribe to influence his testimony, or to absent himself from trial, is guilty of a felony.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bribery, Cent. Dig. §§ 2, 3; Dec. Dig. § 1.*]

2. BRIBERY (§ 6*)—OFFENSES—INDICTMENT—SUFFICIENCY.

In a prosecution for soliciting and receiving a bribe with the understanding that accused, who was about to be called as a witness, should absent himself, an indictment, alleging that accused, who was the complaining witness in a prosecution against one S. for the unlawful sale of intoxicants, knowing he was a material witness, solicited and received a bribe to influence his testimony and to absent himself from trial, is sufficient, although it did not directly aver that accused was about to be called as a witness.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bribery, Cent. Dig. §§ 5-8; Dec. Dig. § 6.*]

3. WITNESSES (§ 345*) — IMPEACHMENT — CONVICTION.

As Pen. Code, § 17, provides that when a crime, punishable by imprisonment in the state prison, is also punishable by imprisonment in the county jail or fine in the discretion of the court, it shall be deemed a misdemeanor for all purposes after judgment imposing punishment other than imprisonment in the state's prison, a conviction of assault with a deadly weapon, where accused was punished only with imprisonment in the county jail, is a misdemeanor, and so is not, under Code Civ. Proc. § 2051, limiting impeachment in that way to convictions for felony, admissible to impeach him as a witness.

4. Criminal Law (§ 1171*)—Appeal—Harmless Error.

In a criminal prosecution, where the district attorney by a series of questions brought out that accused had been convicted of an assault with a deadly weapon, although he was sentenced only to imprisonment in the county jail, and stated before the jury that he would try accused, who denied that he was ever convicted of a felony for perjury, the error is reversible, though the court rejected the record of the conviction when offered.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 3126, 3127; Dec. Dig. § 1171.*]

5. Bribery (§ 1*) — Offenses — Who are "Witnesses."

One who swore to an indictment charging an illegal sale of intoxicants is not therefore a witness, within Pen. Code, § 138, providing that any witness who receives a bribe to influence his testimony or to absent himself from trial is guilty of a felony, the term "witness" being used as defined by Code Civ. Proc. § 1878, declaring that a witness is a person whose declaration under oath is received in evidence for any purpose whether such declaration be by oral examination, deposition, or affidavit, and the complaint not being admissible in evidence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Napa County; Henry C. Gesford, Judge.

William McGee was convicted of crime, and he appeals. Reversed and remanded.

C. N. Riggins, of Napa, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

BURNETT, J. The defendant was employed by the sheriff of Napa county, about the 1st of September, 1913, to obtain evidence against one Mary Salowsky for selling liquor without a license, contrary to a certain ordinance. Under this employment he visited the place in question, and on September 11, 1913, he swore to a complaint in the justice court of St. Helena township, charging said Salowsky with a violation of said ordinance. She was arrested and her case was set for trial for September 23, following. By consent it was continued till October 3d and thereafter was reset for October 14th at 9:30 a. m. On Sunday, October 12th, two days before said trial was to be had, defendant visited the house conducted by said Mary Salowsky and, according to the testimony of the people's witnesses, the following occurred: McGee said he wanted to have "a little talk" with her, and in response to her inquiry, "What is it?" he stated that he was the prosecuting witness in her case, that it was "a pretty strong case," and:

> "How would that be? I will drop that case against you. The county owes me so much money, and, if you will let me have this money that the county owes me, I would go away and quit and leave the state, and of course I can't go on nothing, I have to have some money."

Mary Salowsky replied:

> "This is kind of unexpected to me, but of course I can give you no deciding answer tonight. I have to think the matter over."

He replied, "You know very well the case comes up Tuesday." It was then agreed that she should call him up the next day at the Brooklyn Hotel in Napa and give him a definite answer. Defendant, however, remained in St. Helena, and on Monday he so telephoned to her, and he agreed to be at her house at 4 o'clock on that day. Mrs. Salowsky informed the officers and her attorney of defendant's proposition, and in the afternoon Officers Cook and Dockery went to the house and the matter was talked over, the sum of $90 obtained and marked and delivered into the custody of Mary Salowsky, when the defendant appeared approaching the house. The officers concealed themselves so as to hear and observe what occurred. The following conversation took place between McGee and Mrs. Salowsky:

> Mrs. Salowsky: "How much money was it you wanted? I did not understand you whether it was $19 or $90." Mr. McGee: "Ninety dollars." Mrs. Salowsky: "Don't you think that is a little too much?" Mr. McGee: "No, if you hire an attorney it will cost you probably that much for an attorney, and if you get convicted, why it would probably be a heavy fine." Mrs. Salowsky: "Well, how about Wilson then?" Mr. McGee: "I have got that all fixed with Wilson." Mrs. Salowsky: "How about Maloney?" Mr. McGee: "He doesn't know anything at all; for the $90 I will beat it. Your case comes up to-morrow, and for the $90 I will beat it out, and you will be acquitted because the prosecuting witness won't be there." Mrs. Salowsky: "All right." She then gave him the money, and he said: "This is what I call a square deal." The woman then said: "Sit still. I will bring you a drink."

Immediately thereafter the officers appeared and placed the defendant under arrest.

[1] It is the claim of respondent that by this and some other evidence hereafter to be noticed the case is clearly brought within the inhibition of section 138 of the Penal Code, which provides that:

> "Every person who is a witness, or is about to be called as such, who receives, or offers to receive, any bribe, upon any understanding that his testimony shall be influenced thereby, or that he will absent himself from the trial or proceeding upon which his testimony is required, is guilty of a felony."

Every fact constituting a constituent element of said offense was sufficiently established by the evidence for the people. That he offered to receive and did receive a bribe upon the understanding that he would absent himself from the trial of Mrs. Salowsky appears as plain as language can make it.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

The only other considerations in this connection are: Was defendant a witness in the case against Mrs. Salowsky, or was he about to be called as such?

> "A witness is a person whose declaration under oath is received as evidence for any purpose, whether such declaration be made on oral examination, or by deposition or affidavit." Section 1878, Code Civ. Proc.

If we concede the point made by appellant that on the said 12th day of October he was not a witness in the sense of the statute, it can be of no avail, for the reason that it was shown that he was "about to be called as a witness" in the case. This is a fair deduction from the following circumstances: He was employed by the officers to secure evidence against Salowsky, and he did secure it. He swore to the complaint charging her with the crime. He declared to her that the case was set for trial for Tuesday and, in effect, that he expected to be a witness and was ready to testify against her. The sheriff testified that at the time of the arrest of Mrs. Salowsky he told McGee that the latter would be wanted as a witness in the case, and the district attorney testified that on Saturday, October 11th, he had a conversation with defendant in which he told the latter that the case was set for the 14th and instructed him to be present to testify as a witness, that McGee stated that he would not come unless the county paid him what was due, and the district attorney replied that he would find a way to make him attend. It is of no consequence that he was not thereafter subpœnaed or that the trial of Mrs. Salowsky was again continued. This resulted from the conduct of defendant in relation to the bribe. It is manifest that the intention was to proceed with the trial and compel McGee to attend and be a witness; but the commission of the greater offense by appellant interfered with the plan in reference to the trial of Mrs. Salowsky. It may be remarked that the district attorney, until the time of defendant's refusal to attend, had a right to expect that McGee would be present at the trial, if not subpœnaed.

We think it a reasonable inference from the evidence that at the time defendant solicited the bribe he was "about to be called as a witness" in the Salowsky case in the sense in which that expression is used in said statute.

[2] The point is made that the indictment does not sufficiently set forth said offense, but as to this we think appellant is in error. Therein it is definitely averred with the time and place that:

> The defendant "did willfully, unlawfully, corruptly, and feloniously offer to receive and did receive a certain bribe in the sum of $90 from one Mary Salowsky upon the express understanding and agreement with the said Mary Salowsky that he, the said Wm. McGee, would be influenced in his testimony thereby and would absent himself as a witness from a certain trial and proceeding wherein said Mary Salowsky was defendant and wherein said Wm. McGee was complaining witness, said case or proceeding being entitled 'In the Justice's Court of St. Helena Township, County of Napa, State of California. The People of the State of California, Plaintiff, v. Mary Salowsky, Defendant, Complaint, Criminal.' Said complaint was then and there filed in the said justice's court of St. Helena township, on the 11th day of September, 1913. The said Wm. McGee then and there well knowing that he was a material witness for the people of the state of California, and that he would be called as such in said above-entitled trial and proceeding."

The only possible objection of any moment to the indictment is that there is no direct averment that defendant, at the time of the alleged offense, was a witness or was about to be called as a witness in the trial of said Mary Salowsky. However, that he was about to be called as a witness is a necessary inference from the allegations that appear in the indictment, and it is entirely manifest from the evidence that appellant was not prejudiced by any want of certainty in that respect.

[3, 4] Probably the most serious question in the case arises from the alleged misconduct of the district attorney. After the first witness for the people was called, the record shows the following:

> "Mr. Coombs: I would like, if the court please, to ascertain if the defendant has pleaded under his true name. Mr. Riggins: He has so pleaded. The Court: I won't go into it any further. Mr. Coombs: I want to find out if he has pleaded in his true name. He could plead otherwise if he wanted. Mr. Riggins: I take an exception to the statement and remark of the district attorney and assign it as misconduct. The Court: I instruct you, gentlemen of the jury, of course you are to pay no attention as to what passes between the court and counsel. You are deaf whenever that occurs."

Again, when the defendant was called in his own behalf, the following occurred:

> "Mr. Riggins: Q. Mr. McGee, did you know Mr. Wilson? A. I do. Q. You know Mr. Kelton, the sheriff of this county? A. Yes, I do. Mr. Coombs: I object to any further line of questions until Mr. Riggins qualifies the witness. He has not asked him his name, if the court please. Mr. Riggins: I will do so if the court wants it. The Court: He may not have any name and he may. Mr Riggins: He has given his name as William McGee. Mr. Coombs: He never has given his name under oath. Mr. Riggins: We object to the remark of the district attorney. The Court: You can ask him about it. That is a matter of cross-examination."

The record shows the following proceedings on the cross-examination of the defendant:

> "Mr. Coombs: I will ask you, Mr. McGee, if you were not convicted of the crime of felony in the city and county of San Francisco on the 3d day of September in the year 1909? A. No, sir. Q. At that time you were convicted of a felony under the name of Patrick McGee? A. I was never convicted of a felony in my life. Q. I will ask you if you were ever tried in the city and county of San Francisco of the crime of assault with a deadly weapon? Mr. Riggins: Object to the question as incompetent, irrelevant, immaterial; and we take an exception to the asking of the question by the district attorney and assign it as misconduct. The Court: Yes. Mr. Coombs: If your honor please, the witness has denied this. I want to lay the foundation now to show that the witness at that time was convicted of a felony under the name of Patrick McGee, and that Patrick McGee and the defendant in this case are one and the same person. The Court: Ask him if he was convicted of a felony under the name of Patrick McGee. Mr. Coombs: Yes. The Court: You asked him that, and he said, 'No.' If you want to impeach that statement, you ought to know how to do it. You can ask him the nature of the offense. The objection will be sustained."

Again, when Sophie Catherine McGee was called by the people in rebuttal, the following occurred:

"Mr. Coombs: Your name is Sophie McGee? A. Yes, sir. Mr. Coombs: You were formerly the wife of the defendant in this case, were you not? A. Yes, sir. Q. You recognize him, do you? A. Yes, sir. Q. What is his correct name, if you know? A. William McGee. Q. Has he any other name? Mr. Riggins: Objected to upon the grounds incompetent, irrelevant, immaterial, not rebuttal, assign the asking of the question as misconduct of the district attorney and note an exception thereto. The Court: Overruled. A. Well, he has a nickname. Q. What is it? A. Patrick. Q. I will ask you, Mrs. McGee, if you know whether or not William McGee, the defendant in this case, whose nickname was Patrick McGee, was ever convicted of a felony in the state of California? Mr. Riggins: Object to the question as irrelevant, incompetent, immaterial, not the best evidence, and further specify the asking of the questions as misconduct and take an exception thereto. The Court: Oh, that is nonsense. Mr. Riggins: I do take an exception. If the defendant was convicted of a felony and he has the judgment roll, the introduction of the judgment roll is the evidence, and the asking of all these questions is simply for the purpose of prejudicing the jury. Mr. Coombs: That is just what we are asking these questions for, to introduce the judgment roll, if your honor please. The Court: You have proven now that his nickname is Patrick McGee. Mr. Coombs: Patrick McGee. The Court: Very well. I will sustain the objection to the question as to whether he has ever been convicted of a felony because the record is the best evidence. Mr. Riggins is right about that. What I meant a moment ago was assigning all these matters as misconduct on the part of the district attorney. Mr. Coombs: That is ridiculous. The Court: It is taking up the time of the court. Mr. Riggins: I do assign it and take exception. The Court: I do not think it is the right way to practice law."

After some further discussion the district attorney said:

"I offer at this time a document entitled on the cover 'Number 2221,' Superior Court, State of California, in and for the city and county of San Francisco, Department No. 12, The People of the State of California v. Patrick McGee. Judgment, Filed this 8th day of December, A. D. 1909. H. I. Mulcrevy, Clerk. By Lawrence Buckley, Deputy Clerk."

An objection was made, the document was handed to the court, and the district attorney said, "I will try him for perjury when I get through here, too." The court then asked the district attorney if he had looked at this copy of the judgment roll and the district attorney replied:

"It is proper evidence. It is a felony. The judgment states that. I call your honor's attention to it."

The court sustained the objection to the evidence. The offered record showed that McGee was convicted of an assault with a deadly weapon and sentenced to the county jail. The offense was thereafter to be deemed for all purposes a misdemeanor. Section 17, Pen. Code. The record was therefore clearly inadmissible, as the statute limits impeachment in that manner to the judgment of conviction of a felony. Section 2051, Code Civ. Proc.

But as far as any effect upon the jury is concerned, the record might as well have been admitted. In fact, from the course of procedure as narrated above several exceedingly hurtful impressions must have been created in the minds of the jurors, among them, that the defendant was trying to conceal his identity, that he had been convicted of an assault with a deadly weapon, that he had committed perjury in denying that he had been convicted of a felony, and that his counsel was not acting in good faith in interposing his objections, but was really trifling with the court.

In view of the foregoing untoward incidents, it would seem to be an injustice to the defendant to allow the conviction to stand. We may assume that the district attorney was not guilty of intentional misconduct, but the prejudicial effect of the course pursued was not ameliorated by that circumstance. Indeed, having confidence, as no doubt they had, in his good faith, the jurors would be more strongly influenced against the defendant than if they believed the district attorney were attempting to take an unfair advantage of the one on trial. We think a fundamental and essential right of appellant was invaded and that in all probability the error affected the verdict. People v. Derwae, 155 Cal. 592, 102 Pac. 266; People v. Fleming, 136 Pac. 291; People v. Tufts, 139 Pac. 78.

While the evidence, as before stated, is sufficient to support the verdict, yet the peculiar facts of the case demand a new and fair trial according to the established rules of juridical procedure.

[5] In contemplation of another trial, it is deemed proper to indicate more specifically what we understand to be the true theory upon which the prosecution must rest. We may approach it by setting out the following instruction proposed by defendant:

"I instruct you that the offense defined by section 138 of the Penal Code, under which this indictment is found, is not committed by a complaining witness receiving or offering to receive a bribe after he has sworn to the complaint and the same has been filed unless he is also a witness or about to be called as a witness at the trial of the case, and you cannot find the defendant to have been a witness as charged in the indictment from the fact that he swore to the complaint in the justice court against Mary Salowsky, unless you also find that at the time of the alleged bribery he was a witness or about to be called as a witness at the trial of the case."

This instruction should have been given. To constitute the offense covered by said section 138 of the Penal Code, the party charged must, at the time the offense is alleged to have been committed, either be a "witness" or "about to be called as a witness." The term "witness" is undoubtedly used in the sense defined by the statute. Indeed, the said section 138 was so construed by the court in giving the definition of the term "witness" that is found in said section 1878 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The defendant was not at that time a witness as thus defined. It is true he had sworn to a complaint, but that was not to be used as "evidence" at the trial. It had performed its function as a basis for the warrant of arrest, and it did not reach forward and constitute defendant a witness at the time he is alleged to have received a bribe from said Salowsky. There was some reason for believing that the jurors might conclude that he was a witness for the reason that he had sworn to the complaint, and therefore it was important that they be instructed as indicated. The people's case must rest, therefore, upon the other contingency, that defendant was about to be called as a witness, as there was no evidence that he was at the time actually a witness in the cause. Defendant was indicted and tried for a peculiar statutory offense, and, of course, the evidence must measure up to the standard prescribed by the statute. The crime is not the common-law offense of obstructing justice. This is provided for in section 136 of the Penal Code. Many of the cases cited apply to such an offense, but are not controlling here.

We think the judgment and order denying the motion for a new trial should be reversed, and it is so ordered.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; HART, J.

SMYTH v. TENNISON. (Civ. 1500.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. May 19, 1914.)

1. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 323*) — CROPPING AGREEMENTS—CONTRACT OF EMPLOYMENT—RIGHTS GIVEN.

The contract by which defendant was to mature a crop on plaintiff's land, and plaintiff was to give him one-fourth of the crop for doing it, is one of employment, and does not create the relation of landlord and tenant, or in any way transfer to defendant right of possession to any part of the grain when threshed.

2. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 331*) — CROPPING AGREEMENTS—BREACH OF CONTRACT—REMEDY.

For refusal of plaintiff to give, as agreed, to defendant, for maturing a crop, one-fourth of the grain, defendant's remedy is by action for breach of contract; and his surreptitious taking of that part of the grain gives him no right of possession.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Landlord and Tenant, Cent. Dig. §§ 1360–1362, 1379–1387; Dec. Dig. § 331.*]

3. CONTRACTS (§ 176*)—NEW TRIAL (§ 66*)—ERROR OF JURY—INTERPRETING ORAL CONTRACT.

While the interpretation of an oral contract is, in the first instance, for the jury, their interpretation being clearly erroneous, the trial court should, on application, set aside the verdict and grant a new trial.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; Franklin J. Cole, Judge.

Action by A. L. Smyth against W. F. Tennison. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a motion for new trial, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Frank Birkhauser, of El Centro, for appellant. A. L. Sebille, of Brawley, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Action in claim and delivery. It appears that plaintiff was the owner, and in possession of a piece of land upon which he had grown a crop of milo maize. About August 1, 1912, as shown by the testimony of defendant, he and plaintiff entered into an oral agreement whereby plaintiff employed defendant to perform the labor in cultivating and bringing the crop of grain to maturity.

> "The agreement between us," says defendant, "was that he would give me one-fourth of the crop for maturing it from that time on, and he would guarantee me $500 out of the job. I went to work under those conditions. * * * I quit about the 15th of January. That crop consisted of about 2,000 sacks, according to the threshers' tally. * * * Mr. Smyth was to pay all the bills and give me one-fourth of the crop."

It further appears that defendant performed labor in the cultivation of the crop until the same was matured, and that about December 1st plaintiff, at his own expense, had it harvested, threshed, put into sacks, and stacked or piled up upon his land; that on the night of January 15th, without plaintiff's knowledge or consent, defendant, using plaintiff's team of mules therefor, took and hauled away to a place which he had rented, 500 sacks of the grain. Whereupon plaintiff instituted this action whereby he recovered possession of the property so taken by defendant and sold the same. The case was tried before a jury which found the value of the property replevined by plaintiff to be $562.50, and rendered a verdict in favor of defendant. Judgment followed, from which, and an order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals.

[1-3] Among other grounds upon which the motion for a new trial is based is insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict. It conclusively appears that plaintiff at all times was the owner and in possession and control of the land upon which the crop was planted and grown, and it must follow, in the absence of some act whereby he transferred his right, that he was the owner and entitled to possession of the crop so grown upon the land after its severance from the soil. Encyc. Law, p. 486; Halleck v. Mixer, 16 Cal. 574; Kimball v. Lohmas, 31 Cal. 154. As showing such transfer of right, defendant relies solely and alone upon the alleged agreement, the existence of which is denied by plaintiff. Conceding, as we must, the making of the contract as claimed by defendant, it does not purport to be other than a contract for the employment of defendant. It cannot be construed as creating the relation of landlord and tenant between the parties, nor as transferring the right of possession to the grain. At no time until surreptitiously asported, for the reason, as stated by defendant, "I thought he (plaintiff) might sell them (the sacks) before giving me my share," did defendant have possession of the grain. In thus gaining possession he was a trespasser and obtained no rights by such wrongful taking. Defendant's remedy, in case plaintiff refused to comply with the agreement and give him one-fourth of the grain for the labor performed, was an action upon the contract for a breach thereof, rather than the peculiar proceeding adopted for the enforcement of his rights. It is true, since the contract was oral, its interpretation in the first instance was a question of fact to be determined by the jury; but, since such interpretation was clearly erroneous, it became the duty of the trial court, upon application therefor, to set the verdict aside and grant the motion for a new trial. Our conclusion renders it unnecessary to discuss the alleged misconduct of the jury assigned as another ground in support of the motion.

The judgment and order appealed from are reversed.

TAYLOR v. SANSON et al. (Civ. 1461.)

1. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 87*)—POWERS—COMPROMISE OF CLAIMS.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1588, authorizing an executor to compromise a claim when for the best interest of the estate, an executor may compromise with a debtor without first obtaining authority from the probate court, and the compromise must be approved if the facts establish at least prima facie that the executor acted for the best interests of the estate, and that the debtor was then or about to become insolvent.

2. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 87*)—POWERS—COMPROMISE OF CLAIMS.

Where attorneys, collecting a judgment for $901.75 for a client, since deceased, under contract entitling them to retain the reasonable value of their services, transmitted to the client's executrix a check for $114.75, retaining the balance, the act of the executrix in appropriating the check and receipting therefor did not prevent her from subsequently suing the attorneys to recover the balance of the judgment, minus the reasonable value of the services of the attorneys, in the absence of anything to show insolvency of the attorneys or probability that the estate could not collect a greater amount than was first paid.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Gavin W. Craig, Judge.

Action by Emily Sophia Taylor, as executrix of Thomas Edwin Wright, deceased, against Thomas A. Sanson and another. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed, with directions to amend conclusions of law and enter judgment in accordance therewith.

Shaw & Stewart, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Duke Stone, W. F. Palmer, and J. W. Hocker, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

JAMES, J. This action was brought by plaintiff, as executrix of the estate of Thomas Edwin Wright, deceased, to recover the sum of $600 alleged to have been collected by the defendants as money belonging to the estate of plaintiff's testator, and for the use and benefit of said estate. By the answer of the defendants it was set up that they as attorneys at law had, under an express employment therefor, performed legal services for and on behalf of decedent, which included the collection of money on a judgment, amounting to $901.75; that out of this money they were entitled to retain the reasonable value of their services, after deducting which it was alleged, they forwarded a check for the difference to the executrix, who accepted the same in full satisfaction of all claims of the estate against the defendants. The appeal is taken from a judgment entered in favor of defendants, and is presented on the judgment roll alone.

The findings of fact set forth the details of the employment by decedent of the defendants in their capacity as attorneys at law and the collection of the money on the judgment in the amount of $901.75, and determined that defendants held a lien upon the amount so collected for the reasonable value of their services, which reasonable value is found by the court to be the sum of $595. It further appears from the findings that the defendants retained $800 of the $901.75, claiming that the services rendered were worth that amount, and that they did forward a check for the difference, which amounted to $114.75, to the executrix, with a statement in writing reciting in effect that the check was delivered in settlement of the claim and account of the estate against the defendants. It further appears by the findings that the executrix received the check and cashed the same and appropriated the proceeds thereof, but before cashing the check or appropriating the proceeds she stated to the defendants that she would not accept the check in full settlement of all claims of said estate against the defendants. Further finding is made that the receiving of the check and the cashing of the same and appropriating the proceeds thereof by the executrix was at no time approved by the superior court. The court concludes that there was an accord and satisfaction, and that the cashing of the check and the appropriating of the proceeds thereof by the executrix bound the estate in compromise of its claim against the defendants, which claim was determined by the court to be the sum of $595 only. After receiving and cashing the check mentioned, the executrix commenced this action to recover what she claimed was due and owing to the estate as a sum in addition to that received by her as represented by the check.

[1] The question is presented as to whether, under the facts narrated, an executrix or administrator of the estate of a deceased person has power to bind the estate by compromise of a claim such as that shown by the evidence in this case. If the executrix could have by express agreement discharged the defendants from the payment of all further amounts over the $114.75, then it may be said that her actions as shown respecting this claim would constructively amount to such an agreement. Lapp-Gifford Co. v. Muscoy Water Co., 134 Pac. 989. At common law the power and control of an administrator over the property, especially the personal effects, of a decedent was almost absolute. The rules of common law, however, as affecting this subject have been considerably modified by statutes. In our state it is provided that the property in all assets of a decedent passes not as under the common law to the administrator, but to the heirs of the decedent. Civ. Code, § 1384. In the Code of Civil Procedure the power and authority of an administrator or executor are generally covered by specific provisions of the statutes. Upon the subject of the right of an executor to compromise with debtors of an estate, section 1588, Code of Civil Procedure, provides as follows:

> "Whenever a debtor of the decedent is unable to pay all his debts, the executor or administrator, with the approbation of the court or a judge thereof, may compound with him and give him a discharge, upon receiving a fair and just dividend of his effects. A compromise may also be authorized when it appears to be just, and for the best interests of the estate."

It has been held under this section that an executor was not required to first obtain authority from the probate court to compromise with a debtor, but that he might do so without such precedent authorization, provided the compromise was for the best interests of the estate, which action on the executor's part must be afterwards approved by the probate court. Moulton v. Holmes, 57 Cal. 337. Where the facts reasonably establish that the executor, in compromising a claim, acted in good faith under facts which reasonably indicate that the best interests of the estate will be subserved, the probate court would not be authorized in withholding its approval of the act of the executor. However, such facts must be shown as will establish, prima facie at least, that the executor has acted for the best interests of the estate which he represents. In cases where a compromise is made with a debtor, a reasonable showing that such debtor was then or about to become insolvent, or that in all reasonable probability the debt could not be collected by suit, would undoubtedly justify the making of the compromise. It has been held that an executor has no authority to discharge a judgment for a sum less than the amount for which it was rendered. Deland v. Hiett, 27 Cal. 611, 87 Am. Dec. 102; Siddall v. Clark, 89 Cal. 321, 26 Pac. 829. A leading case in which the question of the powers of executors and administrators with respect to the control of the property of the estate are quite exhaustively treated of is that of Maddock v. Russell et al., 109 Cal. 417, 42 Pac. 139.

[2] It must be presumed that a person dealing with an executor or administrator as such is aware of the limitations and conditions affecting the power of such representative of the estate. Applying that presumption to the facts of this case, it must then be assumed that the defendants were aware that the executrix could not compromise with them as to the amount claimed by the estate, and that if she did so her action was conditional upon an approval by the probate court, which approval would be conditional also on it being made to appear that the action of compromise was for the best interests of the estate. None of the features of insolvency of the debtors, or of the probability that the estate could not collect a greater amount than that paid, was shown by the findings to have existed. The executrix, under the facts as determined by the trial judge, was without authority to compromise the claim, and the action brought by her on behalf of the estate to collect an additional amount could be maintained, notwithstanding the receipt and appropriation by her of the check for $114.75. The findings perhaps, as suggested by respondents, might have been made more complete, and have presented more succinctly the ultimate facts which the court was called upon to resolve; but sufficient facts are determined to show that the conclusion of law as drawn therefrom by the court is erroneous.

No question is made as to the right of defendants to withhold the reasonable value of their services and deduct the same from the amount of money collected on the judgment, without presenting a claim against the estate for approval in the usual way.

The judgment is reversed, with direction to the trial court to amend its conclusions of law, and to enter judgment in favor of the plaintiff in accordance with the facts as found consistent with the conclusions expressed in this opinion.

PEOPLE v. BONZANI. Cr. 251.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 23, 1914.)

1. RAPE (§ 51*)—NONCONSENT—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

Evidence, in a rape case, held sufficient to justify a conviction on the ground of nonconsent; the testimony of prosecutrix not being on its face intrinsically incredible and wholly unworthy of belief.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Rape, Cent. Dig. §§ 71–77; Dec. Dig. § 51.*]

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1159*)—REVIEW—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

Under Const. art. 6, § 4, declaring that Courts of Appeal shall exercise, "on questions of law alone," appellate jurisdiction in criminal cases, unless the evidence on which a verdict of guilty is based is, on its face, incredible or inherently improbable, being otherwise sufficient to support the verdict, there cannot be a reversal of the judgment, or of an order refusing a new trial, on the ground that the evidence does not support the verdict.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law; Cent. Dig. §§ 3074–3083; Dec. Dig. § 1159.*]

3. RAPE (§ 57*)—INCONSISTENT STATEMENTS BY PROSECUTRIX—QUESTIONS FOR JURY.

There being testimony of extrajudicial statements of prosecutrix in rape appearing inconsistent with the theory of force, it is for the jury to say whether such testimony is truthful, whether, if made, the statements are actually inconsistent with her testimony, and, if inconsistent, whether they are to be accepted in place of her testimony, or in impeachment of it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Rape, Cent. Dig. § 87; Dec. Dig. § 57.*]

4. RAPE (§ 54*)—CORROBORATION—NECESSITY.

It is not necessary for conviction of rape that prosecutrix be corroborated.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Rape, Cent. Dig. §§ 83, 84; Dec. Dig. § 54.*]

5. RAPE (§ 57*)—CORROBORATION—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Whether subsequent acts and condition of prosecutrix in rape corroborated her on the question of nonconsent and force held a question for the jury.

6. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1144*) — APPEAL — PRESUMPTION IN FAVOR OF VERDICT — REMARK OF JURORS.

Whatever may have been meant by one of the jurors when, they having returned for further instruction, he, on asking what the penalty would be in case of conviction, said he thought "defendant was guilty to a certain extent," it cannot affect the presumption that the verdict of guilty was arrived at only on a fair and impartial consideration of the evidence under the rules of law as charged.

7. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1134*)—NEW TRIAL—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—DOUBT OF TRIAL JUDGE.

The remark of the judge, when pronouncing judgment on the verdict, that he "had some little question about the technical violation of the law" is not to be considered as showing he had an unequivocal opinion that the verdict was not justified; having which it was his duty to grant a new trial.

8. RAPE (§ 51*) — RELATION OF PROSECUTRIX AND DEFENDANT—EVIDENCE.

The burden of the people, in a rape case, of showing the female was not the wife of defendant is sufficiently discharged by the fact that she had known him only about two weeks, that their names were different, and that he testified he was a married man, and that his wife was in Italy.

Appeal from Superior Court, Stanislaus County; L. W. Fulkerth, Judge.

Antone Bonzani was convicted of rape, and appeals. Affirmed.

G. A. Whitehurst, of Newman, and A. J. Carlson, of Modesto, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HART, J. The defendant was informed against by the district attorney of Stanislaus county for the crime of rape, and upon his trial was by the jury adjudged guilty of said crime. This appeal is by the defendant from the judgment.

The principal point upon which a reversal of the judgment is urged is that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict.

The alleged crime was committed on a ranch situated about a mile north of Crow's Landing, in Stanislaus county, on the 20th day of August, 1913. The prosecutrix, or the female with and upon whom the crime charged is alleged to have been perpetrated, is one Mrs. Bell de Bell. At the time of the commission of the alleged crime, she was about 50 years of age, and was of unusual corpulency, weighing, as she testified, about 220 pounds.

The defendant is an Italian, and, at the time of the occurrence which is the foundation of the charge in the information, was able to speak the English language only to a very limited extent, yet, when essaying a conversation in that language, he was generally able, by means of signs and gesticulations suitable to thoughts which he desired to express or convey, to make himself understood with reasonable facility and clearness.

The ranch at which the alleged crime was committed was owned by the "Paul Crow Stock Company," presumably a corporation, and it was used for the purpose of a dairy business. The first husband of the prosecutrix was named Crow, and she was the mother of two children—one, a son, who had attained manhood's estate, and a married daughter, a Mrs. Larkins. The son of the prosecutrix was in immediate control of the ranch and the dairy business thereon conducted; but, at the time of the commission of the crime charged against the defendant, he was absent from home, and Mrs. de Bell was temporarily in charge. Mrs. Larkins did not reside on the ranch. Mrs. de Bell's usual and principal occupation was that of cooking for persons employed on the ranch.

The defendant, it appears, entered into the employment of the company, at said ranch, on the 1st day of August, 1913, and his duties were to milk about 30 head of cows, separate the cream, and feed the hogs and calves. Thus, as is apparent, he was employed for 19 days prior to the day upon which he is alleged to have committed the crime charged in the information.

The defendant and the prosecutrix were alone on the ranch when the crime charged was committed, and were consequently the only immediate witnesses thereto. It is therefore manifest that the jury, in reaching the conclusion represented by their verdict, were mainly influenced by the testimony of the prosecutrix.

The defendant admitted, not only upon the witness stand at the trial, but at the time of his arrest, that he had had sexual relations with Mrs. de Bell on the day named in the information, but insisted that such relations were sustained with her consent. On the other hand, the prosecutrix at all times declared that the defendant accomplished the act of sexual intercourse with her by means of force and violence, and against her will and consent; that, without avail, she resisted him with all the physical force of which she was capable.

Her story, as given at the trial, is, in substance, as follows: That, on the 15th day of August, 1913, after supper had been partaken of, she went out on the porch of her house. There were then no other persons at the ranch but the defendant and herself; her son having left the ranch earlier in the day. While she was sitting on the porch, the defendant approached her and attempted to take liberties with her, taking hold of her knee and hand. She vigorously protested against these liberties, saying to him, "Will you please keep your hands off me?" whereat he bade her "good-night" and departed for the "bunk" in which he slept. This conduct on the part of the defendant inspired the prosecutrix with fear of him, and on the following night (Saturday) she went to a neighbor's house and there remained until early the next morning, when she returned to her home and prepared breakfast for the defendant. On that evening—Sunday, August 17th—while she was standing on the porch, the defendant repeated his previous conduct toward her and caught hold of her arm. She then said to him: "Take your hands off me; * * * don't you put your hands on me again. I am here alone, and I want you to be a gentleman, and I am a lady, and want to be treated as such." The defendant then released his hold on the prosecutrix and stepped back, at the same time remarking, "You a strong woman," to which she replied, "Don't put your hands on me again," whereupon he left for his sleeping apartment.

On the 20th day of August the defendant and the prosecutrix ate supper together between the hours of 7 and 8 o'clock p. m. After they had finished supper, the defendant remained in the dining room; but the prosecutrix stepped out on the porch. She shortly returned to the dining room, and, after going in and out of the house several times, she handed the defendant a cigar, after which, while she was standing near the door leading to the porch, the former grabbed her by the arm and attempted to force her further into the house. She resisted him with all her physical power and succeeded in getting out on the porch; he still clinging to her. She begged him to cease his hold upon her, and to let her alone; but he still clung to her, finally catching her by the shoulders and throat and throwing her upon a couch, which was then on the porch, and upon which the prosecutrix had occasionally slept. Thus getting her down on the couch, the defendant held her by the throat with one hand and attempted to raise her clothes with the other. He threw his body upon hers, and, after considerable wrestling between the two, he arose and, while holding her down with one foot, disrobed himself, after which he renewed his efforts to force sexual connection with her, and finally succeeded. She testified that he inserted his privates into hers, but said that the penetration did not extend beyond an inch. After accomplishing sexual relations with the prosecutrix, the defendant left the house and repaired to his "bunk." Shortly thereafter Mrs. de Bell left the premises and started to go to the home of a neighbor, one Ora Munson, whose house is situated about one mile distant from her own home. She testified that during all the time that the defendant was engaged in prosecuting his assault upon her she was convinced, from the appearance of his face, that he was determined to accomplish his purpose at any cost; that consequently she labored under the fear that he might inflict upon her great bodily injury, if, indeed, he did not take her life. She declared that he choked her and held onto her arm with such tenacity and violence as to cause bruises thereon, and that the bruises so caused did not entirely disappear until shortly before the trial. As soon after the assault as it was practicable for her to do so, she caused word to be conveyed to her son and daughter, by telegraph, that she desired their presence at the ranch at once.

The witness Munson, to whose home the prosecutrix started immediately after she was assaulted, testified that, at about 11 o'clock of the night of the 20th of August, he was awakened by the scream of a woman, and that he thereupon and immediately arose from his bed, went outside the house, and listened. The sound of the voice seemed to come from the direction of Mrs. de Bell's house, and Munson hurriedly dressed and ran across his field in that direction and met the prosecutrix walking through said field. She was then approximately an eighth of a mile from the witness' house.

> "She was in a very exhausted and excited state," said Munson. "In fact," he continued, "she swooned down to the ground when I met her, and she lay on the ground a minute or two before I could help her up. I assisted her to my house and let her rest awhile and put her in my car and drove to Crow's Landing, to the hotel, and summoned Mrs. Oswald, in whose charge I left her."

Mrs. Alice Oswald, proprietress of the hotel at Crow's Landing, testified: That Mrs. de Bell was brought to her hotel, at about 11:30 o'clock on the night of the 20th of August, in an exhausted condition, or, to use the precise language of the witness, "she was completely gone up;" that she assisted Mrs. de Bell to bed and later gave her a hot bath; that the prosecutrix remained in bed all of the succeeding day; that she (witness) examined Mrs. de Bell's clothing and found that they were "full of his [defendant's] filth."

Dr. F. H. Gates, a physician, testified that on the morning of August 21st he professionally visited Mrs. de Bell, at Mrs. Oswald's hotel, and that he found her in bed, suffering from "extreme shock, both mentally and physically"; that he discovered a bruise upon her upper left chest. The doctor prescribed a treatment for her nervous condition.

The witnesses Davis and J. E. Newsome testified that the defendant, after his arrest, admitted to them that he had had sexual connection with Mrs. de Bell at the time stated in the information.

No other testimony than that of which the foregoing is a brief epitome, except the deposition of the prosecutrix taken at the preliminary hearing of the charge before a magistrate and her rebuttal testimony contradicting certain statements involved in the testimony of the defendant, was submitted by the people to the jury.

[1] The first and the principal question with which we are concerned on this appeal is: Is the evidence upon which the verdict was obviously predicated, and of which the above statement involves a fair synoptical résumé, so deficient in probative force as to justly justify this court in declaring, as a proposition of law, that it is incapable of upholding or sustaining the verdict? In other words, is this court warranted in holding that the testimony of the prosecutrix appears upon its face to be wholly unworthy of belief, and that the jury were not therefore justified in returning a verdict of conviction?

[2] Manifestly, in answering the question thus propounded, it is not within the province of this court to consider adversary testimony, or the testimony presented by the defendant contradicting that produced by the people. The Constitution declares that the Courts of Appeal shall exercise, on questions of law alone, appellate jurisdiction in all criminal cases prosecuted by indictment or information in a court of record, excepting criminal cases where judgment of death has been rendered. Article 6, § 4, Const. From that provision of our organic law, it follows that, unless the evidence upon which a verdict in a criminal case has been planted is, upon its face, incredible, or is inherently improbable, and it is in all other respects sufficient to support the verdict, a reversal of the judgment or an order refusing a new trial upon the ground that the evidence does not support the verdict is not allowable.

But, before taking up the proposition vigorously pressed by the defendant, and upon which is mainly founded his claim of right to a reversal, it is only fair to refer briefly to the testimony submitted to the jury in support of his defense.

As before stated, the defendant, while admitting that he had carnal connection with Mrs. de Bell on the occasion specified in the information, denied that it was accomplished by a resort by him to force or violence. Indeed, he asseverated at all times that the act was not only consented to by the prosecutrix, but that it was virtually the result of her own solicitation. The witnesses McGinnes and E. T. Newsome gave testimony of certain extrajudicial statements made by Mrs. de Bell after the assault, and which tended to discredit her testimony, and to show that the sexual relations between her and the defendant were freely consented to by her. Thus it appears, as generally it so appears in all cases of contested issues of fact, that there is a decided conflict in the evidence upon the question of the alleged criminal culpability of the accused.

[3] The testimony of the extrajudicial statements of the prosecutrix, made after the commission of the assault, and which statements bear the appearance of being inconsistent with the theory that the defendant accomplished the act by the use of force, was, like all other testimony which is not unreasonable upon its face, for the jury's consideration, to be by them given such weight as they conscientiously believed it to be justly entitled to. It was, in other words, for the jury to say: (1) Whether the testimony disclosing the alleged inconsistent statements was truthful; (2) whether, if truthful, the statements so made were, when carefully scrutinized, actually inconsistent with the testimony of the prosecutrix at the trial; and (3) if inconsistent, whether they should be accepted in the place of her sworn testimony, or in impeachment thereof. As is said in the leading California case upon the question of the province and power of juries in criminal cases, People v. Durrant, 116 Cal. 179, 200, 48 Pac. 75, 79:

> "If a witness should absolutely discredit his own testimony by swearing to opposite statements, so that one or the other must be false, under our laws his testimony is not of necessity to be rejected. It is still evidence in the case. Under such circumstances the jury must receive and weigh it. They are bound to look upon it with suspicion and distrust, and may reject it. But, upon the other hand, they may as they determine accept as true one or the other of the contradictory asseverations. Thus, upon a review of the evidence by this tribunal, we may not examine with minuteness claims that witnesses are discredited, or that their testimony is unworthy of belief, or look to see whether some other conclusion might not have been warranted by the evidence. Blythe v. Ayres, 102 Cal. 254 [36 Pac. 522]. Ad questionem juris respondeant judices, ad questionem facti respondeant juratores; and than this no maxim of the old law has been more carefully preserved in its integrity under our system. Where it is not clear that the verdict must have been rendered under the influence of passion or prejudice, our examination of the record is only to determine whether legal evidence has been offered sufficient to warrant a conviction, for the verdict of the jury is their declaration that it is this evidence which has been by them accepted"—citing many cases.

But the force of counsel's argument in support of their position that the verdict is without the necessary support to uphold it is directed against the testimony or story of the prosecutrix. It is vigorously insisted that her testimony is intrinsically incredible, and that, as without her testimony the verdict manifestly cannot stand, it is within the legal power and, indeed, the duty of this court to nullify or set aside the result reached by the jury. To support this position, counsel for the defendant, in their briefs, subject the testimony of the prosecutrix to an analytical and critical examination, emphasizing certain apparent weaknesses and asserted inconsistencies in various parts of her story and her conduct on the occasion of the commission of the act. It is, in the first place, pointed out that she was, when the crime charged was perpetrated, a large, vigorous woman, weighing about 220 pounds, and therefore fully capable, physically, of so resisting the force invoked by the defendant, whatever it might have amounted to, as to have prevented the accomplishment by him of actual intercourse or even the slightest penetration. It is further pointed out, as conduct inconsistent with the story that the act of the defendant was accomplished without her consent, that after the first assaults by the defendant—on the 15th and 17th of August—the prosecutrix still remained on the ranch alone with the accused. The fact is also emphasized that a few moments prior to the assault on the 20th of August she gave the defendant a cigar; the inference from that fact being, so the argument goes, that she entertained a kindly rather than an unkindly feeling toward him, or, in other words, that she nursed no feeling of resentment against his former conduct toward her. The statement of the prosecutrix that the defendant held her down on the couch by means of one of his feet, while, at the same time, he was engaged in the act of disrobing himself, is likewise characterized as absurd and wholly unbelievable, and that it imparts to the whole story related by the prosecutrix the fatal infirmity of innate untruthfulness. These and other statements, which may seem to give some color to the theory that the verity of the story of the prosecutrix is questionable, conclusively show, it is urged, that her testimony is, upon its face, wholly unbelievable, and that therefore it is within the legal competence of this court so to hold.

But we cannot say that the story told by Mrs. de Bell, viewing it as a whole, is inherently improbable. While it is true that she is or was then a woman of unusual obesity, it does not appear, aside from that fact, that she was of great strength and physical vigor. It does not necessarily follow that, because a person may be of extraordinary avoirdupois, he is possessed of corresponding or even approximately corresponding physical strength and vigor. On the contrary, it is known to be frequently true that where avoirdupois amounts to obesity, or to the development of flesh out of proportion to the human body or frame, a deterioration in strength and the want of physical vigor and endurance follow. Mrs. de Bell testified that she resisted the defendant with all her power and, by every means available to her, attempted to prevent him from accomplishing sexual relations with her. Moreover, she testified that she was very much frightened—in fact, so determined to accomplish his purpose did the defendant appear to be, she said, that she was in constant fear that he would inflict upon her serious bodily injury, or perhaps might take her life. She described his appearance at the time as that of a man with a fixed determination to accomplish at any cost the act upon which his mind was set. He clutched her by the throat and thus held her until he had effected a penetration of her private parts. Men often become demons on such occasions, or while attempting an outrage by force upon the opposite sex, and it is not to be wondered that, under the circumstances as she described them, dreadful, as they were, in the extreme, the prosecutrix should have become greatly terrorized, and so become bereft of her physical courage and strength. Often has it been said, as the effect of the argument is here, that it would ordinarily be impossible for a man to accomplish the act of sexual intercourse with a female of mature years against her will and consent—that but slight resistance on her part would ordinarily be sufficient to prevent the accomplishment of the act. This theory is plausible, in the abstract, and perhaps may be sustainable in those cases where it is made to appear that the female, during the unsavory combat, has succeeded in preserving her courage or a mental attitude which has enabled her to maintain and apply her full normal power of resistance; but it is obviously true and is often the fact, as the jury by the evidence was authorized to believe was so in this case, that a person, when enveloped by appalling circumstances, will lose his courage and with it his normal strength, and so become practically helpless in the hands of one who may have a criminal or sinister design which may be the more readily executed when his victim is reduced to that condition. This proposition is recognized by our law in the case of robbery, which, as so defined, is "the felonious taking of personal property in the possession of another, from his person or immediate presence, and against his will, accomplished by means of force or fear." Section 211, Penal Code. And the proposition may be said to be particularly true in cases of rape, where the assaulted party is of the weaker sex. So in all such cases, of which this is typical, since there is evidence in the record tending to show that the prosecutrix was much frightened and terrified, it is always with the jury to say, where there is some credible evidence of the fact, whether the female was, at the time of the assault, possessed of such fear as would likely have the effect of impairing, if not altogether destroying, her ability to so resist her assailant as to prevent actual intercourse.

As to the fact that she remained on the ranch alone with the defendant after his first attempted familiarities with her, Mrs. de Bell explained that at that time there was then no other person than herself to look after the ranch and the dairy business, and that she therefore felt impelled to remain there, although she was in constant fear of the defendant. We perceive nothing so unreasonable in this explanation as to justify us in holding that the jury should have repudiated it, nor is there anything in the fact of her remaining on the ranch under the circumstances indicated, as so explained, which renders her testimony in the main unreasonable or improbable, per se.

Referring to the circumstance of the giving of a cigar to the defendant by her a few moments prior to the attack made upon her, Mrs. de Bell explained that, after she and the defendant had finished supper, he remained in the dining room and displayed no disposition to depart therefrom, and that, being in fear of him from his previous actions toward her, she was anxious for him to leave the house and go to his "bunk." She further explained that she had observed that he was fond of smoking, and that, in the belief that thus he would be led to go outside for the purpose of smoking it, she gave him the cigar. It was for this reason, and no other, she asseverated, that she gave him the cigar. This explanation is not, upon its face, unreasonable, and therefore the circumstance of the giving of the cigar to the defendant, as so explained, cannot be held to stamp the essentially vital parts of the story of the prosecutrix as improbable. It was, in other words, for the jury to determine whether the motive of the prosecutrix in giving the defendant the cigar was that of friendliness or a desire to encourage his attentions, or whether her explanation of that circumstance was truthful or sufficiently reasonable to justify them in accepting it.

But there are some other circumstances, of which testimony was received, and to which we may now briefly advert, which apparently stand in strong corroboration of Mrs. de Bell's version of the occurrence.

[4, 5] It may first be observed that while, admittedly, it would always be more satisfactory if, in cases of rape, where guilt actually exists, testimony other than that of the prosecutrix supporting or tending to support her story were available and submitted to the jury, a verdict of conviction in such cases may, nevertheless, stand on her testimony alone, for the law does not require her to be corroborated to support the charge. In this case, however, as stated, the prosecutrix appears to have been corroborated by the circumstance that at a late hour of the night of the assault, and a few hours after it took place, she stealthily, or unknown to the accused, fled from her home, with the intention of going to that of a neighbor—Ora Munson. When a short distance from the latter's home, she began screaming, which was heard by Munson, then in bed, who hastily proceeded out into his field, in the direction from which the sound of her voice came, and found her suffering from what appeared to be a severe nervous shock. Munson at once conveyed her to the hotel of Mrs. Oswald, at Crow's Landing, where she remained in bed for over 24 hours, suffering, so the doctor called to attend her stated, from severe physical and mental collapsion, due to an extreme nervous shock. The jury were warranted in concluding that her condition, thus described, was the consequence of her previous terrible experience with the defendant, and, as so viewing that circumstance, could justly have held it to be, as undoubtedly they did so regard it, strongly corroborative of the story as told by the prosecutrix on the witness stand, for it is hardly conceivable that, were it true that she freely and voluntarily assented to the act of sexual intercourse with the defendant, she would have left her home at the dead hour of the night under the circumstances as shown and have revealed to others the fact of her illicit relations with the accused, or that such a condition of mind and body as she was found to be in only a few hours after the act had been committed would have developed.

[6, 7] But it is earnestly suggested that the legal integrity of the verdict was questioned, not only by the court below, but by one of the jurors, and that these circumstances should be considered by this court in connection with its consideration of the question whether the verdict is, as a matter of law, sufficiently supported.

It appears that, after retiring and deliberating for a time upon the case without reaching a conclusion, the jury were returned into court, to be further instructed and their minds refreshed as to certain testimony. While thus in court, one of the jurors asked the court what the penalty would be in the event that a verdict of guilty was reached, saying that he thought the "defendant was guilty to a certain extent." It further appears that, when pronouncing judgment on the verdict, the judge remarked that he "had some little question about the technical violation of the law" by the defendant. Upon both these propositions counsel lay considerable stress. But they possess no importance and can justly exercise no influence in the determination of the question of the propriety or impropriety, legally, of the verdict.

Precisely what the juror meant by the opinion expressed by him that the defendant was guilty only to a limited extent, we are unable to divine. It may be that he intended to say that at that particular moment he was of the opinion that the defendant's conduct, as he viewed it through the evidence before him, amounted to nothing more than a futile attempt to commit the act. Certainly, after listening to the charge of the court, it is not for an instant supposable that, accepting the testimony of the prosecutrix that the defendant accomplished only a partial insertion of his privates, he conceived or, rather, misconceived it to be in accord with the law to measure the degree of the defendant's criminal culpability by the extent of the penetration accomplished. But, whatever may have been the idea at the base of the opinion so expressed, the important fact remains that, after again retiring for deliberation upon the case, a verdict of guilty was reached, and the presumption is that it was arrived at only upon a fair and impartial consideration of the evidence under the rules of law as declared to the jury by the court.

As to the statement of the judge, above referred to, it is to be said that, if thereby he intended to express a doubt as to the guilt of the accused under the evidence, then what is said in People v. Brecker, 20 Cal. App. 205, 209, 210, 127 Pac. 666, 669, where a similar proposition arose and was considered, constitutes a reply to the intimation here that by said statement this court should be to some extent governed in determining whether the verdict should be upheld. In that case it is said:

> "A judge may and in many cases doubtless does have some doubt as to whether a verdict of guilty should have been returned, and yet such doubt might not be sufficient to generate an unequivocal opinion that the verdict was not justified, and, when the court is not of an opinion of that character as to a verdict of guilty, it has no right to grant a new trial, or to permit a doubt not sufficient to create such an opinion to override the functions which are, under our law, peculiarly those of the jury. * * * We have a right to presume, from the fact that the motion for a new trial was denied, that the doubt of the court as to the justification of the verdict did not reach the dignity of such an opinion of the jury's conclusion as to warrant it in setting aside the verdict. We must assume, in other words, that, had it entertained such opinion, it would have promptly done its duty by granting a new trial."

[8] The only other point urged for a reversal is that the people failed, so it is claimed, to prove that the prosecutrix was not the wife of the defendant. That it is essential in and incumbent upon the people to plead and prove, in cases of rape, that the female upon whom the crime is alleged to have been committed is not the wife of the accused is an elementary proposition in this state, and we think that the people in this case sufficiently discharged the burden thus imposed.

There is, it is true, no direct testimony upon that point. The defendant testified, however, that he was a married man, and that his wife was in Italy. This testimony, considered in connection with the fact that Mrs. de Bell had known the defendant but a little beyond a half a month before the assault was committed, and the further fact that the names of the prosecutrix and the defendant are not the same, is sufficient to justify the inference that they were not husband and wife when the crime alleged took place, and the presumption arising from the verdict is that the jury drew such inference from the testimony, and that thus they were convinced beyond a reasonable doubt that they were not husband and wife at that time.

We have carefully scrutinized the record and have failed to find any legal reason for disturbing the verdict.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; BURNETT, J.

BRIGGS v. HALL. (Civ. 1204.)

1. BROKERS (§ 56*)—ACTION FOR COMPENSATION—SUFFICIENCY OF SERVICES.

To entitle a broker to commissions, he need not have personally conducted the negotiations between the principal and purchaser resulting in a sale, nor have been present when the bargain was completed, nor need the principal have known at the time that the purchaser had been found by the broker; but it is indispensable and sufficient that the efforts of the broker were the procuring cause of the sale, and that through him the parties were brought into negotiations, though they themselves negotiated the sale.

2. BROKERS (§ 86*)—ACTION FOR COMMISSION—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY OF SERVICES.

Evidence in an action for a stipulated broker's commission for effecting a sale of real estate held to show that plaintiff's assignor was not the procuring cause of the sale.

3. BROKERS (§ 57*)—RIGHT TO COMMISSION—PRINCIPAL'S BREACH OF CONTRACT.

A principal's breach of his contract that before its expiration he would not, without the broker's consent, offer it for less than the sum mentioned therein, by a sale for less than that amount, made the principal liable for the agreed commission.

4. BROKERS (§ 82*)—ACTION FOR COMMISSION—PLEADING.

A broker suing for a commission for the sale of real estate on the ground of the principal's breach of his contract not to sell it below a certain price without the broker's consent should set that ground forth in his complaint, even though in another count he presents the theory of a sale through his agency.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; Thomas C. Denny, Judge.

Action by H. Briggs against A. J. Hall. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed, with directions to enter judgment for plaintiff.

See, also, 20 Cal. App. 372, 129 Pac. 288.

L. G. Scott, of Sebastopol, and T. J. Butts, of Santa Rosa, for appellant. Perrier & Libby, of Sebastopol, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. The action was brought on an assigned claim for a broker's commission in the sale of real estate. Attached to the complaint is the contract of agency executed by the owner of the property from which we quote as follows:

> "In consideration of their efforts to sell the within-described property, I hereby appoint Lyman & Briggs of Sebastopol, California, to act as agents for the sale of said property for the sum of thirteen thousand dollars, and I agree not to offer the same for a less price before the expiration of this contract without the consent of said agents. I agree that in case of the sale of said property by said Lyman & Briggs, or should the purchaser receive information of said property through said agents, to pay them a five per cent. commission on such sale, or exchange. * * * I reserve the right to sell said property myself, or to sell said property through the agency of any one else, but I hereby agree that in case such sale be made by myself, or through any other agency, in consideration of their services to pay said Lyman & Briggs a commission of two per cent. on sale price. Number of acres 31¼. Price $13,000.00. * * * Personal property that goes with the place: All farming tools now on place, berry chests, apple boxes. First payment, $6,500. Terms on balance to suit purchaser, but not to run longer than three years."

The case was here before on an appeal from the order of the trial court granting defendant's motion for a new trial after a jury had awarded plaintiff the amount sued for. 20 Cal. App. 372, 129 Pac. 288. The order granting the motion for a new trial was affirmed on the ground of an erroneous instruction. It sufficiently appears from said opinion that said order could also have been upheld on the theory of a conflict in the evidence. And in this connection it may be well to allude to an erroneous implication as to the case of Newman v. Overland Pac. Ry. Co., 132 Cal. 74, 64 Pac. 110, involved in the following statement of Briggs v. Hall, 20 Cal. App. on page 374, 129 Pac. 288:

> "We may consider any of these assignments with the exception, possibly, of the insufficiency of the evidence. We speak of the last with some hesitancy, because of the declaration made in Newman v. Overland Pac. Ry. Co., 132 Cal. 74, 64 Pac. 110, that," etc.

The fact is that the quotation itself from the Newman Case shows clearly enough that said order in question could have been affirmed on the ground that there was a substantial conflict in the evidence, but, through inadvertence, a doubt was suggested that really could not arise when the language of said quotation is properly considered.

[1] The first contention of appellant here is that the firm of Lyman & Briggs was the procuring cause of the sale within the contemplation of the decisions. He cites, as illustrative of the familiar doctrine, Duncan v. Kearney, 72 Conn. 585, 45 Atl. 358, and Justy v. Erro, 16 Cal. App. 519, 117 Pac. 575. In the former it is held that a real estate agent who first calls the attention of the purchaser to the land and advises him to buy it is entitled to his commission, though the deal is finally negotiated directly with the owner through the agent of the purchaser, the court saying:

> "The trial court might reasonably find the information given Smith [the purchaser] by the plaintiff, that the defendant's property on Prospect street was for sale, with the advice to see the defendant in regard to the purchase, to be the foundation on which the negotiation resulting in such sale was begun."

In the Justy Case it is declared that:

> "It is not necessary that the broker should personally have conducted the negotiations between the principal and the purchaser leading to the sale, nor that he should have been present when the bargain was completed, nor that the principal should at the time have known that the purchaser was one found by the broker. It is indispensable and sufficient that the effort of the broker was the procuring cause of the sale, and that, through his agency, the purchaser was brought into communication with the seller, although the parties themselves negotiated the sale."

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

The principle is undoubtedly well established, and there is some evidence in the record to support the inference, that plaintiff's assignors gave advice and information that led the vendee to purchase the property. The trial court, however, found:

"(4) That said lands and premises were sold through the efforts of Hansen & Caya, real estate agents, located at Sebastopol, Cal.

"(5) That said Lyman & Briggs were not the procuring cause of said sale; they did not procure a contract for the purchase of said premises from Geo. H. Johnson nor from any other person; they did not bring the parties together or introduce said Geo. H. Johnson to defendant herein."

[2] There is no doubt that the sale was consummated through the efforts of said Hansen & Caya, and there is also substantial support for finding No. 5.

Johnson, the purchaser, himself testified that:

"Mr. Morford called my attention to the Hall place in December of 1910. Then I met Mr. Caya about the middle of December. Mr. Caya and I went out to look at a piece of property beyond there. He says: 'Here's the Hall place, we have it listed.' There wasn't much said about it that I remember of until a short time before I bought the place. I saw Mr. Morford on the street and asked him if he thought it was a good buy. 'Yes, sir,' he said, 'it is a good buy; it will pay for the work and the interest.' Also a Mr. Ryan told me it was a good buy, and my wife and I talked it over and made up our minds to buy it."

It is true that the witness also talked with Lyman and Briggs about the property, and they informed him of their contract of agency, and advised him to purchase, but this was after Johnson had seen the place and after his said conversation with Morford, and also with Caya. It also appears that Lyman & Briggs did not take Johnson to the place at any time nor introduce him to the owner of the property. It is therefore a fair inference that plaintiff's assignors were not the procuring cause of the sale.

[3-5] Another theory upon which plaintiff claims the commission is that the property was sold by the owner for less than $13,000. The contract of agency, as already seen, provided for such contingency, and admittedly, if the owner violated said provision, he would be liable for the commission.

It is true, though, that if he intended to rely upon this circumstance, according to the usual and orderly method of pleading, he should have set it forth in his complaint. In one count he might have presented the theory of a sale through the agency of his assignors, and in another count of a sale by the owner for less than $13,000, in violation of his agreement. The issue as to the two distinct contingencies, upon either of which he might recover, could thus have been formally and clearly presented. The complaint, though, as held in the former opinion, may be comprehensive enough to include the latter contention. At any rate, at both trials, the whole transaction was put in evidence, without objection, and the case was tried upon the theory that the violation by the owner of this agreement not to sell the property for less than $13,000 was an issue in the case.

As to this, the position of appellant is that a rebate to the purchaser was made by agreement between the owner and Hansen & Caya of one-half of the commission, amounting to the sum of $317, and also of the sum of $280 by reason of a shortage in the acreage discovered by a survey of the land. In addition it is claimed that some personal property not mentioned in said contract of agency was transferred as an additional inducement for the purchase of the said real estate.

There is however, in the record, we think, support for the conclusion that there was no violation by the owner of his covenant not to sell for less than $13,000. He testified that he knew nothing of the rebate of commission until after the sale. He could not be held responsible, of course, for any private agreement of that character between the purchaser and the agent. We must accept his statement and assume that he acted in good faith.

There is also evidence that the agreement as to the survey of the land was subsequent to the agreement to purchase it for the sum of $13,000. Mr. Johnson testified:

"The next day, on the 12th, after I gave him the check for $500, the money was paid over and the mortgage was given that day, $13,000. Mr. Hall put up the deed while the title of the property was being perfected. I put up the money in the bank, $6,500 in drafts and $6,500 in mortgage."

He also testified that "we agreed to survey the place, and if there was a shortage he would pay it back," and furthermore that this was after the said transaction as to the deed and mortgage.

Of the personal property the farming implements were covered by the said contract of agency, the chickens were donated by the wife of the owner, and the only thing left—one small pig—is hardly of enough consequence for the law to regard.

[6] One other consideration requires attention. It appears from the findings that the contract of agency relied upon by plaintiff was executed by the owner of the property, and that within the time during which it was to be binding the property was sold by agents, Hansen & Caya, for the sum of $13,000. But, as already seen, the owner agreed that if the property was sold by himself or through any other agency than Lyman & Briggs he would pay the latter "a commission of two per cent. on sale price." The legal and logical conclusion from the findings is, therefore, that plaintiff is entitled to judgment for the sum of $260. It is not a valid objection to this that the court was without jurisdiction to award that amount. The suit having been brought to recover the sum of $650 the court had authority to direct judgment for any amount shown by the evidence to be due. In Derby v. Stevens, 64 Cal. 289, 30 Pac. 820, it is said:

"If in the same action he demands a judgment for less than $300 against any of the defendants, the superior court has no jurisdiction to enter a judgment in plaintiff's favor against those defendants of whom he has so demanded less than $300. But when the plaintiff has demanded $300 or more as against any defendant, the district court had, and the superior court has, jurisdiction to enter a judgment for less than $300 against said defendant."

"In ordinary legal actions the so-called ad damnum clause of the complaint, when stated in good faith (Fix v. Sussung, 83 Mich. 561 [47 N. W. 340] 21 Am. St. Rep. 616, and notes), affords the test of jurisdiction, and, if the amount equals or exceeds $300 the superior court obtains jurisdiction, and may render judgment for any lesser sum the evidence may justify." Miller v. Carlisle, 127 Cal. 330, 59 Pac. 785.

Of course, a separate count in the complaint seting forth this theory would have been demurrable on jurisdictional grounds, but, the whole transaction having been shown without objection, and the court having found as aforesaid, the plaintiff should be awarded the relief to which he appears entitled.

The judgment is reversed, therefore, with directions to enter judgment for plaintiff for the sum of $260.

RIVERDALE RECLAMATION DIST. NO. 805 v. SHIMMIN et al. (Civ. 1172.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Dec. 27, 1913. On Rehearing, May 23, 1914.)

1. Drains (§ 81*)—Reclamation Districts—Assessments—Contests.

In an action by a reclamation district under Pol. Code, § 3493½, to determine the validity of an assessment for building a levee, the landowner may show that there has been a material overrating of benefits and consequent injuries to taxpayers, whether the overrating is the result of fraud or negligence of the commissioners of assessment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Drains, Cent. Dig. §§ 76–81; Dec. Dig. § 81.*]

2. Drains (§ 81*)—Reclamation Districts—Assessments—Contests.

The presumption created by Pol. Code, § 3463, declaring that an assessment list of commissioners of assessment, levying an assessment in a reclamation district, is prima facie evidence of the matters therein contained, and that the charges are in proportion to the whole expense and the benefits, may support a finding of the propriety and equality of an assessment, but does not apply where the commissioners have testified fully as to the method pursued by them in apportioning the charges on the land; and in that case the court must look to their testimony to determine the propriety and equality of the assessment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Drains, Cent. Dig. §§ 76–81; Dec. Dig. § 81.*]

3. Drains (§ 81*)—Reclamation Districts—Assessments—Contests.

Where commissioners levying an assessment in a reclamation district for the cost of a levee arbitrarily adopted the theory that no assessment should be less than $1 nor more than $10, and considered benefits, without taking into account the value of the land at the time of the assessment and its probable enhancement from the improvement, the court could set aside the assessment on parol evidence showing a wide departure in the result reached by the commissioners from the proportionate increases in the value of the various tracts in the district.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Drains, Cent. Dig. §§ 76–81; Dec. Dig. § 81.*]

4. Drains (§ 79*)—Reclamation Districts—Assessments—Contests.

Commissioners of assessment, in levying an assessment in a reclamation district for the construction of a levee, should consider the levees previously constructed and their relation to the protection of the land from overflow, and should consider the existing conditions of the land at the time of the assessment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Drains, Cent. Dig. § 76; Dec. Dig. § 79.*]

5. Drains (§ 79*)—Reclamation Districts—Assessments—Contests.

Commissioners of assessment levying an assessment in a reclamation district for the cost of a levee must determine the value of the land before and after the construction, and the difference is the measure of the benefits, and the value is either the intrinsic or market value, and, where the construction increases market value, the property receives a benefit by the amount of the increase; but the landowner cannot be charged with general benefits.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Drains, Cent. Dig. § 76; Dec. Dig. § 79.*]

6. Drains (§ 81*)—Reclamation Districts—Assessments—Contests.

Where the inequalities of an assessment in a reclamation district for the cost of an improvement are palpable and important, so that it would be a gross injustice against some of the landowners to enforce the assessment, the court will set it aside, though many of the landowners paid their assessments without complaint, and a few over objection.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Drains, Cent. Dig. §§ 76–81; Dec. Dig. § 81.*]

On Rehearing.

7. Drains (§ 79*)—Reclamation Districts—Assessments—Contests.

The method of levying an assessment in a reclamation district for the construction of an improvement by ascertaining the difference between the market value of the land before and after the improvement, and making the difference the measure of the benefit, is not the only method that may be adopted to ascertain the proportionate benefits to the land in the district from the improvement.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Drains, Cent. Dig. § 76; Dec. Dig. § 79.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; H. Z. Austin, Judge.

Action by the Riverdale Reclamation District No. 805 against W. F. Shimmin and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Cartwright & Cashin, of Fresno, for appellants. M. K. Harris and Sutherland & Barbour, all of Fresno, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. The action was brought by respondent, under section 3493½, Political Code, to determine the validity of an assessment levied on the lands of appellants and others situated within said reclamation district. The amount involved was $16,500, and it was to be expended principally for the purpose of erecting a levee along the north line of the district; this line being the south bank of a certain water course known as Murphy slough. It is stated by appellants that:

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

> "The regularity of the organization of plaintiff is not involved in the action, and the matters at issue were the legality of the method adopted by the commissioners of assessment in apportioning the amount of the assessment on the different parcels of land in the district."

The assessment is questioned on various grounds, one of which is that:

> "The commissioners of assessment, in estimating the benefits which the various pieces of land in the district will derive from the proposed works of reclamation, failed to take into consideration the greater proportionate increase in market value of lands adjoining Murphy slough which will, by the construction of the new levee, and for the first time, be reclaimed from overflow, and the less proportionate increase in market value of lands in other portions of the district already reclaimed and protected from overflow at the time of the formation of the district."

[1] There is no doubt of the rule that, in an action like this to test the legality of the assessment, the landowner may show in defense that:

> "There has been a material overrating of benefits and consequent injuries to the taxpayers, whether such overrating be the result of fraud or negligence of the commissioners." Hagar v. Reclamation District, 111 U. S. 701, 4 Sup. Ct. 663, 28 L. Ed. 569; Reclamation District v. Phillips, 108 Cal. 310, 39 Pac. 630, 41 Pac. 335; Reclamation District v. Sels, 117 Cal. 164, 49 Pac. 131.

[2] In applying the rule, however, we must observe the principle contended for by respondent and stated in Reclamation District No. 7 v. Sherman, 11 Cal. App. 399, 105 Pac. 277, as follows:

> "It is clear that the statute contemplates that considerable discretion shall be exercised by the commissioners in the determination of the question as to benefits which will accrue to the several tracts of land included in the district, that, while an arbitrary assessment cannot be levied, the judgment of the commissioners upon the assessment, after a view of the lands contemplated by the statute, must be presumed to have been the result of a consideration of all the elements necessary to a just apportionment of the assessment."

The foregoing is manifestly in line with the provision of section 3463 of the Political Code to the effect that the assessment list of the commissioners, or a certified copy thereof, is prima facie evidence of the matters therein contained, and that said assessment was levied in proportion to benefits to be derived from said works of reclamation. This presumption, under some circumstances, might be, and no doubt often is, sufficient to support a finding of the propriety and equality of the assessment; but here it can hardly be said that there is any room for the play of the presumption, since the commissioners themselves testified directly and fully as to the method pursued by them in apportioning the charges upon the land, and we must look rather to their testimony as a guide to what they did.

[3] J. B. Lewis, one of the commissioners, testified:

> "The scale on which we assessed the lands was one to ten. As I understood it that was as little an assessment as we could put on any piece of land—$1—and $10 was as high as we could put on. We were not permitted to put on more than that and nothing less than that. That no land could be assessed for more than $10, and no land could be assessed for less than $1."

Mr. George Forsythe testified to the same effect as to the scale, and furthermore:

> "We went on the land and estimated principally from the map. We went on every piece of land. All three of the commissioners were together at the time of the assessment and talked the matter over."

The other commissioner, H. L. Ward, testified similarly, and in addition:

> "In arriving at what would be the proper assessment, we considered the benefits derived by the land. It depended first on the quality of the land. A good piece of land can be benefited more than a poor piece can, that is nearly almost. The other is the way it lies with reference to the levees, and land lying close to the levee gets more seepage than the piece further away, the same quality of land a quarter of a mile from the levee is really benefited more than a piece of land adjoining the levee, and also a liability of land next to the levee to be damaged more than one further away. We didn't take into consideration any of the old leveed ditch banks or artificial barriers that would tend to protect some of the lands in the district, and those protected by these artificial means were assessed just the same as if the artificial protection had not been placed there. We didn't take into consideration those ditch banks and other levees because they were in private ownership. We didn't take into consideration the value of the lands at the time of the assessment and the probable enhancement of the value of the various pieces of land after the construction of these works. The basis was simply the benefit to be derived. The benefit of real property would enhance its value if it was a benefit to it. We didn't take into consideration that the lands of Mr. Cerini, lying north of the old levee, were subject to annual overflow, and were not sufficiently safe from flood to render them valuable for cultivation, while the lands lying south, and partially protected, were all in a state of cultivation. We took into consideration simply what would be the benefit, assuming that these ditches or this old levee were not there at all. We didn't take into consideration the present valuation of these lands and the probable increase of the several parcels after the construction of the new levee. I consider that the increased value is a measure of the benefit."

As to other land in the district he declared also that they did not take into account its value at the time of the assessment and its probable enhancement from the construction of the improvement.

In the first place, it may be remarked that the integrity of the commissioners is not called in question, nor is it doubted that they acted in good faith; the attack being upon the method of the assessment and the accuracy of the result. Nor is it claimed that absolute equality is possible, or that insubstantial irregularities in the course pursued should vitiate the assessment made. The contention is, however, that "direct and invidious discrimination was practiced in favor of the landowners adjoining Murphy slough," principally for the reason that "this commission, in apportioning the assessment, failed to take into consideration the effect of the proposed improvement on the value of the lands adjoining Murphy slough, and which lands, previous to the construction of the levee, had never been and could not be cultivated, and which lands, as shown by the evidence, would increase to treble its former value."

We shall not attempt a full analysis of the course adopted by the commissioners. It may be suggested, though, that there was no warrant for their assumption that $1 an acre was the lowest and $10 the highest assessment that could be levied. If they were satisfied that some of the land was benefited to the extent of $20 or more per acre, and other land not more than 50 cents, they should have so apportioned the assessment.

[4] Again, the scale adopted was an arbitrary one, and though it might be a convenience, and not necessarily productive of injustice, the manner of its application, as declared by the commissioners, exhibits the element of conjecture as a prominent factor in the determination of the comparative values of the various tracts of land. It is also true, we think, that the commissioners should have taken into consideration the levees that had been constructed and their relation to the protection of the land from overflow. It is true that little importance might have been attached to this circumstance, and small allowance made for it; but it was a feature intimately connected with the consideration of any additional benefit that might be afforded by the construction of the proposed levee. The commissioners should take into consideration existing conditions of the land as it is at the time of the assessment. Reclamation District v. Burger, 122 Cal. 447, 55 Pac. 156.

[5] But the most serious objection grows out of the indifference of the commissioners to the consideration of the value of the land at the time of the assessment and after the completion of the improvement. The only practicable and, it would seem, the only possible measure of the benefit to the land is found in its value. The land is benefited as its value is increased. If the land is increased in value to the extent of $50 an acre, it is, of course, benefited to that amount. The true method is to determine, then, the value of the land before and after the construction of the improvement, and the difference is the measure of the benefit. And this value is either the intrinsic or the market value. But whether one or the other, the result is the same, since we have no way of determining the intrinsic except by applying the test of the market value. This matter is discussed in City of Los Angeles v. Pomeroy, 124 Cal. 597, 57 Pac. 585, wherein it is held that the market or exchange value of the property is the only criterion of its actual value, and "actual value," as used in section 1249 of the Code of Civil Procedure, means "actual market value."

There seems no dissent from the rule quoted by appellants from the authorities as follows:

> "Undoubtedly the simplest, fairest, and most just rule and one which conforms to the underlying theory of local assessments is that the existence and amount of special benefits is to be determined by the effect of the improvement upon the market value of the property which it is claimed is benefited by such improvement. If the construction of such improvement increases the market value of such property, such property receives a benefit, and the amount of such benefit is measured by the amount of such increase." Chicago Union Traction Company v. Chicago, 204 Ill. 363, 68 N. E. 519, and 207 Ill. 544, 69 N. E. 850; Marion Bond Co. v. Johnson, 29 Ind. App. 294, 64 N. E. 626; City of Allegheny v. Black's Heirs, 99 Pa. 154.

In Re Furman Street, 17 Wend. (N. Y.) 649, in an action to determine the damages and benefits from the opening of a street, it was said, through Bronson, J.:

> "There can be no other practicable guide for the commissioners than the intrinsic value of the land, and that value depends on the uses to which it may be applied or the price it will bring in the market."

In the case of Lipes v. Hand, 104 Ind. 503, 1 N. E. 871, 4 N. E. 160, in the consideration of an assessment for the construction of drains, the court quotes with approval the following from Judge Cooley:

> "The only safe and practicable course, and the one which will do equal justice to all parties, is to consider what will be the influence of the proposed improvement on the market price of the property."

It is admitted that the landowner should not be charged with general but with special benefits only, and it is equally clear that special benefits are coextensive with the augmentation of value.

Of course the consideration of market value is a matter largely of opinion as is the question of benefits; but it is impossible to determine the latter apart from the former, and no better test can be suggested or applied to the problem than the increased price that the land would probably bring in the market after the improvement is completed. Indeed, bearing in mind the fact that the benefit to the land is to be estimated by a pecuniary standard, it seems hard to conceive how any conclusion could be reached, without considering the probable increase in the market value. The proper course is manifestly as we have suggested; the commissioners applying their own knowledge of values, and supplementing this, if necessary, by information obtained from others. Substantially this course should be adopted, although there may be no conscious recognition of each definite step in the process.

It does not necessarily follow from the foregoing that an assessment made according to the method pursued by the commissioners here should be set aside. Such scale may be adopted, and the land classified as was done, and, unless the apportionment were shown to be clearly unequal and unjust, it should not be disturbed. Of course the main desideratum is the conclusion as to the proportionate benefits. And the commissioners might make a substantially just and accurate adjustment by the method which they adopted. The trouble here is, however, that all the evidence shows a wide departure in the result reached from the proportionate increase in the respective values of the various tracts of land. We may take the testimony of S. Zanolini as an example of all the evidence on the subject:

> "I am familiar with land values in that neighborhood. I know what the prices have been for the last 20 years, what has been sold. I know the market value of property generally in that neighborhood. I consider the market value of my land there about $125 an acre. In my judgment my land will not increase in value by reason of the old levee. I think Mrs. Adams land without this new reclamation worth about as much as mine—the same with Mr. Andrews and Mr. Hancock. The lands lying north of this old levee and were subject to overflow only was worth about $30 an acre for what pasture they could get out of it. I would consider $30 an acre a fair price for it. Assuming that this new reclamation levee will make that land as safe as the land south of the old levee, that land will be worth $125 an acre. It is better land than I have got, richer land. * * * I think that Mr. Harlan's, Mr. Barritt's, and Mr. Schmidt's land north of the levee would have been worth about $30 an acre, without reclamation. The land belonging to Mr. Barritt, Mr. Harlan, and a portion of Mr. Schmidt's reclaimed by the new levee is worth about $125 to $150 an acre, because it is good rich land."

It is not contended that the assessment was anything like what the foregoing estimate would require, nor was any attempt made at the trial to refute the testimony of defendants and their other witnesses as to values.

[6] It is stated by respondent that:

> "Many of the landowners within the district have paid their assessments without complaint. A few more objected to paying. We submit that, if any irregularities are found to exist in the assessment, they are not of sufficient importance to justify the invalidation of the entire assessment and the consequent entanglement of the affairs of the district."

Such consequences, if possible, should, of course, be avoided. But according to the record before us, the inequalities of the assessment are palpable and important, and it would be a gross injustice to some of the landowners to enforce the charges as made by the commissioners. It may be suggested, also, that on a new trial plaintiff might be able to show that the assessment is not so greatly disproportionate to the increase in the values of the land as to demand a different adjustment.

But, as before indicated, the record showing no substantial conflict, and all the evidence pointing to the conclusion that the assessment was not at all in proportion to benefits, we think the judgment and order denying the motion for a new trial should be reversed, and it is so ordered.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; HART, J.

On Rehearing.

BURNETT, J. [7] When the cause was called for argument on the rehearing, it was stated by its counsel that respondent had concluded to abide by the former judgment of this court reversing the lower court, and that steps had already been taken to secure another assessment of the lands within the district. It was furthermore stated that as far as respondent was concerned the petition for rehearing was the result of a misunderstanding on the part of one of the attorneys for the reclamation district. Respondent was willing to confess error; but, in view of possible embarrassment that might be occasioned to other districts if we should reaffirm the portion of the former opinion referring to the method of assessment by ascertaining the difference between the market value of the land before and after the improvement, it was suggested that the reversal be placed upon the other grounds discussed. There seems to be no valid objection to this course, and, while commending to commissioners the propriety of adopting the method of assessment outlined in the former opinion, for the purposes of this case it is not necessary to hold, and we do not hold, that said method is the only valid one that may be adopted to ascertain the proportionate benefits to the land.

For other iregularities stated, and in accordance with respondent's admission of error, the judgment and order are reversed.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; HART, J.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Albert Lee Stephens, Judge pro tem.

Action by the United States National Bank of Los Angeles against C. E. Jones and another. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Flint, Gray & Barker, of Los Angeles, Rupert B. Turnbull, of Pasadena, and Carroll Allen and Bertin A. Weyl, both of Los Angeles, for appellant. Tipton & Cailor, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

JAMES, J. Suit on a promissory note alleged to have been executed by respondents and four others. In the original complaint filed by plaintiff it was alleged that the defendants were copartners doing business under the name of Victorville Reduction Company. The note was signed thus: "Victorville Reduction Company, per Scott Newcomer." An amendment to the complaint was filed, for the purpose, as is recited in the order allowing such amendment to be made, to make the complaint "conform to facts proved." By the amendment the cause of action was changed from one upon the note to one in form a common count for money loaned. In the findings filed by the judge pro tem. it was recited that plaintiff had dismissed its action as against all of the defendants first named, excepting the two respondents here. The judgment was in favor of the respondents, from which plaintiff appealed. The appeal is presented upon the judgment roll alone.

[1] Among the findings is one that the cause of action is barred by the statute of limitations. The bar of the statute was not pleaded either in the answer filed to the original complaint, or that stipulated to be considered as made to the amendment to the complaint. It is urged by the appellant that on the findings of fact as made plaintiff was entitled to judgment. The findings as to the facts other than that the bar of the statute had interposed are confusing and indefinite.

[2, 3] It will not be necessary to discuss them in detail or with particularity, because the judgment must be reversed for the reason that the court found in favor of respondents as to the bar of the statute of limitations, when there was no issue as to such limitation having interposed. Even though it might here be concluded, as appellant contends, that a copartnership was sufficiently found to have existed between the respondents and Newcomer at the time the debt was incurred, which is not at all clear, this court cannot change findings of fact and direct a different judgment to be entered thereon.

The case should be retried and the facts found anew.

The judgment is reversed.

PEOPLE v. RIVERA. (Cr. 336.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. May 21, 1914.)

OBSTRUCTING JUSTICE (§ 16*)—PEACE OFFICER—RESISTANCE—EVIDENCE.

Evidence held insufficient to sustain a conviction for resisting a peace officer in the performance of his duty in attempting to arrest one alleged to have been guilty of disturbing the peace.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Obstructing Justice, Cent. Dig. § 32; Dec. Dig. § 16.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; Z. B. West, Judge.

F. C. Rivera was convicted of resisting a peace officer, and he appeals. Reversed.

Rivera, Potter & Folsom, of Los Angeles (N. C. Folsom, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and George Beebe, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

JAMES, J. Defendant appealed from a judgment directing that he be imprisoned in the county jail of the county of Orange for a period of eight months following a conviction on the charge of having resisted a peace officer while in the performance of his duties. A motion for a new trial was made, and defendant has also appealed from the order denying that motion.

The evidence was insufficient to justify the conviction of appellant. The information of the district attorney charged that:

> He (the appellant) "did willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously resist, delay, and obstruct a public officer, to wit, Phillip Germann, a duly appointed, qualified, and acting deputy city marshal of the city of Anaheim, Cal., and also a deputy sheriff of the county of Orange, in the discharge and the attempt to discharge the duty of his office, to wit, in the attempt to arrest a man whose name is supposed to be Gregorio Gonsales, who was then and there willfully, unlawfully, and maliciously disturbing the peace and quiet of the neighborhood of North Los Angeles street in the city of Anaheim, Cal."

The evidence, which is exhibited in full by the reporter's transcript, shows that on the night of January 3, 1914, at about 8 or 8:30 o'clock, some persons had engaged in a "fight," and as a result thereof one of the men had been stabbed with a knife; that appellant was not known to have been present or to have participated in the difficulty referred to, but that he was at a saloon in Anaheim on that night and near the scene of the disturbance; that he was drinking and became intoxicated; that the peace officer named in the information began to search for the person who had stabbed the other and in the course of his search, and about two hours after the cutting affray had taken place, he came upon appellant, who was standing on the sidewalk of one of the streets; that appellant immediately pulled from his pocket a revolver which was found afterwards to have been loaded; that the officer forthwith disarmed him, struck him over the head, and handcuffed him to a tree, where he left him for a time and continued his search for the man who had used the knife. It was not shown as to whether the latter was ever arrested, or whether in fact he had been guilty of the crime of disturbing the peace as charged in the information; but whether he was so guilty or not, all of the evidence showed that at the time the officer encountered appellant it was, as before mentioned, about two hours after the cutting affray had occurred. But conceding that proof of a resistance offered to the officer subsequent to the time of the commission of the alleged disturbance of the peace could properly be made under the information, still there is an entire want of any proof, direct or by circumstance, to show that the intent of appellant at the time the officer encountered him was to delay or obstruct the officer in his endeavors to find and arrest the man designated as Gonsales. If the officer had attempted properly to arrest appellant and he had met with such resistance as was shown, after the appellant had been apprised of the purpose to arrest him and of the fact that the man attempting so to do was a peace officer, then a conviction might have been proper; but such was not the charge upon which appellant was being tried; neither was he being tried for an assault committed against the officer. The record has been carefully scrutinized, and the examination thereof leaves no doubt as to the correctness of the conclusion that appellant was improperly convicted.

The judgment and order are reversed.

PEOPLE v. HARDEN. (Cr. 466.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. May 20, 1914.)

1. WITNESSES (§ 79*)—INCOMPETENCY—BURDEN OF SHOWING.

In a prosecution under Pen. Code, § 288, for lewd and lascivious conduct with a child under 14, the burden of showing the incompetency of the child, who was within one month of six years of age, within Code Civ. Proc. § 1880, defining persons incompetent to testify, and including children under 10 years who appear incapable of receiving just impressions of the facts to which they testify or of relating them truly, was upon the party objecting to its competency.

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1153*)—APPEAL—DISCRETION OF TRIAL COURT—RULING ON COMPETENCY OF WITNESS.

In a prosecution for lewd and lascivious conduct with a child under 14, the action of the trial court after an examination of the child, who was within one month of six years of age, showing that she knew the difference between truth and falsehood, and appreciated the moral obligation to tell the truth, in permitting her to be sworn and to testify as a witness, was not an abuse of discretion.

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1144*)—APPEAL—CONCLUSIVENESS OF VERDICT — PASSION AND PREJUDICE.

In a prosecution for lewd and lascivious conduct with a child under 14, evidence for the state in an essential feature held so thoroughly discredited, and in part so inherently improbable, as to render it of little value, so that the court was justified in assuming that a verdict of conviction was obtained as the result of passion or prejudice.

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1159*)—APPEAL—CONCLUSIVENESS OF VERDICT.

Appellate courts will not ordinarily disturb a verdict upon the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence, when there is a conflict in the evidence, though the rule may be departed from in exceptional cases in which the preponderance of evidence against the verdict is so great as to produce a conviction that in rendering it the jury were influenced by passion or prejudice.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Frank A. Harden was convicted of lewd and lascivious conduct with a child under 14 years of age, and from the judgment and the order denying him a new trial, he appeals. Reversed.

A. G. Lyon, of San Francisco, for appellant. Atty. Gen. U. S. Webb and Deputy Atty. Gen. John H. Riordan, for the People.

PER CURIAM. The defendant in this case after two trials was convicted of the felony defined by section 288 of the Penal Code. He was sentenced to 12 years confinement in the state prison at San Quentin. The appeal is from the judgment and the order denying him a new trial.

The information generally follows the language of the statute defining the crime of which the defendant was convicted.

[1, 2] A reversal is urged primarily upon the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict. Incidentally it is insisted that the trial court abused its discretion in permitting the child alleged to have been the victim of the crime to be sworn, and to testify as a witness upon the trial. At the close of the trial of the case the child was within one month of being six years old; but we are not prepared to say that the ruling of the trial court, permitting her to be sworn and to testify as a witness, was an abuse of discretion. Upon the objection of the defendant that the child was under 10 years of age, and apparently incapable of receiving just impressions of the facts concerning which she was to be examined, she was subjected to a very thorough examination as to her competency by the trial court. We think it was sufficiently shown that she knew the difference between truth and falsehood and appreciated the moral obligation to tell the truth. The burden of showing the incompetency of the child within the meaning of section 1880 of the Code of Civil Procedure is upon the party objecting (People v. Craig, 111 Cal. 460, 44 Pac. 186), and the determination of the trial judge is conclusive upon this court in the absence, as here, of an affirmative showing of an abuse of discretion. People v. Bernal, 10 Cal. 66; People v. Baldwin, 117 Cal. 244, 49 Pac. 186; Clark v. Finnegan, 127 Iowa, 644, 103 N. W. 970.

No claim is made that the testimony of the child, if capable of belief, is not alone sufficient to support the verdict; but in this behalf it is earnestly urged that her testimony and that of her mother, when considered in the light of many and material contradictions, and in conjunction with the conduct of the mother following the commission of the offense, must be held by this court to be so inherently incredible as to be no evidence at all.

Briefly stated, the record shows the facts and circumstances immediately preceding and attending the commission of the offense to be as follows: The defendant was a married man living with his wife and nine year old daughter. On the 2d day of January, 1913, the defendant in person rented from the mother of the child housekeeping apartments in the second story of a dwelling house in San Francisco, the lower floor of which was then occupied as a home by the mother and her child. On the 3d of January, 1913, the defendant went to the home of the mother for the purpose of sweeping the apartments which he had rented, and while thus engaged the child entered the apartments. The child was the only witness who testified to the actual commission of the offense; and her story, as told in her testimony, is to the following effect: She with her little broom joined the defendant in the work of sweeping, and while so engaged the defendant committed the alleged offense. Thereupon the child went downstairs in response to a call from her mother. In passing it may be well to note that the mother subsequently testified that when she called to the child to come downstairs "Mr. Harden (the defendant) stepped to the doorway and said that she was having a good time, and begged me to let her stay there when she was having a good time. I at first told him no, and then * * * I said that she could stay." The defendant, as a witness in his own behalf, while admitting the presence of the child in his apartments on the occasion referred to, absolutely denied the story of the child. The testimony of the child upon direct and cross-examination with reference to the details of many minor, but nevertheless material, matters is in manifest conflict. A discussion of those details might in part serve to show the uncertain and unsatisfactory nature of the child's testimony. Such a discussion, however, is not absolutely necessary to the development of the paramount point in the case, and therefore a due regard for decency prompts us to pass on to other features of the child's testimony which alone will suffice to serve the purpose in hand.

Upon direct examination the child stated that she had told her mother all of the things concerning the defendant's conduct which she had testified to in court. She was positive that she did not tell her mother of what the defendant did to her until after he moved in, but how long after she could not remember. She did not know how long a day or a week was. Her mother told her never to go to the defendant's apartments again. At first she said that she never again went upstairs to the defendant's apartments, and then she said that she had gone there on several occasions, and alone, for the purpose of playing with the defendant's child. During the cross-examination it was admitted by the district attorney that the child had "testified correctly" at the preliminary examination. Thereupon the record of the child's testimony as given at the preliminary examination was read in evidence, wherein it appears that she knew how long a day was; that she knew that "every seven days is Sunday," and that five Sundays had passed before she told her mother of what the defendant had done to her. At this point in the cross-examination the record of the child's testimony as given upon the first trial of the case was read in evidence, which showed the following questions and answers:

> "Q. Did you tell her the same day? A. Well, yes. Q. Wasn't it five or six days afterwards? A. No, the same day in the nighttime. Q. The same day in the nighttime you told her? A. Yes. Q. Now Maxine, you remember, little girl, that you testified before in this case? * * * A. Yes. Q. * * * Did you tell the other judge that you did not tell your mother until five Sundays went by? A. I don't remember. Q. Don't you think it was five Sundays passed before you told you mother? A. No. Q. Didn't you tell the judge that? A. I don't remember. Q. Now, Maxine, do you tell me now and all these gentlemen that you told your mother the same night? A. Yes. Q. * * * They [the Hardens] have a little baby, haven't they? A. Yes. Q. And you used to go up there every day and play with the little baby? A. Not every day. Q. Almost every day? A. Yes. Q. And mamma went up with you? A. Yes, sir. Q. And Mr. and Mrs. Harden were there? A. Yes. Q. And mamma did not tell you to keep away from there? A. No."

Further along in the cross-examination of the child she testified that after she had first told of the defendant's misconduct her mother had not mentioned the subject to her again, and that her mother did not tell her what she was to say upon the trial. Here the record of the child's testimony taken at the preliminary examination was again called into evidence, and showed that she had testified that her mother had told her what to say at the preliminary examination concerning the alleged conduct of the defendant, and also to say that she had told her mother of such conduct on the day of its occurrence.

It will thus be seen that the testimony of the child upon the second trial of the case concerning the time when she told her mother of what the defendant did to her is in pronounced and irreconcilable conflict with her testimony upon the same subject given at the first trial of the case, and that her testimony upon both trials in the particular stated was hopelessly at variance with her testimony as given at the preliminary examination. We cannot conceive of a plausible theory, and none has been suggested, upon which the jury might have rightfully reconciled the manifest and material variance in the child's testimony, as given at various times upon the vital question as to when she first informed her mother of the defendant's conduct; and the clear conflict in her testimony as given from time to time relative to the equally important question as to whether or not her mother had told her not to go to the defendant's apartments again is apparently incapable of explanation. At all events, no explanation of the uncertainties and inconsistencies appearing in the child's testimony was made or attempted at the trial, and no such explanation has been made or attempted here upon behalf of the people; and when we consider the uncertainties and apparently irreconcilable inconsistencies appearing in the child's testimony as a whole, in conjunction with the undisputed and unexplained fact that the child was told by her mother what to say with reference to certain essential features of the alleged offense, we are of the opinion that the question of the defendant's guilt or innocence was not carefully and dispassionately considered by the jury.

[3, 4] This conclusion is fortified by a consideration of the mother's testimony. She testified upon cross-examination in substance that, notwithstanding the fact that the child had informed her of the offense within two or three days after its commission, she never mentioned the subject to either the defendant or his wife; that thereafter the child with the knowledge of the mother visited the apartments of the defendant to play with the latter's child; that on several occasions during six or seven weeks following the offense she, the mother, visited the family of the defendant; that such visits occurred as often as two or three times a week, and that upon some, if not all, of those occasions the defendant was present; that the defendant upon at least one occasion after the alleged commission of the offense entered her apartments and conversed with her generally. In short, it is an undisputed and unexplained fact in the case that for six or seven weeks following the alleged commission of the offense as told by the child, the mother of her own volition cultivated and continued friendly social relations with the defendant and his family. This admitted and unexplained fact tended strongly, we think, to show either that the child had not told her mother of the alleged offense, or that the mother gave no credence to the story told by the child. This must be so, we think, because it is altogether inconceivable that the mother would so long suffer in silence the shame and indignity alleged to have been inflicted upon her child. Without exception the first impulse of a mother would be to openly denounce the defilement of her daughter, and then drive the defiler from her home into the hands of the police. That the mother did not do so in the present case seems to us to be inherently improbable, and was a circumstance which, unexplained and considered in conjunction with the clear contradictions appearing in the testimony of the child, utterly discredited in its entirety the evidence upon which the conviction of the defendant rests. Under such circumstances "it is inconceivable that a jury, free from passion or prejudice, would not at least have entertained a reasonable doubt as to the guilt of the defendant." People v. Hamilton, 46 Cal. 540. In other words, it is our opinion that the testimony adduced upon behalf of the people in the present case was in an essential feature so thoroughly discredited, and in part so inherently improbable, as to render it upon the whole of little, if any, value as evidence; and therefore we are justified in assuming that the verdict obtained was the result of passion or prejudice rather than a calm and impartial judgment resulting from a dispassionate consideration of the evidence. People v. Benson, 6 Cal. 221, 65 Am. Dec. 506; People v. Brown, 47 Cal. 447; People v. Ardaga, 51 Cal. 371.

In arriving at this conclusion we are not unmindful of the general rule, and the reason therefor, that appellate courts will not ordinarily disturb a verdict upon the ground of insufficiency of the evidence when there is conflict in the evidence. As was said in the case of People v. Hamilton, supra:

> "The rule is a most salutary one, and ought not to be lightly departed from. Nevertheless there are exceptional cases, in which the preponderance of evidence against the verdict is so great as to produce a conviction that in rendering it the jury must have been under the influence of passion or prejudice. * * * A charge of so heinous a nature, when supported by even the slightest evidence, arouses in the public mind an intense indignation against the supposed culprit; and it is not surprising that the same feeling sometimes finds its way into the jury box. That it did so in the present case we have no doubt."

The language just quoted applies with peculiar aptness, we think, to the facts of the case at bar. Upon the whole we are convinced that the ends of justice will be best subserved by a reversal of the judgment, and, if necessary, a retrial of the case. While it is not apparent that upon a new trial the testimony of the child could be truthfully reconciled and rendered more certain, or that the mother of the child might at this late date satisfactorily explain her conduct in the premises, nevertheless those are questions which the lower court and the district attorney, in the exercise of a sound discretion must determine.

For the reasons stated the judgment and order appealed from are reversed.

PEOPLE v. KISER. (Cr. 318.)

1. Witnesses (§ 269*)—Cross-Examination.

Where a state's witness testified that she saw decedent outside of accused's apartments when decedent came to the house, but did not notice his appearance, a question on cross-examination, whether decedent presented any strange appearance on entering the door to accused's apartments, was properly excluded as not responsive to the direct examination.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. §§ 949–954; Dec. Dig. § 269.*]

2. Homicide (§ 165*) — Evidence — Admissibility.

Where accused, who had killed his wife and a third person, was tried for the killing of the third person, and it was shown incidentally that the wife was also killed, and accused was permitted to show the principal facts as to the relations of all the parties, accused could not complain of the exclusion of evidence as to his relations with his wife, and thereby prevent the jury from understanding that he did not intend to kill her.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. § 319; Dec. Dig. § 165.*]

3. Criminal Law (§ 552*)—Evidence—Question for Jury.

The direct testimony of accused may be so contradicted by circumstantial evidence alone that the jury need not believe it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1257, 1259–1262; Dec. Dig. § 552.*]

4. Homicide (§ 165*) — Evidence — Admissibility.

Where accused, who had killed his wife and a third person, was tried for killing the third person, and the court permitted evidence of the previous relations of the parties to determine whether accused, as a reasonable man, was actually in fear for his life, objections to questions as to the circumstances of the third person leaving the woman prior to her marriage to accused, and as to what accused might have told a witness about a quarrel between him and his wife long before his marriage to her, were properly sustained as calling for evidence too remote.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. § 319; Dec. Dig. § 165.*]

5. Witnesses (§ 268*) — Cross-Examination —Proper Cross-Examination.

Where a state's witness testified to hearing shots fired and to seeing the wife of accused running out of the house, a question on cross-examination whether the witness had any conversation with any of the officers, and what they told her as to the shooting of decedent, was properly excluded as not proper cross-examination.

6. Witnesses (§ 270*)—Cross-Examination—Relevancy.

The rule that where a part of a conversation has been proved the remainder may be brought out by the opposing party on cross-examination is subject to the limitation that the court may exclude the parts of the conversation not relevant to the part introduced, and where questions allowed on cross-examination covered the direct examination, it was not error to exclude other questions calling for a part of the conversation which was on immaterial matters.

7. Homicide (§ 339*)—Harmless Error—Erroneous Rulings on Evidence.

Where the relations of accused to his wife and decedent were fully shown, and it was shown that the wife had, on Friday prior to the killing of decedent on Sunday, stated to accused that decedent had said to the wife that he would get even with her for marrying accused, the error in sustaining an objection to a question asked accused whether his wife told him whether she was afraid that decedent would carry out his threats was not prejudicial to accused, though the fact of the wife being afraid might have furnished accused, who had never met decedent, with some ground of apprehension.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. § 714; Dec. Dig. § 339.*]

8. Criminal Law (§ 1037*)—Misconduct of District Attorney—Assignment of Misconduct.

The misconduct of the district attorney will not be considered on appeal, where no assignment of misconduct was made at the time.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1691, 2645; Dec. Dig. § 1037.*]

9. Criminal Law (§ 829*) — Instructions — Sufficiency.

Where the court charged that the jury could not go outside the evidence, and could not reject arbitrarily the evidence of any witness, but must fairly consider all the evidence, that accused was presumed to be innocent unless proven guilty, and that if, on the proof, there was reasonable doubt, accused was entitled to an acquittal, the refusal to charge that if any juror should be of the opinion that accused had not been proved to be guilty to a moral certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt, the juror should vote in favor of acquittal, and should adhere to his opinion until convinced to a moral certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt of the guilt of accused, was not prejudicial.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank R. Willis, Judge.

Elijah Franklin Kiser was convicted of murder in the second degree, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Earl Rogers, H. L. Giesler, and W. H. Dehm, all of Los Angeles, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and George Beebe, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CONREY, P. J. The defendant was brought to trial upon an information charging him with the crime of murder in the killing of one Harry Sharpley, a human being. Upon a verdict of guilty of murder in the second degree, judgment was entered that the defendant be imprisoned for a term of 10 years in the state prison at San Quentin.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

On Sunday morning, September 7, 1913, the defendant and his wife, Gertrude Kiser, were living on South Wall street in the city of Los Angeles in two rooms which they had occupied for about three days. With them were two children of Mrs. Kiser. The daughter, Lucille, was 13 years old, and the boy, Ralph, was 9 years old. At about 9 o'clock on the morning of September 7th, the defendant with his wife and the two children were in the rooms above mentioned. At that time Harry Sharpley, having been admitted to the hallway dividing the two sections of the house, knocked on the door of the Kiser apartments and was admitted. Sharpley had breakfast with the family, and the children went out to play. After some time defendant and Sharpley went out and walked the street together for a few blocks and then returned to the Kiser rooms. Finally, at about 12 o'clock, the defendant fired five shots from a revolver and killed both his wife and Sharpley. Two shots took effect upon Mrs. Kiser and two upon Sharpley. The defendant is the only surviving eyewitness of the tragedy.

The defendant testified to facts which, if true, would prove that Sharpley was the aggressor; that Sharpley had assumed a threatening attitude toward Mrs. Kiser; that she screamed and defendant called on Sharpley to stop; that thereupon Sharpley struck the defendant; that defendant then began to fire and continued to fire while the two men struggled against each other; that the bullets which struck Mrs. Kiser were not intended for her; and that the shooting of Sharpley was wholly in self-defense. By the testimony of several witnesses it was shown that Mrs. Kiser ran out of the house after she was hit. Both of the children testified that several shots were fired after Mrs. Kiser came outside, and this testimony is not contradicted. According to this evidence, Sharpley was killed by shots which were fired after Mrs. Kiser ran out of the house.

Mrs. Kiser had lived with Sharpley at the city of Salt Lake and at the city of San Diego, but was not his wife. Lucille said on direct examination that her mother and Sharpley were married at San Diego, and on her cross-examination said that they were married at Salt Lake City. In both of these statements the witness was probably mistaken. Throughout the trial it was assumed, both by the prosecution and by the defense, that the woman in question was not the wife of Sharpley, and defendant has no ground for complaint that the court refused to allow testimony that her marriage to Kiser was a valid marriage. Sharpley having left this woman at San Diego in the spring of 1913, she ascertained the address of defendant, Kiser, and wrote to him about her dependent circumstances. He thereupon went to San Diego and married her. Without objection from the state, he was permitted to testify that she was his wife from and after the time of that marriage, which occurred on June 3, 1913. Soon after the last-mentioned date Sharpley returned to San Diego, but there was never any personal meeting between him and Kiser until September 7th. The defendant says that when Sharpley returned to San Diego the defendant had trouble with his wife about this man, that his wife asked him to come to Los Angeles, and that if he would do so, "we probably would not have any more trouble." The family arrived at Los Angeles and took the rooms on Wall street on the Thursday preceding Sunday, September 7th. On Friday the defendant bought the pistol with which he did the shooting the following Sunday. According to his own testimony, he told the officers after the shooting that he bought it "to protect my home with, and so that man didn't come there and harm my wife, myself, and my family." On Thursday, the 4th, Mrs. Kiser wrote a letter to Sharpley at Riverside, and it was read by the defendant before it was mailed. According to the defendant's testimony, she told Sharpley in this letter that they had arrived in Los Angeles, and that if he wanted to see them he would have to come up here, and gave him the number of the house where they were living. According to Lucille's testimony, Kiser told his wife what she was to say in the letter, but he denies this. It is manifest that there is evidence entirely sufficient to support the verdict of murder in the second degree. The only questions requiring discussion here relate to the order denying defendant's motion for a new trial and the alleged errors claimed as grounds for a new trial.

[1] The first point is that the court refused to allow evidence of the manner, demeanor, and sayings of Sharpley when he arrived at the house of defendant. This claim is unfounded. The defendant testified fully about Sharpley's visit there from beginning to end. It is true that the court did not allow the state's witness Elizabeth Dougherty to testify on cross-examination in answer to the question as to whether Sharpley presented "any strange appearance" upon entering the door to defendant's apartments. Mrs. Dougherty had just testified that, although she was in the hallway outside the defendant's apartments when Sharpley came to the house, she did not notice his appearance. The question ruled out was not responsive to any part of the direct examination, and the objection was properly sustained.

[2] We do not agree with the contention that the court by its rulings tended to prevent the jury from understanding that the defendant did not intend to kill his wife. Under this head it is claimed that the court shut out very largely the testimony offered as to Kiser's relations with his wife. We think that there was no prejudicial limiting of such testimony. The charge upon which defendant was being tried related solely to the killing of Sharpley. Incidentally it had to be shown as part of the transaction that Mrs. Kiser also was killed. Defendant was allowed to show the principal facts as to the relations of all the parties, as we have outlined them in the preceding paragraphs. No specific assignments of errors in these rulings are pointed out in the briefs, except those to which we shall refer.

[3] It is claimed that there is no evidence disproving Kiser's statements as to what took place during his struggle with Sharpley. It is true that there is no testimony directly disproving those statements, but the circumstantial evidence was such that the jury was not obliged to believe the defendant. It is argued that "the bullets appear to have all been fired while the revolver was held in an upward direction as though fired by one whose adversary had the upper hand." This is not true, except possibly as to the bullet which passed through the arm of Mrs. Kiser and the bullet which passed through the arm of Sharpley. The bullet which killed Sharpley passed through his lungs from the left to the right side, ranging downward. The bullet which killed Mrs. Kiser entered her back and ranged very slightly upward.

[4] The court did not err in such limitations as it placed upon the testimony showing the relations between Sharpley and Mrs. Kiser and between Mr. and Mrs. Kiser with reference to Sharpley. The rulings of the court in sustaining objections made to questions about the circumstances of Sharpley leaving the woman at San Diego prior to her marriage to Kiser were proper rulings. Those circumstances were not material to the issues before the court. The same is true of the court's refusal to allow the witness Beaumont to relate what the defendant may have told him about a quarrel between him and Mrs. Kiser in Kansas, which was long before his marriage to her. The court sustained objection to a question calling on the defendant to relate the circumstances of his first meeting with Gertrude Kiser at Wichita, Kan. The object of the question was stated to be to show the state of his mind at and leading up to the time of the tragedy. This was entirely too remote from the transactions under inquiry before the court. It was proper that a reasonably fair and full statement of the previous relations of the parties should be permitted to go to the jury, so that it might determine whether or not the defendant as a reasonable man was actually in fear of danger to his life. This the court did permit without abuse of its power to regulate the trial by cutting off useless extensions of the inquiry to remote and irrelevant matters.

It is claimed that the court erred in refusing to admit evidence of Sharpley's statements concerning the defendant immediately before the shooting. Apparently the question referred to was one addressed to Mrs. Dougherty, and therefore the statement, if any was made, must have been some hours before the shooting. It appears from her own testimony that she did not hear any statement made by Sharpley concerning the defendant. She testified that her apartment was separated from the Kiser apartment by a narrow hall; that she went to the main door of the house when Sharpley arrived, and Sharpley said:

> "Is there a woman here with two small children? (Objection was made to this statement, and the objection was sustained.) Q. Then you heard no conversation between Mr. and Mrs. Kiser that morning? A. No, sir; I did not. Q. Did you hear any conversation between any persons in that apartment on that Sunday morning? A. No, sir; I did not."

There was nothing in any of the questions asked, nor in any of the statements made by defendant's counsel to the court, which indicated a desire on the part of the defendant to prove by Mrs. Dougherty that Sharpley had made any threats against defendant, or any hostile statements concerning him, or that any such threats or statements were brought to the attention of defendant. The record does not sustain the contention that the court wrongfully directed the witness to leave the stand and cut off counsel from further interrogation. The court did not refuse any request for further examination of the witness.

[5] On cross-examination of Mrs. Sproul, who had testified for the prosecution in regard to hearing shots fired, and that she saw Mrs. Kiser run out of the house, defendant's counsel asked her if she had any conversation with any of the officers in the case and what they told her in regard to the shooting. At this point the court interfered and directed defendant's counsel that he need not ask the witnesses to tell what the officers told them. The direct examination of this witness had been limited solely to what she herself heard and saw, and no suggestion was made of a reason for asking her about conversation with the officers. All of the evidence indicates that no officer was present when the shooting occurred, or near enough to hear the sound thereof. The questions were not proper cross-examination for any purpose shown or indicated to the court.

[6] The court did not err in sustaining objections to questions asked on cross-examination of Detective Myers, a San Diego officer who testified on behalf of the state. Myers had testified to statements made by Kiser to him at San Diego at a time when Kiser was complaining that Sharpley was interfering with his family, statements to the effect that he would "take it into his own hands." On cross-examination, in reply to questions by defendant's attorney, the witness was allowed to review this same subject-matter, including also Kiser's statement to the witness that Kiser was married to the woman, and was properly treating and providing for her and her children. The only questions ruled out (so far as not covered by other questions and answers permitted) were: "Did he tell you as to his family relations, how they were with Mrs. Kiser?" Also, "Did he tell you about Sharpley deserting Mrs. Kiser in some town in Kansas?" The contention is that the court erred because the defendant had the right to disclosure of all of the conversation described in the direct examination of the witness. The rule that where part of a conversation has been shown in testimony the remainder of that conversation may be brought out by the opposing party on cross-examination is necessarily subject to the qualification that the court may exclude those portions of the conversation not relevant to the items thereof which have been introduced. A party claiming that the court has erred in its exercise of discretion as to such a matter of cross-examination must show by the record some definite and legal purpose in the asking of the excluded question. Here an examination of the questions and answers which were admitted on cross-examination, shows that they covered the topics of the direct examination very fully, and that the excluded questions, so far as not included in other admitted questions, were upon immaterial matters.

With respect to the court's ruling in sustaining objections to questions asked on cross-examination of the witness Glenn and on cross-examination of the witness Mrs. Boulay, we reach a conclusion similar to that discussed in the preceding paragraph. The additional items sought to be produced were either not material or were so far collateral and of minor importance that the court was justified in limiting the testimony, and no one was prejudiced thereby.

[7] The defendant testified that on Friday evening, September 5th, Mrs. Kiser told him that Sharpley had said that he would get even with her for getting married. The court then sustained objection to the following question asked of defendant by his counsel: "Did Mrs. Kiser say to you whether or not she was afraid, and had any fears of Sharpley carrying out his threats?" This objection should have been overruled. The threat was shown by the preceding answer. The only material matter then remaining was whether the defendant had any reasonable ground to entertain fears concerning Sharpley as to that threat. But in view of the fact that Mrs. Kiser was acquainted with Sharpley, and the defendant had never met him, the fact of her being afraid might have furnished the defendant with some ground of apprehension. We are of the further opinion, however, that this error of the court, when the matter is considered in connection with all of the evidence, does not furnish a reasonable ground for reversal of the order denying a new trial. The facts, as to the relations of these parties, were very fully shown to the jury.

[8] After the witness Mrs. Boulay had testified for the defendant as to his good reputation at San Diego, the district attorney asked some questions about a supposed quarrel between Kiser and his wife. Upon objection being made, the district attorney said: "That's the statement she made to the officers." Complaint is now made that this was misconduct on the part of the district attorney. It is a sufficient answer to say that no assignment of misconduct was made at the time. People v. Babcock, 160 Cal. 545, 117 Pac. 549.

[9] The court refused defendant's request for the following instruction to the jury:

> "If any one, or any member, of you, after deliberating on and considering all the evidence in this case, shall be of the opinion that the defendant has not been proved to be guilty to a moral certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt, those of you entertaining such opinion should vote in favor of acquittal, and should so adhere to your opinion until convinced to a moral certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt of the guilt of the defendant of the alleged crime by and from the evidence and the law alone in this case."

The defendant relies upon People v. Dole, 122 Cal. 486, 495, 55 Pac. 581, 68 Am. St. Rep. 50, where it was held that a very similar instruction should have been given. In People v. Perry, 144 Cal. 748, 756, 78 Pac. 284, 287, it is pointed out that the judgment in People v. Dole was not reversed solely or principally upon the refusal to give that instruction, and the court holds that the refusal to give such instruction may be cured by the giving of other instructions clearly pointing out the duty of the jurors to base their verdict upon the evidence alone. In his concurring opinion in the Perry Case, Justice Shaw said:

> "Upon further consideration of the question I am satisfied that the refusal of such an instruction should not be considered an error of sufficient importance to justify a reversal in any case where the jury are fully instructed that the verdict must be based upon the evidence alone."

In the case at bar the jury were told very plainly that they had no right to go outside of the evidence admitted by the court and no right to reject arbitrarily the evidence of any witness, and that they must fairly consider all of the evidence in the case. They were further told that every person is presumed to be innocent until he is proven guilty, and that if upon such proof there is reasonable doubt remaining, the accused is entitled to the benefit of it by an acquittal. We conclude that even if the court's refusal to give the requested instruction was an error, nevertheless, it was error without prejudice.

The judgment of the court and the order denying defendant's motion for a new trial are affirmed.

WRIGHT et ux. v. BOGGESS et al.

(Civ. 1464.)

1. Pleading (§ 35*)—Surplusage — Action for Breach of Covenant.

Where a complaint, in addition to alleging the breach of a covenant against incumbrances in a deed, alleged a contract whereby plaintiffs agreed to convey to defendants certain real property, subject to investigation by one of the defendants as to its value in exchange for property of the defendants, which was to be free of incumbrances other than a certain mortgage and lease, and that such property was incumbered by the lien of an assessment thereon, such allegations as to the contract were mere surplusage, there being no allegation that the defendant mentioned had ever inspected the property or approved it, that plaintiffs had ever conveyed their land in performance of the contract, or that there was any pretense on the part of either party to perform or comply with the contract.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 76–80; Dec. Dig. § 35.*]

2. Covenants (§ 107*)—Actions for Breach —Conditions Precedent—Payment of Incumbrance.

While a covenant against incumbrances is broken by the existence of an incumbrance as soon as made, it is merely a covenant to indemnify the grantee, and, until he has removed or extinguished the incumbrance, he cannot recover the amount thereof, especially in view of Civ. Code, § 3305, providing that the detriment caused by the breach of a covenant against incumbrances is the amount actually expended in extinguishing the principal or interest thereof.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Wellborn, Judge.

Action by S. H. Wright and wife against J. W. Boggess and others. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Reversed.

John E. Daly and James H. Daly, both of Long Beach, for appellants. Wm. M. Rex, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

SHAW, J. Action to recover damages for the breach of an implied covenant contained in a grant deed made by defendants to plaintiffs. Judgment went for plaintiffs, from which defendants appeal on the judgment roll.

[1] The complaint purports to declare a cause of action, not alone upon the implied covenants of the deed, but, in addition thereto, alleges that on May 20, 1913, plaintiffs and defendants entered into a written contract whereby plaintiffs agreed to convey to defendants a quarter section of land therein described for certain property owned by defendants, described as the Pacific Apartments. The agreement, as stated therein, was made subject to investigation by J. W. Boggess as to the value of plaintiffs' property which they proposed to give in exchange for the Pacific Apartments, which was to be free of all incumbrances other than a certain mortgage and lease; that defendants' property at the time of the execution of the contract was incumbered by an assessment for the cost of certain street work, which constituted a lien thereon in the sum of $327.90. Conceding the truth of these allegations, no facts are set forth constituting a cause of action upon the contract, which, moreover, was made subject to the condition that J. W. Boggess should, after inspection of plaintiffs' property, approve the same. Whether he ever approved is not made to appear; nor is it alleged that plaintiffs performed their part of the contract by conveying their quarter section of land to defendants; indeed, so far as shown by the complaint, there was no pretense on the part of either or any of the parties to perform or comply with the terms of the contract. Hence, all reference in the complaint to the contract and the existence of an incumbrance against the property of defendants at the date of its execution was mere surplusage.

If a cause of action is alleged, it is by reason of the following allegations, wholly independent of and in nowise connected with the contract, namely: That on June 3, 1913, defendants executed a grant deed conveying the property therein described (which is identical with that described in the contract) to plaintiffs, the sole and only consideration therefor, as shown by the complaint, being the sum of $10; that by said grant there was implied on the part of defendants a covenant that the estate thereby conveyed was free of incumbrance done, made or suffered by the grantors, or any person claiming under them. It is further alleged:

> "That at the time of the execution of said grant deed the premises were subject to a tax or street lien theretofore duly assessed, charged and levied upon said premises by the city of Long Beach, county of Los Angeles, state of California, and the officers thereof, in the sum of $327.90, which tax was at the execution of said deed, and is now, by law a lien against said premises."

The court gave judgment for $327.90, and costs, as prayed for.

[2] Among other alleged grounds for reversal, appellants insist that the complaint fails to state a cause of action, and that it is insufficient to support the judgment. That the street assessment constituted an incumbrance upon the property must be admitted. Conceding also that such lien was covered by the covenant implied by the execution and delivery of the grant deed, and being an incumbrance done, made, or suffered by the grantor, nevertheless the complaint not only fails to show any payment or discharge of the lien, but affirmatively shows that the assessment "is now by law a lien against said premises." While the covenant against incumbrances was broken as soon as made (Salmon v. Vallejo, 41 Cal. 484), yet, as respects the measure of damages recoverable, it must be deemed merely a covenant to indemnify the grantee for damages or loss sustained. If plaintiffs have paid nothing toward removing or extinguishing the lien, they are not entitled to recover the amount thereof. Section 188, Rawle on Covenants for Title; Coburn v. Litchfield, 132 Mass. 449. Moreover, it is expressly provided by statute that:

> "The detriment caused by the breach of a covenant against incumbrances in a grant of an estate in real property is deemed to be the amount which has been actually expended by the covenantee in extinguishing either the principal or interest thereof." Section 3305, Civ. Code.

Since this is true, and the complaint not only is barren of any allegation showing the actual expenditure of any sum in the extinction of the lien, but affirmatively shows the continued existence thereof, it is clear that it fails to support the judgment rendered.

It is therefore reversed.

1. Executors and Administrators (§ 283*)—Disputed Claims—Jurisdiction—Probate Courts—Equity Powers.

The superior court, sitting in probate, is a court of general jurisdiction, with power to apply legal and equitable principles in the determination of questions arising in the administration of the estate, and hence, in proceedings to compel an administratrix to pay an allowed claim, it had jurisdiction to entertain and enforce a defense of set-off.

Jurisdiction of the superior court, sitting in probate, to allow a set-off in a proceeding against an administratrix to compel her to pay an allowed claim was not affected by the fact that the court could not award judgment in favor of the administratrix for any excess, the court being authorized by Code Civ. 5. Banks and Banking (§ 317*)—Insolvency—Set-Off.

Where an administratrix had a claim against a receiver of an insolvent trust company on an unpaid deposit account, and the receiver had a claim against the intestate, the superior court in the insolvency proceedings had jurisdiction to determine the validity of the claims and enforce the set-off.

6. Interest (§ 22*)—Claims against Decedent's Estate—Allowance—"Judgment."

Allowance of a claim against a decedent's estate prior to an order directing payment is not a "judgment," and hence does not draw interest at 7 per cent. per annum, under Civ. Code, § 1920, prescribing such rate on recovered judgments.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. V. Coffey, Judge.

Judicial settlement of the accounts of Teresa Bell, as administratrix of Thomas Bell, deceased. From an order directing the administratrix to pay an allowed claim in favor of the California Safe Deposit & Trust Company, she appeals. Reversed.

See, also, 141 Pac. 1181.

T. Z. Blakeman, of San Francisco, for appellant. Drown, Leicester & Drown, of San Francisco, for respondent.

LORIGAN, J. This appeal is from an order made in the estate of Bell, deceased, directing the appellant, administratrix, to pay an allowed claim of the California Safe Deposit & Trust Company, an insolvent corporation (hereafter to be designated the Trust Company or Bank), against said estate.

This and another appeal taken by the administratrix from an order of the superior court dismissing her petition in intervention, filed in the insolvency proceeding against said trust company (People, etc., v. California Safe Deposit & Trust Co., Respondent, Teresa Bell, as Administratrix, etc., Intervener and Appellant [No. S. F. 6487] 141 Pac. 1181) were presented together. The opinion of this court in the appeal last mentioned, filed this day, is referred to for a detailed statement of the facts under which the question involved here is presented. It may be stated, however, generally, as to the present appeal, that the respondent, as receiver of the trust company, petitioned the court in the matter of the estate of Bell, deceased, for an order directing the administratrix to pay a claim on a promissory note given for $40,- 000 and interest at 6 per cent. per annum, which Bell, at the time of his death, owed the said trust company, and which was presented and allowed in its favor against his estate, and filed on May 25, 1893. The balance claimed to be due (payment having been made by the estate from time to time) was $10,093.40, with interest at 7 per cent. per annum from May 25, 1898. The trust company or bank had been adjudged insolvent on January 14, 1908, the respondent appointed receiver to liquidate and settle its affairs, and it was alleged that said claim against the estate was an asset of the said insolvent trust company. All claims against the estate of Bell, save that of the trust company, had been paid and the estate was solvent.

The administratrix answered the petition of the receiver. She did not contest the allegations of the petition further than they were qualified by a set-off which she pleaded, and except that she denied that the claim ever bore interest at 7 per cent. per annum, or a greater rate than 6 per cent. per annum. Her principal defense, however, was a set-off, in support of which she alleged that long prior to the insolvency of the trust company or bank, and under an order of court appointing it depositary of the funds of the estate and directing her to deposit them with it, she had done so, and that at the time of the insolvency of said bank there was on deposit with it an amount in excess of $20,200 assets of said estate; that the total amount due on the claim of the said bank against the estate when the bank became insolvent did not exceed $15,000, and that there was a balance due from it to the administratrix of the estate, as such, the sum of $5,200. Her prayer was that the petition for payment by the bank be denied, and it be adjudged that at the date of its insolvency there was owing from it to the administratrix of said estate a balance of $5,200. In effect the position of the administratrix under her answer was that she had a right to have set off against the allowed claim of the bank its debt to her as administratrix and respecting the funds of the estate on deposit with it, in as far as they compensated each other at the time of the insolvency of the bank, and for a judgment over in her favor for any excess.

The receiver demurred to the answer of the administratrix on the grounds that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a set-off, and that the court had no jurisdiction of the alleged set-off. The court sustained the demurrer on the ground "that the court sitting in a probate matter had no jurisdiction to entertain the counterclaim or set-off pleaded by the said administratrix in her amended answer," and thereafter made an order in which it found that there was due the said bank from the estate the sum of $20,809.22, being unpaid principal in the sum of $10,093.40, and interest thereon from February 25, 1898, at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum; that the estate had ample funds out of which to make payment, and ordered the administratrix forthwith to pay the amount to the receiver. This appeal is from that order. In as far as this appeal may involve the question (conceding for the present that the court in a probate proceeding had jurisdiction to entertain such a defense) that the facts alleged in the answer of the administratrix did not constitute a defense of counterclaim or set-off, that question is disposed of in our opinion filed this day in the other appeal by the administratrix hereinabove referred to (S. F. No. 6487), where we held that they did.

[1] Now as to the question of jurisdiction. We are satisfied that the superior court, sitting in probate, had jurisdiction to entertain the defense of set-off interposed by the administratrix. It had jurisdiction of the estate of Bell and over all proceedings therein which included a determination of whether the bank was entitled to the order for payment of its allowed claim. It had jurisdiction of the parties in that particular proceeding and over the subject-matter. It is true that the superior court, sitting in probate, is limited in its jurisdiction to the extent that it must follow the mode of procedure provided by statute in the administration of the estate of a decedent and can only determine those questions or matters arising in the estate which it is authorized to do. Here the question whether a creditor is or is not entitled to an order for payment of his allowed claim arose in the proceeding in the administration of the estate. It was a controversy arising in the estate itself, and involved the right of the creditor to share in its assets, and was a question which the court, sitting in probate, was authorized to determine. The fact that, acting in probate, it may be called upon to apply legal or equitable rules or principles in considering a question it is called upon to determine does not affect its jurisdiction to do so. The superior court, sitting in probate, is a court of general jurisdiction, and, in determining any question arising in the administration of an estate which it is expressly authorized to decide, it may bring to its aid the full equitable and legal powers with which, as the superior court, it is invested. As said by this court in Burris v. Kennedy, 108 Cal. 336, 41 Pac. 459:

> "The superior court, while sitting in matters of probate, is the same as it is while sitting in cases in equity, in cases at law, or in special proceedings; and, when it has jurisdiction of the subject-matter of a case falling within either of these classes, it has power to hear and determine, in the mode provided by law, all questions of law and fact, the determination of which is ancillary to a proper judgment."

[2] Respondent does not point out why the court in the probate proceeding did not have jurisdiction to entertain this defense of set-off, except it asserts that by the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure (sections 438, 440) the right of set-off is limited to actions between parties, and that this proceeding for an order directing the payment of an allowed claim is not an action; further that, even where a set-off is asserted in actions, it can only be asserted in those actions where a several judgment might be had between the parties, and this cannot be done here, because the court, if it found that the amount due to the administratrix exceeded the amount due to the bank, could not render a judgment against the receiver for such excess. And respondent asserts that the only way the administratrix could establish or enforce her claim of set-off would be in an action against the receiver of the insolvent bank. We think, however, that a proceeding in the estate of a decedent to obtain the order sought here may be regarded as an action within the terms of the sections of the Code referred to, respecting counterclaims or set-offs.

[3] Nor does it affect the question of jurisdiction that the court in such proceeding may not award the judgment for any excess. It can, as section 440 declares may be done, adjudge that the two demands are compensated in as far as they equal each other, leaving to the administratrix the right of asserting a claim for any excess in the insolvency proceeding where the affairs of the trust company are being settled.

[4] Nor is there any merit in the claim that the administratrix should have resorted to an action against the receiver to establish her set-off. She might, it is true, have intervened in the insolvency proceeding against the bank, if she so desired. The superior court, sitting in probate and in this proceeding which the bank inaugurated to enforce payment of its claim, had jurisdiction to determine the validity of her set-off.

[5] But so had the superior court in the insolvency proceeding against the bank, had she intervened there; the court in either proceeding had jurisdiction of the subject-matter, and the administratrix had the right to present it for determination in either proceeding or in both.

[6] Aside from these questions of jurisdiction, the further question is presented of the validity of the order made by the court directing the payment of the claim as regards the rate of interest computed on it. The court allowed interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from May 25, 1898, up to the date of the order and until payment of the claim. The allowance of interest at the rate of 7 per cent. up to the date of the order of payment, instead of 6 per cent., was erroneous. In allowing the higher rate, the court doubtless proceeded on the theory that, when the claim was allowed and approved, it ranked as a judgment and drew interest at 7 per cent. per annum, as provided by section 1920 of the Civil Code, respecting judgments recovered in the courts of this state. But it is settled by our decisions that the allowance of a claim against a solvent estate is not equivalent to an ordinary judgment. It is a judgment only in a qualified sense, and does not attain the force and dignity of an absolute judgment until an order of court is made directing the executor or administrator to pay it. Until then it is simply an acknowledged debt of the estate, bearing interest at the contract rate. It is only after such an order is made that it bears interest at the statutory rate. Richardson v. Diss, 127 Cal. 58, 59 Pac. 197; Haub v. Leggett, 160 Cal. 491, 117 Pac. 556. The note by its terms bore interest at 6 per cent. per annum, and it was error, therefore, for the court to allow interest at more than that rate from May 25, 1898, to the date of the order for payment.

The order appealed from is reversed.

PEOPLE, by WEBB, Atty. Gen., v. CALIFORNIA SAFE DEPOSIT & TRUST CO. et al. (BELL, Intervener). (S. F. 6487.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 7, 1914. Rehearing Denied Aug. 6, 1914.)

1. Banks and Banking (§ 317*)—Insolvency—Set-Off.

Where an administratrix had a claim against a receiver of an insolvent trust company on an unpaid deposit account, and the receiver had a claim against the intestate, the superior court, in the insolvency proceedings, had jurisdiction to determine the validity of the claims and enforce the set-off.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Banks and Banking, Cent. Dig. § 1222; Dec. Dig. § 317.*]

2. Banks and Banking (§ 317*)—Insolvency—Deposit Claims—Set-Off.

Since the rule that a receiver acquires no greater interest in the estate than the one from whom he acquires title, and that choses in action pass to him subject to the rights of set-off existing at his appointment, is applicable to insolvent banks, where a trust company became insolvent having a claim against an intestate, and owing a claim on an unpaid deposit account in favor of the administratrix, she was entitled to set off the one against the other, and was not required to pay her indebtedness in full and accept a pro rata distribution with other creditors on her deposit claim.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Banks and Banking, Cent. Dig. § 1222; Dec. Dig. § 317.*]

3. Set-Off and Counterclaim (§ 41*)—Right to Set-Off—Mutuality.

Where an administratrix deposited funds in her hands as administratrix in a trust company which held an allowed claim against her intestate, want of mutuality was no defense against the administratrix's right to set off her deposit claim against the claim of the trust company's receiver for payment of the claim against the intestate.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Set-Off and Counterclaim, Cent. Dig. §§ 76–79, 81; Dec. Dig. § 41.*]

4. Banks and Banking (§ 315*)—Deposit of Funds by Administratrix—Special Deposit.

Funds belonging to an administratrix, and deposited with a trust company under an order of the court of probate directing such deposit to be withdrawn only on the order of the court, as authorized by St. 1891, p. 490, did not constitute a special deposit but was a mere general deposit creating the relationship of debtor and creditor between the administratrix and the trust company.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. V. Coffey, Judge.

Suit by the People, by U. S. Webb, Attorney General, against the California Safe Deposit & Trust Company and others, in which Teresa Bell, as administratrix of the estate of Thomas Bell, deceased, intervened. From an order sustaining a demurrer and dismissing intervener's petition, she appeals. Reversed.

T. Z. Blakeman, of San Francisco, for appellant. Drown, Leicester & Drown, of San Francisco, for respondents.

LORIGAN, J. The appeal in this case and another (Estate of Bell, Teresa Bell, as administratrix, Appellant, Frank J. Symmes as receiver of the California Safe Deposit & Trust Co., Claimant and Respondent [No. 6698] 141 Pac. 1179) were on application of the appellant ordered heard together on the ground that the parties in interest were the same and the controlling question in each case was the same. We shall consider and dispose of these appeals separately addressing our attention now to the one above entitled (No. 6487), which is an appeal from an order dismissing a petition in intervention filed by the appellant, administratrix of the estate of Thomas Bell, deceased.

It may be preliminarily stated, because unquestioned, that at the time of the filing of this petition in intervention there was pending in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco a case entitled People of the State of California ex rel. v. California Safe Deposit & Trust Co., in which, on January 14, 1908, a judgment had been entered adjudging the said California Safe Deposit & Trust Company (hereafter to be designated as the trust company or the bank) insolvent and appointing a receiver to wind up and settle its affairs, and that such insolvent estate was in process of settlement.

In that action, and on October 12, 1912, appellant, as administratrix of the estate of Thomas Bell, deceased, filed a petition in intervention containing the following allegations: That Thomas Bell, deceased, died testate in October, 1892; that his will was duly admitted to probate by the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco; that petitioner was appointed and qualified as administratrix with the will annexed, and that the estate of decedent is still pending unsettled in the said superior court; that said Thomas Bell, at the date of his death, was indebted to said California Safe Deposit & Trust Company on a promissory note payable to said trust company in the sum of $40,000 principal, and bearing, by the terms of said note, interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum; that the claim of said trust company thereon was presented to the then acting executors of the will of said deceased, was approved by them and allowed by the court in the sum of $40,000, and filed May 25, 1893; that afterwards, from time to time during a period of years, payments were made by the estate of Bell on said claim to said trust company, so that on December 19, 1907, there was due on said claim a balance of $10,093.40 principal, and interest thereon at 6 per cent. per annum from April 23, 1898. It is then alleged that on February 13, 1902, on application to the court by petitioner as administratrix of said estate for a reduction of her bond as such, the same was reduced from $300,000 to $20,000, and an order of court then made appointing and designating said trust company as the depositary of the funds of said estate and ordering and directing the administratrix to deposit with it all the moneys of the said estate; that said trust company accepted said appointment, and thereafter acted as such depositary until it became insolvent and ceased to do business; that petitioner, after the making of said order, from time to time deposited the funds of said estate with said trust company, and that there was on deposit with it on December 19, 1907, when it became insolvent and ceased to do business, a sum of money, funds of said estate, exceeding $20,200, no part of which has been paid to said administratrix; that the claim of said trust company against the estate of said Bell and the demand of said estate against said trust company became compensated as far as they equaled each other at the date of the insolvency and cessation of business of said trust company, and that thereby there still remained due to said estate from such trust company the sum of $5,200; that on July 6, 1909, an order of court was made directing the payment of all claims against the estate of Bell except the claim of said trust company, which was deferred for further consideration; that on July 14, 1911, said trust company applied in the matter of the estate of Bell for an order requiring the administratrix forthwith to pay to the receiver of said insolvent trust company said claim due to it from said estate; that petitioner in said proceeding resisted said application and asserted a claim that said money of said estate deposited with said trust company should be set off against the claim of said trust company so far as they equaled each other, but the superior court, in which the matter of said estate was pending, refused to entertain the claim of said estate for asserted want of jurisdiction; that, unless restrained, the receiver will proceed to enforce payment of the whole of the claim of said trust company, notwithstanding the fact that at the date of its insolvency it was indebted to said estate in a sum greater than the amount of its claim against said estate.

The prayer was that the court take cognizance of said respective claims and adjudge and determine the amount due on each; that they be adjudged to be compensated in as far as they equal each other, and for an adjudication determining the excess, if any, due from said trust company to the estate of Bell; that an injunction be issued restraining the receiver from further proceeding on the claim of said trust company in the matter of the estate of Bell, until the hearing of the petition in intervention.

The court, on the filing of the petition, granted the preliminary restraining order prayed for. Thereafter the receiver of the trust company demurred to the petition in intervention on the grounds that it did not state facts sufficient to entitle the petitioner to the relief prayed for, and that the court had no jurisdiction to entertain or grant it. The demurrer was sustained generally, and, petitioner declining to amend, an order was entered dismissing her petition. It is from this order that the present appeal is taken.

[1] Respondent insists that the court had no jurisdiction to entertain this petition in intervention. As we understand its petition, it is that the petitioner, as administratrix, should have brought an independent action against the receiver of the insolvent trust company. But no separate action was necessary. In the action of Bell ex rel. v. California Safe Deposit & Trust Co., in which the petition in intervention was filed, the court had control of the insolvent estate of the trust company for the purposes of liquidation and settlement, involving the settlement of the demands of all persons against said insolvent estate. It had jurisdiction of all claims, was a proper forum to adjust them, entertain and determine matters of proper set-off, adjudicate the right of a claimant to any balance against the funds of the trust company, and intervention in the insolvency proceeding was a proper course for the administratrix to have taken.

[2] Before approaching a discussion of the main question on this appeal, another point urged by respondent may be preliminarily disposed of. This is that in no event could the claim of the administratrix be allowed as a set-off against the trust company or bank after the latter had become insolvent; that on the insolvency of the bank its claim against the estate was an asset to be collected by the receiver and applied ratably to the payment of claims of creditors of the insolvent bank, including a pro rata payment only of the claim of the administratrix as a depositor; that to allow the claim of the administratrix as such depositor to be set off against the claim of the insolvent bank would be to defeat this right of pro rata distribution; that it would be an appropriation of this latter asset of the insolvent bank to the payment in full of the claim of the administratrix as a depositor and give her claim a preference to which it was not entitled over that of other depositors.

But the authorities do not sustain this contention. It is generally held that a receiver occupies no better position than that which was occupied by the party for whom he acts. He takes the property and rights of the one for whom he was appointed precisely in the same condition and subject to the same equities as existed before his appointment, and any defense, good against the original party, is good against the receiver.

> "The general rule is that a receiver acquires no greater interest in an estate than the one from whom he takes, and it follows that choses in action pass to him subject to any right of set-off existing at the time of his appointment." Pom. Eq. Remedies, vol. 1, §§ 186, 187.

This rule applies in the case of insolvent banks, so that the right of set-off is to be determined by the condition of things as they existed at the moment the bank became insolvent. Magee, Banks & Banking, p. 525; Scott v. Armstrong, 146 U. S. 499, 13 Sup. Ct. 148, 36 L. Ed. 1059; Lamb, Receiver, v. Morris, 118 Ind. 179, 20 N. E. 746, 4 L. R. A. 111; Davis v. Industrial Mfg. Co., 114 N. C. 321, 19 S. E. 371, 23 L. R. A. 322; State v. Brobston, 94 Ga. 95, 21 S. E. 146, 47 Am. St. Rep. 138.

Pomeroy, in his work just referred to (section 188), declares that:

> "The principles involved in a set-off against a receiver have received particular application in the case of receivers of insolvent banks, when suing parties who had money on deposit at the bank when it became insolvent. It is said to be well settled that, in a suit by a receiver of an insolvent bank upon a note or obligation due the bank, the defendant will be allowed to set off his deposit or certificate of deposit held by him at the time of the suspension of the bank."

Within these principles the right of set-off in the matter at bar is to be determined as of the time when the bank was adjudged insolvent, and, if that right was available to the respective claimants at that time, the insolvency of the bank did not defeat it.

[3] Now as to the main question presented in this case, which is whether the administratrix of the estate of Bell could, as such, set off the claim of that estate for money thereof on deposit with the trust company or bank when it became insolvent, against the allowed claim of said bank against said estate, based upon a liability of the decedent Bell; all other claims and debts of the estate being paid at the time the set-off was pleaded.

Counsel for respondent contend: That this may not be done. That the right to assert a counterclaim or set-off and the conditions under which it may be availed of are prescribed by sections 438 and 440 of our Code of Civil Procedure. That thereunder, as declared by this court in McKean v. German Savings Bank, 118 Cal. 334, 50 Pac. 656:

> "Cross-demands of contending parties * * * can be deemed compensated, as far as they equal each other, only under such circumstances as that if one party had brought an action against the other a counterclaim could have been set up."

That mutuality is essential to the right of set-off. And they insist that this mutuality does not exist in the present case; that the claim of the bank is based on a debt created by Thomas Bell prior to his death, and arose out of a transaction between him and the bank, while the indebtedness relied on by the administratrix arose long after the death of Bell and out of a transaction between her and the bank; that the bank at no time had the right or power to apply the money deposited with it by the administratrix against the amount due it from the estate, nor would it have had a right to have this done if an action had been brought by the administratrix against it, while it was a going concern, to recover the moneys of the estate deposited with it; that hence at no time did there exist a mutual right of set-off between the parties; and that such right must be mutual or it does not exist at all.

Aside from the points made by respondent and which we have already considered, the only other attack which it makes upon the petition in intervention under its demurrer, or which it urges here in support of the ruling of the court sustaining it, is that it is apparent from the facts alleged in the petition that there is a want of mutality as to the respective demands of the parties. It is not claimed that, if this ground is not well taken, the petition does not make out a case entitling the petitioner to the relief asked for.

We are cited by respondent to a number of cases in support of their position that mutuality must exist between the demands in order to warrant a set-off between them, and particularly to cases where, in actions by administrators or executors to recover money belonging to the estate on a liability created after the death of the testator or intestate, it is held that claims against the estate, accruing prior to the death of the decedent, could not be asserted therein as set-offs. There can be no question but that the general rule as to the necessity of mutuality is as asserted by respondent, and it may be conceded that in a strict sense there is no mutuality between the claims here under consideration; they are not due to and from the same parties and in the same capacity. The general rule, too, is well settled, as claimed, that, in actions by executors or administrators upon a cause of action arising to them after the death of the testator or intestate, a defendant cannot set off a demand against the decedent existing at the time of his death. But this general rule is subject to exceptions which are applied in suits brought by executors or administrators such as above referred to, as well as in other actions, though we are now only concerned with ascertaining whether as to the claims here sought to be set off against each other an exception should apply.

It will be found, when cases of the character cited are examined, that where, in such actions by executors or administrators, the right of set-off has been denied to the defendants, such denial is not so much based on a want of mutuality (and that ground in many of them is not assigned as the reason), but is put upon the ground that the allowance of such a set-off might disturb the just and equal distribution of the assets of the estate among its creditors in any case where it was uncertain, from the unsettled condition of the estate, whether the assets were sufficient to pay all the debts of the decedent, or, in the case of an estate which was actually insolvent, the allowance of such set-off would not only prevent a pro rata distribution among its creditors, but, on the contrary, would give the creditor claiming the benefit of a set-off an undue preference over other creditors of the estate to the extent of full payment of his claim. Ency. of Law & Pro. vol. 18, p. 895, and cases cited there.

When, however, by reason of the special character of an asserted set-off, it appears that in no particular can the rights of any party interested in the assets of the estate be affected by its allowance, or when the estate is solvent and able to pay all claims against it, including the allowed claim of a defendant asserting it as a set-off, the courts in the first instance do not, and in the latter should not, apply the strict rule of mutuality to prevent the allowance of the set-off. It has been held that persons paying funeral expenses of a decedent may set off the amount thereof in an action by the executor or administrator upon a claim owed by them to the decedent in his lifetime. Adams v. Butts, 16 Pick. (Mass.) 343; Patterson v. Patterson, 59 N. Y. 574, 17 Am. Rep. 384; Barbee v. Green, 86 N. C. 158. It is also held that, upon proof that all debts of the testator had been paid, an executor who was sole legatee could avail himself of a chose in action belonging to the estate as a counterclaim in an action against him. Blood v. Kane, 130 N. Y. 514, 29 N. E. 994, 15 L. R. A. 490. Want of mutuality was not permitted in these cases cited to defeat the right of set-off; it being allowed in the first for the reason that other creditors of the estate could not be prejudiced, as the set-offs were preferred claims against the estate, and such set-off was allowed in the last for like reason.

We refer to these cases as showing that the rule of mutuality is not always controlling in actions by or against personal representatives of an estate which involves its assets, but that it will be departed from in cases where it appears that permitting the set-off to be interposed cannot in any respect embarrass the administration of the estate or prejudice the rights or interests of any other party interested in its assets.

We can perceive no reason why the principles of the decisions cited should not be applied to the demands here. We think it should, and that, notwithstanding the respective demands are not mutual, still, if any proceeding in the estate had been taken by the bank to collect its allowed claim prior to its insolvency, or the administrator had theretofore sued to collect the estate funds on deposit with it, the estate being solvent, the demand of one party would have been available as a set-off against the claim of the other; that the right of the parties in that respect were reciprocal, and, as we have said, the insolvency of the bank did not affect the right of either to have this subsequently done.

That this should be so we are satisfied is apparent on consideration. In discussing the application of the principle, we will take the case of an individual creditor of the estate, with an allowed claim, against whom the administrator has some money demand representing assets of the estate arising from a transaction between them subsequent to the death of decedent. This will give a better opportunity for illustrating the principle, while not disturbing the relation of the actual parties here. Take the case of the creditor proceeding against the estate. Without having paid his indebtedness due to the administrator, he files his petition in the estate proceedings for payment of his allowed claim. The estate is solvent. In fact, the claimant may be its sole creditor. No other creditor of the estate would be prejudiced if the payment is made, and no other person interested in the assets will be affected. But the administrator resists the application for the order of payment and insists that the debt due him from the claimant representing assets of the estate should be set off against the allowed claim. What sound reason can be given why the strict rule of mutuality should be applied to deny the right of set-off? Nothing can be accomplished by it of just or fair advantage to the claimant creditor, nor any benefit arise to the estate. In fact, if the rule were applied, it might be of material disadvantage to the estate while unfairly advantageous to the creditor. The creditor may be insolvent, and it is well settled that the insolvency of a party against whom a set-off is claimed constitutes a sufficient ground for the allowance of a set-off not otherwise available. It may be that the demand due the administrator from the creditor constitutes the principal asset of the estate out of which to pay his claim, which of course would require a denial of the creditor's application until the administrator could collect the assets. The only effect of denying the right of set-off to the administrator in this situation would be to compel him to sue and enforce payment from the creditor if, he was solvent, and this for the sole purpose of thereupon paying it back to him in satisfaction of his claim. This would be an idle and senseless thing to require a court to do. These are special circumstances, but exist here; the bank is insolvent, and the debt owed by it to the administratrix represents all the money assets of the estate. Aside from this, however, in this matter at bar the circumstances present a situation where the rule of strict mutuality should, in consonance with obvious justice, be departed from and the set-off allowed. Here there is a solvent estate and a sole creditor of it, who is also in substantial effect its debtor. The bank is entitled to have its claim against the estate paid, but the administratrix is also entitled to have it pay its debt to her which represents assets of the estate. No injury can be worked to the creditor of the bank by permitting it, and it is entitled to no advantage over the estate through denying it. While the respective demands may not be strictly mutual, they are very intimately connected; the claimant in effect owes the estate and the estate owes him; both demands have relation to funds of the estate. This presents a situation where, in the interest of clear right and justice, an exception to the general rule of mutuality should be applied and the set-off allowed.

We are not in this opinion discussing any question of the jurisdiction of the superior court, sitting in probate in a proceeding by a creditor therein, to entertain and determine a claim of set-off, though we are satisfied it can, and so hold in an opinion this day filed, disposing of the other appeal taken by the administratrix, referred to in the beginning of this opinion (case No. 6698). We are here simply considering the question whether want of mutuality between the claims may be availed of to defeat the right of set-off in such a proceeding, and decide that it does not.

Being satisfied that the administratrix would have had the right to set off the indebtedness due her from the bank against the allowed claim of the bank, in a proceeding in the estate to enforce its payment, we are likewise satisfied that the bank would have had a reciprocal right, if the estate was solvent, to set off its allowed claim against the estate in a suit brought against it to recover the debt due the administratrix, as a depositor of the bank, and such debt representing assets of the estate. The same principle applies in both cases. Take a situation. The estate is solvent, with ample assets to pay all claims, and the claimant is the sole creditor. There is no dispute of the validity of his allowed claim. No possible prejudice can be suffered by the estate, its creditors, or any one interested in it, by allowing the set-off. On the contrary, the creditor may suffer great inconvenience, or a serious loss may result to him by denying him the right to do so, without any benefit whatever to any one. He may admit the indebtedness, but he is in such a position financially that he is not able to obtain the money to pay it. He could pay the estate if it would pay him. Possibly his debt to the estate is the largest asset, and his claim could not be paid except after he pays the estate. In this situation, or in any other where the estate is solvent, what sound reason can be presented for a refusal to allow the set-off? If want of mutuality may be invoked to do so, then the creditor is placed in a peculiarly hard situation without, as we have said, any benefit to the estate. If the administrator may proceed to judgment against him, it may result in a sacrifice of his property on execution to realize the amount due, and to what end? Solely to have the very money collected from him forthwith paid back to him in satisfaction of his claim. To deny the right of set-off under these circumstances simply for want of mutuality would be not only unjust and oppressive towards the creditor but also an idle and absurd act.

Applying these views to the respective demands of the parties here, we are satisfied that the facts stated in the petition in intervention shows that a right of set-off between these demands could have been asserted by either of them if any proceeding or action had been brought by the one against the other at the time of the insolvency of the bank; that this right was reciprocal; and that a sufficient cause for the relief asked by the administratrix was shown in her petition for intervention.

[4] It is further especially urged by respondent that the deposit with the bank was a special deposit, and hence its allowed claim could not be asserted in an action brought by the administratrix to recover it. It is not now necessary to discuss how far this would affect the present situation between the parties, even if the deposit was a special deposit, because the petition does not show this to be the fact. It may be assumed, from a general reference in the petition, that the order of court directing the administratrix to deposit the funds of the estate with the bank, to be withdrawn only on an order of the court, was made pursuant to an act of the Legislature (Statutes 1891, p. 490), permitting the court to do this. But the act does not provide that the funds so deposited shall constitute a special deposit. Nor does the circumstance that they might not be withdrawn unless by order of the court make them such. That had relation simply to the manner in which they might be withdrawn. It had nothing to do with the character of the deposit itself, which, as far as the petition for intervention shows, appears to have been a deposit generally, creating the relationship between the bank and the administratrix of debtor and creditor.

The order dismissing the petition in intervention is reversed.

THOMAS v. GERMAN GENERAL BENEV. SOCIETY. (S. F. 6354.)

1. Master and Servant (§ 201*)—Injuries to Servant—Safety Appliance—Failure to Provide—Intervening Cause—Negligence of Fellow Servant.

Where plaintiff, a chef in a hospital, having used a freight elevator to go to the basement for supplies, on his return walked through the doorway in the darkness and fell into the elevator shaft, the elevator having been moved in the meantime and the doors left open by another servant under plaintiff's supervision, without his knowledge, the negligence of such underservant, who was plaintiff's fellow servant, was an intervening proximate cause, which precluded a recovery for plaintiff's injuries by reason of the defendant's negligence in omitting to perform a statutory duty to equip the elevator with automatic gates.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 515–534; Dec. Dig. § 201.*]

2. Charities (§ 45*)—Charitable Hospital—Injuries—Negligence—Liability.

The rule that a charitable institution is not liable for the negligence of its servants, provided it has used due care in selecting them, applies only to one who accepts the benefits of the charity.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by Armin Thomas against the German General Benevolent Society. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

John Ralph Wilson, of San Francisco, for appellant. Arthur Brand, of San Francisco, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. This action is an action for damages growing out of personal injuries suffered by plaintiff while he was in defendant's employ. The verdict of the jury was for plaintiff, and from the judgment which followed defendant appeals.

Plaintiff was the chef or head cook of the large hospital maintained by defendant. He had charge of the kitchen service. Under him were subordinate cooks and other assistants—a butcher, a vegetable man, a confectioner, a storekeeper, porters, and dishwashers. The kitchen was located upon the fifth floor of the hospital building, and from this floor an elevator ran to the basement, in which the storeroom was located. It was an electric elevator, and was operated by pulling a rope which ran perpendicularly through the elevator cage. It was so constructed that it would stop automatically upon the fifth floor and at the basement. It did not so stop automatically at the intermediate floors. This elevator was designed for the carrying of freight, consisting of kitchen supplies, which were thus transported from the storeroom in the basement to the kitchen upon the fifth floor. In the elevator was posted a conspicuous sign bearing the words, "For freight only. No passengers allowed." Nevertheless it was the known practice of the kitchen staff and other employés themselves to use this elevator. Plaintiff had himself frequently used it in transporting himself from the kitchen to the basement to take an inventory of the storeroom supplies, and to order the transportation of meats, vegetables and the like to his kitchen.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

Upon the day of the accident the directors of the defendant society were dining at the hospital. A waiter reported to the chef that cheese was desired for their dinner. There was no cheese in the kitchen; and the chef himself entered the elevator and lowered himself to the basement floor, there to procure the desired article. This elevator was not equipped with automatic closing gates in front of the shaft, but was equipped with well-constructed doors closed by hand. It was the practice and duty of the employés when they moved this elevator to ring the bell connected therewith, and to close the gate. Plaintiff, on leaving this elevator in the basement, so closed the gate. He found the basement dark, and called to the storekeeper, telling him what he wanted. The storekeeper turned on a light in the compartment of his storeroom containing the cheeses, and plaintiff took upon his right arm such of the cheeses as he desired and started to return to the elevator. During the time of his absence the confectioner, a fellow employé and under the control of the plaintiff, opened the gate, entered the elevator and ascended to an upper floor without either ringing the bell or closing the gate behind him. Plaintiff moved along the darkened passageway with the cheeses on his right arm, and his left arm extended, believing that the elevator gate was closed as he had left it, and that his extended hand would encounter it. The gate being open, he stepped into the elevator shaft, and received the injuries complained of.

The complaint charged upon the facts above stated, and in addition upon the violation of an ordinance of the city and county of San Francisco, to the effect that:

> "All freight elevator shafts must be provided at each floor through which they pass with the latest and best appliance, style and design of automatic closing safety gates."

[1] Appellant's first propositions are that the evidence clearly establishes a thorough knowledge upon the part of the plaintiff of the appliance which he voluntarily used, that this appliance was not in itself mechanically imperfect, and that his assumption of risk in the use of it is clearly established, and bars his recovery. In the same connection and as related to this, the contributory negligence of plaintiff is urged herein; it being insisted that it was no part of plaintiff's duty to go to the basement for this supply; that he was the chef, and his duties were limited to the preparation of menus, the cooking of the food, and the general supervision of his kitchen staff; that he was a mere volunteer in going to the basement, and that if the basement was dark, as he declares, it was manifestly a part of his duty to call upon his subordinate, the storekeeper, to turn on the electric lights. To this, respondent makes answer that the doctrine of assumption of risk is based upon the maxim "Volenti non fit injuria," and that where an express mandatory statute requires an employer to do a specific act—as to furnish a particular appliance, or to supply protective guards—the rule of assumption of risk ceases to be applicable; in short, that the omission of a duty imposed by statute or ordinance precludes the defense of assumption of risk. We need not be at pains to discuss these contentions, nor the limitations upon them declared by appellant to exist. It may here be conceded that defendant had violated the duty imposed upon it by the ordinance above quoted in its failure to provide this freight elevator with automatic closing gates. It may be conceded that the assumption of risk is not open as a defense. It may be conceded that the contention touching the contributory negligence of plaintiff was resolved by the jury in his favor; but one proposition stands out clearly and indisputably—that is, that the proximate cause of the accident was the negligence of a fellow servant in the same general employment with plaintiff, and that such negligence bars plaintiff's right of recovery. The complaint itself, it will be remembered, pleads that while the plaintiff was obtaining these supplies another servant of the defendant caused the elevator to be moved from the basement floor; the evidence of plaintiff himself fixes that servant as the confectioner, who was beyond question not only a fellow servant, but under the general control of plaintiff. Mann v. O'Sullivan, 126 Cal. 61, 58 Pac. 375, 77 Am. St. Rep. 149. It was his negligence in failing to perform what the plaintiff describes as the "duty" of all employés in using the elevator, viz., to ring the bell and close the gate, that was the proximate cause of the accident; and but for this servant's act of negligence the injury could not have occurred. The case, then, is one where, under the provisions of section 1970 of the Civil Code, a recovery is barred.

We need not be at pains to discuss at length the nature of such proximate and intervening cause. It has been repeatedly done. Vizelich v. Southern Pac. Co., 126 Cal.

589, 59 Pac. 129; Fogarty v. Southern Pac. Co., 151 Cal. 787, 91 Pac. 650; Schwartz v. Cal. G. Co., 163 Cal. 402, 125 Pac. 1044. These and all other authorities hold that, even where an appliance furnished by an employer is defective, the injured employé will not be entitled to recover if the injury was not the result of the defect, but was the result of the negligence of a coemployé. And where the negligence is predicated upon the failure to perform a duty commanded by statute or ordinance, the same rule applies. Says Thompson:

> "In all these cases it must appear that the violation of the ordinance was the proximate cause of the injuries received." 6 Thompson on Negligence, § 7868.

And says Cyc. (29 Cyc. 489):

> "The same rules are to be applied in determining the question whether an act is the proximate cause, whether such act is in violation of a statute or of some duty under general principles of law. In determining whether particular acts of negligence can be considered the proximate cause of injury, no distinction can properly be made between acts which constitute negligence because they are in conflict with statutory laws, and acts which are condemned as negligence under the general principles of law governing the conduct of men in relation to each other."

For the contrary doctrine respondent relies upon Groves v. Wimborne, 2 Q. B. 402 (1898). In that case the Factory Workshop Act imposed the mandatory duty upon the employer, for the protection of his employés, to fence and guard dangerous machinery. The arm of an employé was caught in unprotected cogwheels, and he was injured. There was evidence to show that originally this machinery had been protected. How and when the guards had been removed was not disclosed; but it was shown that they had not been there during the six months of plaintiff's employment. There was no question of intervening cause, or the negligence of a fellow servant, proximately contributing to the injury. The declaration of the Queen's Bench was the well-established one that where a duty is cast upon an employer he cannot escape responsibility for nonperformance by declaring that he had delegated it. Such a duty is either nondelegable, or, what is in legal effect the same thing, if delegated, the servant, to whom the duty is delegated, becomes a vice principal, and for his negligent act the master is responsible. The broad and obvious distinction between that case and the case at bar is that there was no immediate, intervening, proximate cause without which the injury would not have resulted.

[2] A final contention of appellant is that it is in no way responsible, by reason of the fact that it is a charitable institution, and that an action against it such as this will not lie. Such was the doctrine of some of the earlier cases. We need not enter into an elaborate discussion of the question. All of the authorities pro and con have been elaborately collated and learnedly reviewed in Basabo v. Salvation Army, 35 R. I. 22, 85 Atl. 120, 42 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1144. With the conclusion there reached we are in accord. That conclusion is that the true doctrine amounts to this: That where one accepts the benefit of a public or of a private charity he exempts by implied contract the benefactor from liability for the negligence of the servants in administering the charity, if the benefactor has used due care in the selection of those servants.

The judgment appealed from is reversed, and the cause remanded.

BOND v. AICKLEY et al. (No. 6066.)

1. Quieting Title (§ 10*)—Title of Plaintiff—Sufficiency.

Where, in a suit to quiet title, neither party connects himself with the legal title, the one who proves prior possession in himself or those through whom he claims shows ownership sufficient to support a judgment within Civ. Code, § 1006, declaring that occupancy confers a title sufficient against all except the state and those having title by prescription, transfer, will, or succession.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Quieting Title, Cent. Dig. §§ 36–42; Dec. Dig. § 10.*]

2. Quieting Title (§ 10*)—Title of Plaintiff—Sufficiency.

Possession is prima facie evidence of ownership, and, in the absence of any showing to the contrary, a person taking possession of and improving a vacant and unimproved lot, acquires ownership thereof, and under Civ. Code, § 1083, a remote grantee under quitclaim deeds has a title as against a subsequent grantee of the grantor where the subsequent grantee had notice by the recording of the prior deeds and of a lis pendens.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Quieting Title, Cent. Dig. §§ 36–42; Dec. Dig. § 10.*]

3. Deeds (§ 38*)—Description—Sufficiency.

Where a deed of a lot describes every distance in the description therein except one as so many feet, and the addition of the word "feet" to the remaining distance, given only as a number, will make a description covering the lot occupied by the grantor before execution of the deed, the word "feet" will be added to make the description complete.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Deeds, Cent. Dig. §§ 65–79; Dec. Dig. § 38.*]

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; T. W. Harris, Judge.

Action by Mary Bond against W. C. Aickley, prosecuted after his death against Ruth Aickley, his administratrix, and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

F. A. Berlin, of Oakland, for appellant. Edward A. Holman and L. D. Manning, both of Oakland, for respondents.

SLOSS, J. The plaintiff brought this action against W. C. Aickley and others to quiet her title to a parcel of land in the city of Oakland. Pending the action, W. C. Aickley executed a deed of the premises to Irving E. Smith. Thereafter Aickley died, and Ruth Aickley, as administratrix of his estate, was substituted in his stead as a party defendant. Smith also appeared as a defendant, and answered, denying plaintiff's claim of ownership of the premises. Of the remaining defendants, some disclaimed, and the action was dismissed as to the others. The court found that plaintiff was not the owner or in the possession, or entitled to the possession of the premises; that at the commencement of the action W. C. Aickley was in the actual and peaceable possession thereof, and so continued until he conveyed such right of possession to Smith. The judgment decreed that the plaintiff should take nothing by this action, and that Smith have judgment against her for his costs. The plaintiff appeals from the judgment and from an order denying her motion for a new trial.

The principal contention is that the evidence does not support the finding that plaintiff was not the owner or entitled to the possession of the premises. The property in controversy is a strip about 37½ feet wide and 150 feet in length. None of the parties undertook to deraign title from a paramount source, the record containing nothing to indicate the condition or ownership of the property prior to 1892. In that year W. C. Aickley, named as a party defendant in this action, took possession of the lot, which was then vacant and unimproved, constructed a fence around it, and erected on it a cottage, in which, for a time, he resided. On April 16, 1894, he executed a quitclaim deed of the property to Annie Bond. On February 5, 1895, Annie Bond executed a like deed to the plaintiff, Mary Bond. In August, 1909, after the commencement of this action, Aickley conveyed the premises to Irving E. Smith, the respondent. A lis pendens had then been recorded, and Smith could therefore occupy no stronger position, as against plaintiff, than his grantor had had.

[1] The foregoing facts appear without substantial contradiction. They compel the conclusion that plaintiff was, as between the parties to this action, the owner of the premises, and was entitled to a decree quieting her title. At the trial both parties seem to have proceeded upon the theory that the plaintiff, being unable to show a clear paper title, was bound to prove the acquisition of a title by prescription. But this was not necessary, under the circumstances of the case. As between parties, neither of whom can connect himself with the legal title, the one who proves prior possession in himself, or those through whom he claims, makes out a sufficient showing of ownership. 15 Cyc. 30.

> "Occupancy for any period confers a title sufficient against all except the state and those who have title by prescription, accesssion, transfer, will, or succession." Civ. Code, § 1006.

[2] It has always been the law in this state, as well as elsewhere, that possession is prima facie evidence of ownership. Hutchinson v. Perley, 4 Cal. 33, 60 Am. Dec. 578; Plume v. Seward, 4 Cal. 94, 60 Am. Dec. 599; Nagle v. Macy, 9 Cal. 426; Ayres v. Bensley, 32 Cal. 620; Leonard v. Flynn, 89 Cal. 543, 26 Pac. 1099; McGovern v. Mowry, 91 Cal. 383, 27 Pac. 746; Zilmer v. Gerichten, 111 Cal. 73, 43 Pac. 408; Morris v. Clarkin, 156 Cal. 16, 103 Pac. 180; Davis v. Crump, 162 Cal. 513, 123 Pac. 294. Accordingly, in the absence of anything to show a better or prior title, Aickley's possession, taken in 1892, established his ownership of the premises at that time. His quitclaim deed to Annie Bond transferred to her whatever title he then had (Civ. Code, § 1083; Graff v. Middleton, 43 Cal. 341; Lawrence v. Ballou, 37 Cal. 518; Rego v. Van Pelt, 65 Cal. 254, 3 Pac. 867), and Annie's subsequent deed vested the title in plaintiff. When this point was reached the plaintiff had established a perfect prima facie case, which could be overcome only by establishing a superior title in the defendant. There was no attempt to do this. Neither Ruth Aickley, as administratrix of W. C. Aickley, nor Smith, his grantee, stood in any better position than Aickley himself. To defeat plaintiff's claim, either of them would have had to show a title derived from a superior source, or acquired against plaintiff by adverse possession. As has been stated, no such showing was made. While there was some testimony tending to prove that Aickley had been in possession of the property at different times after the date of his deed to Annie Bond, and that he was in possession when the action was commenced, it is not pretended that the defendants proved the existence of the various elements necessary under our Code (Code Civ. Proc., § 325) to constitute adverse possession of real estate.

One of the findings declares that Smith was "the purchaser of said premises from W. C. Aickley in good faith." If this is intended as a finding that Smith bought without notice of Aickley's prior conveyance, the finding is against the evidence, because, first, Aickley's deed to Annie Bond had been recorded 10 years before, and, second, a lis pendens was, as we have already stated, of record when Smith took his deed.

[3] We may notice, briefly, the contention suggested by respondents, without argument or citation of authority, that the deed from Aickley to Annie Bond contained a description so indefinite as to make impossible the identification of the land sought to be conveyed. The defect consisted in the omission of the word "feet" in the call locating the starting point. This was described as a point on the northerly line of East Fifteenth street, "distant thereon 225 from the easterly line of 22d avenue." In view of the facts that every other distance in the deed is given in terms of "feet"; that the addition of this word will make the description cover the lot in controversy as described in the complaint; that the lot so described is the one occupied by Aickley before the execution of the deed, and is, as may fairly be inferred, the only property in which he asserted any interest—we think the court below was justified in treating the description as sufficient, and admitting the deed in evidence. See Burton v. Mullenary, 147 Cal. 259, 81 Pac. 544; County of Los Angeles v. Hannon, 159 Cal. 37, 112 Pac. 878; Union Lumber Co. v. Simon, 150 Cal. 751, 89 Pac. 1077, 1081.

The judgment and the order denying a new trial are reversed.

STONE v. WOLFE. (L. A. 3362.)

1. MALICIOUS PROSECUTION (§ 21*)—PROBABLE CAUSE—ADVICE OF COUNSEL.

In a malicious prosecution, defendant cannot maintain the defense of probable cause by proving that he acted on the advice of counsel, unless he shows that he made to counsel, before receiving the advice, a full, fair, and honest statement of the facts then known to him, bearing on accused's guilt.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Malicious Prosecution, Cent. Dig. §§ 40–44; Dec. Dig. § 21.*]

2. MALICIOUS PROSECUTION (§ 21*)—PROBABLE CAUSE — ADVICE OF COUNSEL — EVIDENCE.

Plaintiff having agreed to employ workmen and buy material for the construction of a house for defendant, who was to pay the bills as the work progressed, plaintiff informed defendant that he needed $250 to pay wages for the week, which sum defendant gave to him. The time book for the week kept by the foreman showed that only $207.25 was due. On discovering this fact, defendant began a prosecution against plaintiff for receiving money under false pretenses. In fact, plaintiff, to defendant's knowledge, had other men working in a shop on window frames for the house, to whom $42.75 was owing, which plaintiff paid to them. In defendant's statement to the district attorney he exhibited the time book but said nothing about the men working on the frames. Held, that defendant did not make a full and true statement to the district attorney, and hence advice of counsel was no defense to an action for malicious prosecution.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Malicious Prosecution, Cent. Dig. §§ 40–44; Dec. Dig. § 21.*]

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walter Bordwell, Judge.

Action by W. H. Stone against Isaac Wolfe. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Baird & Gerecht, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Charles S. McKelvey, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The defendant appeals from the judgment upon the judgment roll and a bill of exceptions setting forth the evidence.

The plaintiff sued for damages for malicious prosecution alleged to have been instituted against him by the defendant, maliciously and without probable cause. In his defense, the defendant claimed that the prosecution was begun and maintained in good faith, without malice, upon the advice of counsel that there was probable cause, after he had made to the counsel a full statement of the facts.

The evidence shows that the charge against the plaintiff was that of obtaining money under false pretenses. Stone had agreed to build a house for Wolfe, upon an arrangement that Stone was to employ the workmen and buy the material for Wolfe and that Wolfe was to furnish Stone with money to pay for the material and labor as the work progressed and the bills became due. On May 13, 1911, Stone stated to Wolfe that he needed $250 to pay wages for that week, whereupon Wolfe paid him that sum. The time book for the week, kept by the foreman at the house, showed that only $207.25 was due to the men working on the house for that period. Upon discovering this fact, Wolfe began the prosecution, claiming that Stone had procured the excess of $42.75 by means of a false statement as to the amount needed. There was evidence to the effect that some men were working in Stone's shop making window frames for that house, and that the $42.75 was owing to them and was paid to them by Stone. This, if true, showed that Stone's statement was not false and that there was, in fact, no cause for the prosecution. There was also evidence to show that Wolfe knew that these men were working at the shop on the frames and that in his statement to the district attorney he exhibited the time book for the men at the house, but said nothing at all about the men working at the shop upon the frames.

[1] The defendant, in malicious prosecution, cannot maintain the existence of probable cause in law by proving that he acted upon the advice of counsel, unless he also shows that he made to such counsel, before receiving the advice, a full, fair, and honest statement of the facts then known to him bearing upon the guilt of the accused person. Dawson v. Schloss, 93 Cal. 202, 29 Pac. 31; Dunlap v. New Zealand, etc., Co., 109 Cal. 371, 42 Pac. 29; Bliss v. Wyman, 7 Cal. 257; Wild v. Odell, 56 Cal. 136.

[2] From the evidence the trial court was justified in concluding that Wolfe knew of the men working at the shop and making frames for the house, to whom the remainder of the money might have been paid, but that he did not disclose this fact to his counsel or to the district attorney, in making his statement to them. This being the case, the defense of advice of counsel would not be available to defendant.

REDGATE v. SOUTHERN PAC. CO.

(Civ. 1224.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 23, 1914.)

1. FALSE IMPRISONMENT (§ 15*)—LIABILITY.

A railroad company is not responsible for the acts of a police officer in arresting an employé on his own initiative.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see False Imprisonment, Cent. Dig. §§ 5–67; Dec. Dig. § 15.*]

2. FALSE IMPRISONMENT (§ 15*)—LIABILITY.

Under St. 1901, p. 666, authorizing the Governor to appoint, on the application of any railroad company, a special policeman to act on the premises of the company, and making the company responsible civilly for any abuse of his authority, a railroad company is liable only for any abuse of the authority of an officer appointed on its application, though he serves at the expense of the company.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see False Imprisonment, Cent. Dig. §§ 5–67; Dec. Dig. § 15.*]

3. FALSE IMPRISONMENT (§ 13*)—LIABILITY.

A special police officer, appointed by the Governor on the application of a railroad company to serve on the premises of the company, as authorized by St. 1901, p. 666, arrested without warrant an employé of the company on a charge of grand larceny. The officer had been informed by one participating in the larceny that the employé was his confederate, and assisted in consummating the theft. Held, that the officer empowered to make arrests without warrant for a felony was justified in arresting the employé, who could not maintain an action against the company for false imprisonment.

4. MALICIOUS PROSECUTION (§§ 15, 26*)—ACTIONS—MALICE—WANT OF PROBABLE CAUSE.

Plaintiff, suing for malicious prosecution, must, to recover, establish malice and want of probable cause.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Malicious Prosecution, Cent. Dig. §§ 18, 59; Dec. Dig. §§ 15, 26.*]

5. MALICIOUS PROSECUTION (§ 20*)—"PROBABLE CAUSE"—WHAT IS.

"Probable cause" is a suspicion founded on circumstances sufficiently strong to warrant a reasonable man in the belief that the criminal charge is true.

6. MALICIOUS PROSECUTION (§§ 23, 32*)—MALICE—WANT OF PROBABLE CAUSE.

Malice essential to constitute malicious prosecution may be inferred from want of probable cause, but want of probable cause cannot be inferred from malice.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Malicious Prosecution, Cent. Dig. §§ 39, 67, 68; Dec. Dig. §§ 23, 32.*]

7. MALICIOUS PROSECUTION (§ 24*)—PROBABLE CAUSE—QUESTION OF LAW AND FACT.

Probable cause is a mixed question of law and fact, and where the circumstances clearly appear by uncontradicted evidence, the court must determine the question, and where prosecutor has reasonable grounds for his belief and acts thereon in good faith in causing the arrest of another, he cannot be subjected to damages for malicious prosecution, merely because accused is acquitted.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Malicious Prosecution, Cent. Dig. §§ 49–55; Dec. Dig. § 24.*]

8. MALICIOUS PROSECUTION (§ 56*)—MALICE—PRESUMPTION.

There is no presumption of malice essential to constitute malicious prosecution, and though malice may be inferred from want of probable cause, or other circumstances, yet malice must be proved as a fact.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Malicious Prosecution, Cent. Dig. §§ 112–116; Dec. Dig. § 56.*]

9. MALICIOUS PROSECUTION (§ 27*)—"MALICE"—WHAT IS.

To constitute "malice" essential to malicious prosecution, there must be malus animus, denoting that the party instituting the criminal proceedings is actuated by wrong motives, and he must have had in his mind some evil or sinister purpose.

10. MALICIOUS PROSECUTION (§ 64*)—MALICE—EVIDENCE.

On a trial for malicious prosecution, evidence, held not to justify an inference of malice.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Malicious Prosecution, Cent. Dig. §§ 151–153; Dec. Dig. § 64.*]

11. MALICIOUS PROSECUTION (§ 64*)—PROBABLE CAUSE—EVIDENCE.

In an action for malicious prosecution, evidence held not to support an inference of want of probable cause.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Malicious Prosecution, Cent. Dig. §§ 151–153; Dec. Dig. § 64.*]

12. MALICIOUS PROSECUTION (§ 18*)—PROBABLE CAUSE—GUILT OF ACCUSED.

It is not necessary to justify an arrest that complainant be possessed of proofs of guilt of accused beyond a reasonable doubt, but all the law requires is that complainant has reasonable cause to believe that the crime has been committed, and that he is not actuated by malice, and one may rely on the uncorroborated testimony of a confederate, though a conviction cannot be had thereon.

CHIPMAN, P. J. The complaint charges that defendant "maliciously and without probable cause or any reason therefor, and against the will of the plaintiff and without warrant therefor, caused the plaintiff to be arrested and falsely imprisoned on or about the 4th day of March, 1907, in the city and county of San Francisco." In a second count it is charged that "defendant procured on the 8th day of March, 1907, from the police court" in said city and county, in an action entitled "The People of the State of California v. A. Redgate and Lloyd Newman, a warrant for the arrest of said plaintiff, which said warrant was founded upon a complaint sworn to at the instance of said defendant," charging "plaintiff with having feloniously stolen a certain case of shoes of the value of $75." The cause was tried by a jury and plaintiff had the verdict assessing his damages at $500, and judgment was accordingly entered for that amount. Defendant appeals from the judgment and from the order denying its motion for a new trial.

It appeared that a case of shoes had been stolen from the defendant's freight sheds where plaintiff was employed by defendant as a "checker," and Lloyd Newman was employed as a "trucker." Plaintiff, when called as a witness, thus explained their duties:

"The teamster puts freight on the truck right at the door, and he loads from my checking. The trucker brings it to the door. I tell the trucker what to bring to the door. I point out the things he shall put on the truck and bring down—I pick them out myself—they are dumped on a platform on the edge of the door. I check them to see that the numbers are all right and the goods."

It further appeared that James Regan, a detective sergeant of the city police department, of 17 years' service, found the case of shoes at a secondhand store kept by one Heintz, who informed Regan that one Murphy brought the case of shoes to Heintz's store "for a man named Classen to sell it." Classen was a teamster "driving a team and truck for the Clute Draying Company," and "was hauling a good deal of freight from the railroad shed of the Southern Pacific Company." Thomas Madden was a "special agent or special officer or railroad policeman for the S. P. Company" and had been, for about 15 years, stationed at Fourth and King streets. He testified:

"The loss of the shoes was reported first by the railroad, after that Mr. Regan spoke to me about it. It was soon after. He told me that he had located this particular case of shoes and they belonged to George H. Young. Then we worked together on the case. * * * Mr. Regan went and arrested Classen at the headquarters of Clute, Clute's barn; I went with him. He asked him what he knew about the shoes, and this man Classen said that he was not the only one that was in it, there were others; he said the men in the shed were in on that kind of work, so Mr. Regan asked him if he knew the men. He said he could not call them by name, but he knew them by delivering freight, and he could point them out and he came with Officer Regan and myself down to the shed, and he pointed out Redgate and Newman as the two men. Redgate was the one who was delivering the goods to him and Newman was the trucker, and that the two men made an agreement with him to take the shoes and sell them and divide up the proceeds between them. He said that in the presence of both men and me and Regan, and in their hearing. They denied it; they said they did not do it; they said but very little; they denied it; that was the nature of what they said. They were booked for larceny. A complaint was sworn to afterwards against them. I swore to that complaint. Mr. Regan and myself called upon Mr. Kelly before that complaint was drawn up. It was after these men were under arrest that I first took the matter up with Kelly."

Mr. Kelly was an attorney at law of 25 years' practice, and attended "to the criminal business of the Southern Pacific Company in this city and county." Witness Madden further testified:

"Q. When you took the matter up with Mr. Kelly, did you and Mr. Regan explain the evidence that was against these men? A. Everything just as I am telling it here, or as near as I can think it. I explained the matter to him as fully as I knew how.

"Mr. Moore: Q. Did you believe that Redgate and Newman had stood in on the proposition of putting that box of shoes on Classen's truck, with the idea that Classen would sell it, and they would cut up the proceeds? A. From what Classen said I did, from Classen's words. Q. Do you believe it still? A. From what the man told us, I believed it then, and I believe it still, the same as I did then. I do not remember when I first saw Mr. Kelly. The complaint was sworn to after the arrest."

Regan testified to much the same state of facts. He further testified:

"Q. Did you believe at the time they were arrested, at the time the complaint was filed, that there was probable cause to believe they had committed an act— A. I did. Q. Do you believe it yet? A. I do; the shoes were stolen, and they were all concerned in it, if Classen's word was to be believed. Classen drove a bonded warehouse truck, and he was not receiving any goods out of there that did not come from a certain place, as I understood from Classen any goods that he got on the truck outside of that he had no right to get it. Q. And you believe that he got it through this checker and this trucker? A. Well, that was his say-so; he accused them; he did not think over it a minute; when I asked him he said, 'I ain't the only one, Regan, there were others.' Newman and Redgate denied it. They said they did not know anything at all about it, they did not know he got this case out of there at all. They claimed that they had not given him this case. Q. Did they refuse to answer questions in regard to the matter, particular questions? A. They would not make any statement whatsoever. Q. Did you ask them to make a statement? A. I did."

Classen testified that he "got a box of shoes down there at the railroad sheds some time during the latter part of the month of February, 1907, from Mr. Redgate and William Newman." He explained what he did with the shoes and what took place after his arrest. Speaking of what he said to the arresting officers, he testified:

"I denied having taken them at first, and after a while I told them that I took them, they were given to me, and who the men were that gave them to me. I did not tell them the exact names of the parties, because I did not know what their names were, I only knew them working down there in the sheds. I told them that they told me to take the shoes. I told them they were two men working in the freight sheds, and they told me to take the shoes and dispose of them, and they told me who they were. I told them I did not know who they were; I would have to identify them. I did not know their names, who they were, I knew who they were. I stayed in jail until the following Monday, then I went down to the freight shed. I saw Mr. Redgate. I identified him as one of the men. I afterwards saw the other, Newman, in the city jail.

"Mr. Moore: Q. Was there also some conversation in jail when you saw Redgate and Newman and the officers afterwards? A. Yes, they spoke of these two men being the men, and what they did with it, and told them to tell everything out, and all like that; that was sort of really the conversation in substance, there was not much said.

"The Court: Q. Did you identify either of these two men whom you saw in the jail? A. Yes, sir. Q. Do you remember your saying anything as to whether these were the men, or what they said to you at the time? A. Well, I said they were the two men, that is what I told the officers at the time."

Attorney Frank P. Kelly testified:

"I attend to the criminal business of the Southern Pacific Company in this city and county. There was called to my attention in the first part of March, 1907, a matter in respect to Arthur Redgate and Lloyd Newman, employés of the company, at their freight shed here in this city. In the course of my business I was required to investigate all cases of theft from the sheds of the coast division. Mr. Regan came to me, and told me there was a theft of a box of shoes, and presented to me all the necessary testimony of witnesses to prove that the shoes had been stolen from there, and on their statement that they had these witnesses, I wrote out a complaint. It was read here in evidence—against Arthur Redgate and Lloyd Newman, who was checker and trucker at the same time. I wrote out the complaint against Arthur Redgate and Lloyd Newman, because from the officers' statement that Arthur Redgate as the receiving clerk there, or checker, had stated to Lloyd Newman that he should take the shoes and give them to somebody, and take them downtown and sell them, and bring back the proceeds, and divide them; that was the statement made to me. From the time the information was brought to me about 30 hours elapsed after they were arrested. This delay was for the reason that the officers did not have full information, so that I could make out the complaint. The names of the parties that came to me with this information were Officer Regan and Special Officer Madden of the Southern Pacific. * * * Q. Was anything stated by the officers to you with reference to a teamster of the name of Classen? A. Yes, sir; they told me that this man Classen, who, I think, they originally arrested, or did arrest, had hauled these shoes away to some place on Sixth street, that they had found them, and that Classen told them that Redgate and Newman had ordered him to haul them away."

The attention of the witness was called to the fact that the arrest was made on the 4th day of the month (March) and complaint was filed on the 8th. The witness stated that sometimes it occurs that complaints are made out a day or so before they are filed; that Redgate and Newman were already under arrest; that he, witness, had no feeling of malice towards these men, and that he had never seen Redgate before that time:

"Q. Did you feel at that time that there was proper cause to believe that Redgate had committed this offense? A. Yes, sir."

It appeared that Redgate and Newman were subsequently brought before the police court upon the complaint charging felony, to wit, grand larceny, at which time witnesses Classen, Regan, Heintz, and Young, the owner of the stolen shoes, testified, and, on April 6, 1907:

"The court, after having said matter under advisement, orders said action to be dismissed and the defendants discharged."

Plaintiff Redgate testified:

"I was arrested on the 4th day of March, 1907, at freight shed Fourth and Townsend streets, by Detectives Regan and Madden. I do not know whether either of them were railroad policemen or not. I did not know what they were arresting me for; they said, 'Come along with me.' I went to the office at the shed, turned in my bills, and explained to the clerk, and I said, 'These men are arresting me for something I don't know anything about.' They took me up in the Flood building. They took me into an office there, I suppose it was some railroad detective office. He asked me my name, where I was born, and that was all, and then they took me down to the jail on Eddy and Mason, and they charged me right there with grand larceny. They booked me on the book, my name, and charged me, and then they locked me up. I was in jail about three days. I got out on bonds after that. I had to have an attorney to get out. I paid him $50. I appeared for trial in the police court. I don't know the exact date, they did not bring my case up. Then it came up again. I was brought up before the court three times, the first time nothing was said or done, and I was taken back to jail—after I was released on bail, which was on the third day, I was twice brought before the court, and on the third occasion the charge was dismissed, and the only evidence on that occasion was some man who had the shoes stated he did not know us. Judge Conlin dismissed the case. At the present time I am a butcher. Notice of my arrest appeared in the Bulletin, Chronicle and Daily News."

The record of the trial shows that the witnesses above named testified at the preliminary hearing. Plaintiff testified, on cross-examination, that at the time he was arrested the officers brought Classen there, but witness testified that he did not hear any conversation, nor did he see Classen point him out; that when the detective asked him whether he had given Classen the shoes he said, "No, I had given him no shoes." He also testified that the records of the company showed that, on February 21st, the day it is claimed the goods disappeared, Classen signed a receipt to defendant for some goods belonging to the United States government, and that Newman was the trucker on that occasion, and that was the first time he had ever seen Classen. He further testified:

"I did not know what I was arrested for until I was booked—I did not know what they had Classen there for, I am sure, I suppose I thought they had him there, and arrested him and had him under watch. Classen was brought into a room with Newman and myself in the jail; I was asked if I knew him, so was Newman; we said, 'Yes.' I was asked if I wished to have a talk with him and said, 'No'—so did Newman."

Newman testified as follows:

"I had not been at sheds for five days prior to my arrest. I was arrested at 11:30 p. m., March 4, 1907, on China avenue, on my way home, 203 Paris street; by detectives brought to the city jail. Redgate was brought out, and asked if he knew me; he said, yes, I was his trucker. I was never asked about Redgate prior to my arrest. Redgate only had goods put on the trucks that appeared in the waybills. I was kept locked up at the jail three days before being taken to court—I was not taken to court because there was no charge; Redgate and I were jointly charged—as soon as I got before the court I gave bail."

The foregoing is substantially all the evidence in the case.

1. It is contended by appellant that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the first count of the complaint for false imprisonment.

[1, 2] The defendant had no connection with Regan who was a member of the police force of the city, and cannot be held responsible for his acts, for, as far as appears, he acted on his own initiative. Its responsibility, whatever it was, is for the acts of Madden alone. His powers were those of a peace officer, as will appear from the following act of the Legislature under which he was appointed:

"Section 1. The Governor of the state of California is hereby authorized and empowered, upon the application of any railroad or steamboat company, to appoint and commission during his pleasure one or more persons designated by such company and to serve at the expense of such company, as policeman or policemen, with the powers of police officers, and who, after being duly sworn, may act as such policeman or policemen upon the premises, cars or boats of such company. The company designating such person or persons shall be responsible civilly for any abuse of his or their authority.

"Sec. 2. Every such policeman shall, when on duty, wear in plain view a shield bearing the words 'railroad police,' or 'steamboat police,' as the case may be, and the name of the company for which he is commissioned." Stats. 1901, p. 666.

Defendant's liability, whatever it may be, for the acts of Madden, does not spring from the relation of employé or servant, for he bore no such relation to defendant. It has been frequently held, under statutes similar to the above quoted, that special officers appointed thereunder derive all their powers from the appointment made by the civil authorities, here by the Governor of the state. The authority to make arrests, with which plaintiff was clothed, was in terms given by the statute and in no sense can be said to arise from the relation of master and servant, or principal and agent, existing between the special officer and the company at whose application he was commissioned; and the fact that he is "to serve at the expense of such company" does not affect his status as that of a police officer. The rule of respondeat superior has no application where there is no evidence tending to show that the company was instrumental in causing the arrest or subsequent prosecution. The foregoing views are fully supported by the following cases, cited by appellant: Adler v. White City Construction Co., 147 Ill. App. 20; Samuel v. Wanamaker, 107 App. Div. 433, 95 N. Y. Supp. 270; Hershey v. O'Neil (C. C.) 36 Fed. 168, under the New York statute; Wells v. Washington Market Co., 19 D. C. 385; Tolchester Beach Imp. Co. v. Steinmeier, 72 Md. 313, 20 Atl. 188, 8 L. R. A. 46. Other cases are cited in the opinions to like effect. Where, however, the officer acts in a dual capacity, and the special policeman "reported for duty to the foreman of the defendant and acted in pursuance of instructions received from them," the defendant was held liable. Illinois Steel Co. v. Novak, 84 Ill. App. 641. See, also, where the head janitor and doorkeeper of a theater was also a special police officer and had not been relieved from his duties in the theater, in the discharge of which the question arose, Dickson v. Waldron, 135 Ind. 507, 34 N. E. 506, 35 N. E. 1, 24 L. R. A. 483, 41 Am. St. Rep. 440. See, also, Brill v. Eddy, 115 Mo. 596, 22 S. W. 488.

It is very clear that defendant incurred no liability for the arrest and detention of plaintiff up to the time complaint was filed and warrant of arrest issued, unless it be for an "abuse of authority" by Madden, for no agent of the defendant had anything to do with the case to that time. We think, however, that Mr. Kelly's testimony shows that in preparing the complaint upon which alone a warrant of arrest could issue, and in subsequently conducting the examination, he was acting as the agent of defendant. We do not mean to hold that the defendant could not, without incurring a possible liability, employ an attorney to assist in the trial of the case after a complaint had been filed and the warrant of arrest was served, through some agency other than defendant's. What we hold is that, in assuming, as the attorney and agent of defendant, to advise the officers that there was sufficient evidence to hold the accused and in preparing the complaint and causing warrant to issue and in subsequently taking charge of the examination, as we may infer he did, Kelly placed the defendant in the attitude of an accuser, but it remained with plaintiff to show that it acted through malice and without probable cause. Furthermore, the statute, under which the special officer was appointed, expressly provides that the defendant "shall be responsible civilly for any abuse of his authority," which we take it means, in making the arrest, he must have had reasonable cause for believing that the accused had committed the crime for which he was arrested.

It results from the foregoing views that for the original arrest and detention under it, which was made without a warrant, the defendant is liable only for an abuse of the authority of the special officer who jointly with Detective Regan made the arrest; and defendant is liable for the subsequent proceedings initiated and conducted under the advice and direction of its attorney, Kelly, if his conduct was without probable cause and with malice. Inasmuch as both Kelly and Madden proceeded upon the same facts, we need only inquire whether Madden abused his authority in causing the arrest of plaintiff, and whether Kelly was legally justified in preparing the complaint against plaintiff and causing his alleged crime to be examined into.

[3] The evidence shows that plaintiff was arrested without a warrant and detained under that arrest until, upon the advice and direction of Kelly, a complaint was filed and a warrant was served, whereupon plaintiff gave bond and was released from custody. It seems to us that, under the circumstances, the special officer, Madden, did not abuse his authority, but was entirely justified in making the arrest.

Classen was a teamster and received freight only as delivered to him by plaintiff, the checker, and Newman, the trucker, both of whom were defendant's employés in charge of the freight shed. They were the persons through whom the theft, with the aid of Classen, could easily have been effected. Having traced the case of shoes from Heintz to Classen, he at first denied taking it, but finally admitted his participation, but claimed, what might very probably have been the fact, that others were implicated, and, when called upon to name them, he identified and pointed out plaintiff and Newman as his confederates, both of whom were, as we have seen, in a position to assist in consummating the theft. It seems to us that not only was Madden justified in arresting plaintiff, but would have been derelict in his duty not to have done so. He had the powers of a police officer (Act 1901, p. 666); and as such could make an arrest without a warrant, where a felony has been committed and "he has reasonable cause for believing the person arrested to have committed it." Pen. Code, § 836.

2. The second count in the complaint alleges that plaintiff was charged with the crime of felony and prosecuted by trial upon such charge "maliciously and without probable cause."

[4, 5] It was said in Smith v. Liverpool, etc., Ins. Co., 107 Cal. 432, 436, 40 Pac. 540, 542:

> "No principle is better established than that in actions for malicious prosecution the plaintiff must, in order to recover, establish not only malice, but want of probable cause. Those two elements are essential, and they must concur or the action will not lie. Potter v. Seale, 8 Cal. 217, 220; Anderson v. Coleman, 53 Cal. 188. 'The primary question to be considered in this class of cases,' as was said in Grant v. Moore, 29 Cal. 644, 'is the want of probable cause for the prosecution complained of, and this must be established before plaintiff can recover; and the burden of proof is upon the plaintiff.' Jones v. Jones, 71 Cal. 91 [11 Pac. 817]. Reasonable or probable cause has been defined to be: 'A suspicion founded upon circumstances sufficiently strong to warrant a reasonable man in the belief that the charge is true.' Potter v. Seale, supra, and cases there cited."

[6, 7] Malice may be inferred from want of probable cause, but the latter cannot be inferred from malice. Potter v. Seale, supra, 8 Cal. 220. Probable cause is a mixed question of law and fact, and where the circumstances clearly appear by uncontradicted testimony, it is the province of the court to determine the question of probable cause. Id. "Public policy and public security alike require that prosecutors should be protected by the law from civil liabilities; except in those cases where the two elements of malice in the prosecutor and want of probable cause for the prosecution both concur" (Id.), and "if the prosecutor have reasonable grounds for his belief, and act thereon in good faith in causing the arrest, he shall not be subjected to damages merely because the accused is not convicted." Carpenter v. Ashley, 15 Cal. App. 461, 467, 115 Pac. 268.

[8] There is no legal presumption of malice, and although malice may be inferred from want of probable cause or other circumstances, as an inference of fact, still, whether by inference or otherwise, it must be proven as a fact. Griswold v. Griswold, 143 Cal. 617, 77 Pac. 672.

[9] "To constitute malice there must be malus animus, denoting that the party who instituted the proceedings was actuated by wrong motives" (26 Cyc. 48); i. e., he must have had in his mind some evil or sinister purpose.

[10] There is no evidence in the record directly indicating malice, nor are there any circumstances which would justify the inference of malice unless it may be inferred from proof of want of probable cause and from the discharge of plaintiff at the hearing of the complaint, and this latter circumstance in itself furnishes no basis for an inference of malice.

[11] We do not think there was evidence sufficient to support an inference of want of probable cause. The facts were fully stated to Mr. Kelly, who prepared the complaint. He did not know plaintiff, and he testified that he had no ill feeling towards him. He knew him to be a trusted employé of defendant, and had no reason or motive to prosecute him other than an honest belief from the facts given him that plaintiff was guilty and should be punished. He delayed a short time from taking immediate action to that end until he could investigate the case and satisfy himself that there was probable cause for filing a complaint, and we do not think the delay was so unreasonable as to warrant an inference that he, in his final action, was governed by motives of ill will or malice towards plaintiff, or proceeded otherwise than from what he believed and was justified in believing was his duty. Upon the subject of probable cause the following California cases may be consulted: Dwain v. Descalso, 66 Cal. 415, 5 Pac. 903; Smith v. L. L. & G. Ins. Co., 107 Cal. 432, 40 Pac. 540; Davis v. Pac. Telegraph & Telephone Co., 127 Cal. 312, 57 Pac. 764, 59 Pac. 698; Booraem v. Potter Hotel Co., 154 Cal. 99, 97 Pac. 65.

[12] It is claimed that, as plaintiff was the confederate of Classen and could not be convicted on the latter's uncorroborated testimony, it showed want of probable cause to arrest plaintiff on Classen's statement. It is not necessary to justify an arrest that the complainant be possessed of proofs of guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. All that the law requires is that the complainant have reasonable cause to believe that the crime has been committed, and that he is not actuated by malice. Classen occupied a position of some trust and confidence with his employer. There was nothing in his past life to awaken doubt as to the truthfulness of his story, and there was no reason why he should have falsely implicated plaintiff.

Atchison, T. & Santa Fé Ry. Co. v. Smith, 60 Kan. 4, 55 Pac. 272, was a case where the complaint was based mainly upon the confession of a confederate. There were some slight corroborating circumstances, as there were in the present case, but the charge rested chiefly on the confession. The person charged was acquitted, but in his subsequent action for malicious prosecution it was held that the company did not act without probable cause.

In our opinion Kelly was justified in taking the steps he did upon the information given him, and that plaintiff failed to establish either want of probable cause or malice.

Error is predicated of certain instructions given and certain others refused. We do not find it necessary to pass upon these assignments of error. It is not likely, should another trial take place, that the evidence would be materially different, in which case a verdict for plaintiff would not be permitted to stand.

The judgment and order are reversed.

BRADY et al. v. DAVIS et al. (L. A. 3340.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 8, 1914.)

TAXATION (§ 553*)—ASSESSMENT—VALIDITY—AFFIDAVIT.

Pol. Code, § 3732, provides that the auditor shall deliver the corrected assessment books to the tax collector, with an affidavit attached thereto, declaring that he had received the assessment book from the supervisors, with the clerk's affidavit thereto affixed, and that he had corrected it to conform to the requirements of the State Board of Equalization; that he had reckoned the respective sums due as taxes, and had added up the columns of valuation, taxes, and acreage as required by law. Held that, where the assessment books were delivered to the collector without such affidavit, the auditor did the things required to be shown by the affidavit was immaterial, and the assessment was insufficient to support a sale of land attempted to be assessed for nonpayment of taxes.

ANGELLOTTI, J. Action to quiet title to a lot in the county of Los Angeles. The court found that plaintiffs were the owners of said lot and that defendants have no title or interest therein. Judgment was given accordingly. Defendants appeal from the judgment and from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

It is conceded that the plaintiffs were the owners of the property unless the title of their predecessor in interest had been divested by delinquent tax proceedings culminating in a deed from the state to the defendant M. M. Davis. The sale to the state and the subsequent sale to the defendant M. M. Davis were founded upon an assessment of the property for state and county taxes for the year 1894. It was shown without conflict that the auditor of Los Angeles county had not, at any time prior to the commencement of this action, made or attached to the assessment book for 1894, the year in which the taxes claimed to have been delinquent had been assessed, the affidavit required by section 3732 of the Political Code. In fact, it was made to appear that such affidavit has never been attached to said assessment book.

Regardless of other points made in support of affirmance, the judgment and order denying a new trial must be affirmed upon the authority of Moyer v. Wilson, 166 Cal. 261, 135 Pac. 1125. The fact that it was shown on the trial that the auditor did the things required to be shown by such affidavit is entirely immaterial. The actual annexing of the affidavit is essential to the validity of the proceedings, and such annexing must be made at least prior to the making of the sale to the state. Moyer v. Wilson, supra.

It is to be noted that judgment was ordered in favor of plaintiffs in this action only upon condition that the plaintiffs pay to the clerk of the court, for the use and benefit of the defendants, the amount, specifying it, of the purported taxes, penalties, interest, and costs against the property on the day of the sale of said property by the state, and the judgment recites that such payment was made.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

LOS ANGELES GAS & ELECTRIC CORPORATION v. AMALGAMATED OIL CO. (L. A. 3240.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 3, 1914.)

1. Contracts (§ 278*)—Breach—Rights of Action—Performance by Plaintiff.

A party cannot recover damages for the breach of an entire contract, where he himself has failed, without lawful cause, to perform the covenants upon compliance with which the obligations of the defendant were dependent.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Cent. Dig. §§ 1207–1213; Dec. Dig. § 278.*]

2. Sales (§ 71*)—Construction—Quantity.

Where plaintiff agreed to purchase from defendant for a period of several years a sufficient quantity of crude oil to operate its plants over and above the amount agreed to be delivered to plaintiff by another company under yearly contracts providing for the delivery of not less than 12,500 nor more than 15,000 barrels per month, the act of plaintiff in purchasing from the second company more than the maximum quantity in some months and in others less than the minimum constituted a breach of contract authorizing defendant to refuse to perform, though the amount purchased by plaintiff from the second oil company during the year did not exceed the total of the maximum amounts, for the contract contemplated that whenever plaintiff needed more oil during a month than the maximum amount it should be purchased from defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Cent. Dig. §§ 189–196; Dec. Dig. § 71.*]

3. Sales (§ 176*)—Breach—Waiver.

A letter written the last month in the year informing defendant that plaintiff was receiving the balance of oil to make deliveries the maximum as contracted for with the second oil company was not notice that defendant had at other times received more than the maximum and at others less than the minimum, and so there was no waiver by defendant of plaintiff's breach of contract; for waiver presupposes knowledge of the facts which give the right.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank G. Finlayson, Judge.

Action by the Los Angeles Gas & Electric Corporation against the Amalgamated Oil Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Wm. A. Cheney, Herbert J. Goudge, and Le Roy M. Edwards, all of Los Angeles, for appellant. Ward Chapman, Warren E. Lloyd, Hunsaker & Britt, and O'Melveny, Stevens & Millikin, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. This action was brought to recover damages for the alleged breach of a contract for the sale by the Associated Oil Company to the Los Angeles Gas & Electric Company of a sufficient quantity of oil (over and above the amounts already contracted for with other parties) to operate its gas and electric plants from February 1, 1905, to December 31, 1910. The plaintiff is the successor of the Los Angeles Gas & Electric Company. The contract was assigned by the Associated Oil Company to the defendant, Amalgamated Oil Company. We shall in this opinion refer to the plaintiff or its predecessor as the Gas Company, and to the defendant, Amalgamated Oil Company, or its assignor, as the Oil Company.

The contract has already received consideration at the hands of this court in Los Angeles Gas & Electric Co. v. Amalgamated Oil Co., 156 Cal. 776, 106 Pac. 55, and its main features are set forth in the opinion there filed. In that action the plaintiff had sought to recover damages for the failure of the defendant to deliver certain oil demanded during the months of January and February, 1907. The plaintiff's allegation of performance on its part of all the obligations of the contract was put in issue by the answer. No evidence in support of the allegation was introduced by the plaintiff, and the defendant's motion for nonsuit was granted by the court. On the appeal the plaintiff's contention was that the contract was severable "into as many distinct agreements of sale as there were months in the term during which deliveries were to be made." The holding of this court was, however, that the contract was entire with respect to the covenants on the one part to take, and on the other to furnish, the oil required for the operation of plaintiff's plants during the specified term. This being so, it was incumbent on plaintiff to prove, as a prerequisite to its right to recover damages for the failure to deliver oil in January and February, 1907, that it had up to that point complied with its obligation to receive from the defendant all oil which it had contracted to take. Proof on this point lacking, the nonsuit was held to have been properly granted.

Thereupon the present action was commenced to recover damages for the entire period remaining after the refusal of the defendant in December, 1906, or January, 1907, to deliver any more oil. In this action, as in the former one, the complaint alleged performance by the Gas Company of all the obligations imposed upon it under the contract. It alleged that on December 31, 1906, the defendant gave written notice to the Gas Company that said defendant no longer considered itself bound by the contract; that subsequent to said date the Gas Company demanded of the defendant that it furnish a quantity of crude oil; and that defendant refused to deliver said or any crude oil under the contract. It further alleged that, prior to the 31st day of December, 1906, the defendant had violated the contract by delivering to the Gas Company at various times in place of crude oil, as required and ordered under the terms of said contract, oil which had been "topped, skimmed, and from which had been removed by defendant the more volatile and lighter parts." Such topped oil, it was alleged was inferior to crude oil in gas making qualities. The Gas Company was not aware that the oil thus delivered had been topped until after the abandonment of the contract by the Oil Company. Damages were prayed for in the sum of $441,857.25.

The answer denies the performance by the Gas Company of all the obligations imposed upon it by the contract. It alleges that the notice of December 31, 1906, and the Oil Company's refusal thereafter to make any deliveries of oil under the contract, were caused by the breaches and violations of the contract theretofore committed by the Gas Company. It is admitted that the Oil Company delivered some 67,000 barrels of topped oil to the Gas Company, but denied that such topped oil was inferior in gas-making qualities to crude oil. The answer also pleads that the action is barred by the provisions of section 339 of the Code of Civil Procedure. By amendments to the pleadings issues were raised with respect to the receipt by plaintiff from the Union Oil Company, E. A. Summers, and R. F. Joyce of certain quantities of oil, in violation, as the defendant contended, of plaintiff's obligation to take from the defendant all oil required in the operation of the plants over and above the exceptions specified in the contract. The plaintiff's contentions, on the other hand, were and are that these purchases from the Union Oil Company and others were not in violation of defendant's rights under the contract, and that in any event the defendant had waived all objections to such purchases. The statement of further particulars with respect to these purchases may be deferred until we come to a discussion of the points of law made in connection therewith.

The court found that the defendant had violated the contract by delivering topped oil as alleged in the complaint, but that no such oil was delivered at any time prior to March 20, 1906. It found, in effect, that the plaintiff had committed a breach of the contract by purchasing 5,800 barrels of oil from one Joyce during the year 1905, and that defendant had no knowledge of such purchase at any time prior to December 31, 1906, and never consented to the delivery of such oil by Joyce. It further found that the plaintiff had violated the contract by making purchases of oil from the Union Oil Company during the years 1905 and 1906, and that defendant did not consent to such purchases. It found also that the cause of action stated in the complaint was barred by section 339 of the Code of Civil Procedure. As conclusions of law it determined that plaintiff was not entitled to take anything by its action, and that defendant was entitled to judgment for its costs. Judgment in accordance with these conclusions followed. The plaintiff appeals from the judgment.

The appellant founds its demand for a reversal upon the claim that several of the findings above outlined are contrary to the evidence.

[1] Without regard to the finding that the action was barred by limitation, it is, in effect, conceded, as it necessarily must be, that judgment in favor of the defendant necessarily followed from the findings that the plaintiff had violated the contract in material respects before any breach had been committed by the defendant, and that such violations by the plaintiff had not been waived by the defendant. A party cannot recover damages for the breach of an entire contract if he himself has failed, without lawful cause, to perform the covenants, upon compliance with which the obligations of the defendant were dependent. Thus, in this case, a failure by the Gas Company to take from the Oil Company all of the oil agreed to be taken (or, which is the same thing, the taking of such oil from others) would deprive the plaintiff of the right to complain of the subsequent refusal of the defendant to furnish oil agreed to be delivered. This is the statement of an elementary rule, which requires, for present purposes, no citation of authority beyond the decision, already referred to, in the former litigation between the same parties. L. A. G. & E. Co. v. Amal. Oil Co., 156 Cal. 776, 106 Pac. 55. If, then, the findings that defendant committed no breach prior to March 20, 1906, that plaintiff had theretofore repeatedly broken the contract by purchasing oil from the Union Oil Company, and that such breaches had not been waived, are supported by sufficient evidence, we need look no further.

[2] We are satisfied that these findings are amply sustained by the record, and shall, therefore, have no occasion to discuss other interesting questions presented by counsel, such as the correctness of the lower court's determination that the action was barred, or the legal consequences resulting from the findings that some of the breaches committed by plaintiff were subsequent to breaches committed by the defendant.

The oil which the Gas Company bound itself, by this contract, to take from the Oil Company was "a sufficient quantity of crude oil to operate" its plants, "over and above the amounts heretofore contracted for to be delivered to said second party (Gas Company) during the term of this contract by others than said first party (Oil Company)." A list of said contracts and the amounts of oil covered thereby was referred to in the main contract and attached to it as an exhibit. The exhibit listed four contracts, all between the Gas Company and the Union Oil Company. Two of them are described as follows:

"1905. Union Oil Co. of Cal. not less than 12,500 nor more than 15,000 bbls. per month.

"1906. Union Oil Co. of Cal. Not less than 12,500 nor more than 15,000 bbls. per month."

The other two are for later periods, and are not important in the matter now under discussion.

These contracts between the Gas Company and the Union Oil Company were introduced in evidence. By a contract dated January 11, 1904 (described in the record as Exhibit BE), the Union Oil Company agreed to sell, and the Gas Company agreed to buy during the term of two years, 60,000 barrels of oil, at the rate of not more than 30,000 barrels per annum, nor more than 2,500 barrels per month. On February 17, 1904, a second contract (Exhibit BF) between the same parties was made, whereby the Union Oil Company agreed to sell and deliver, and the Gas Company to buy and receive, "fuel oil to the amount of, not to exceed, 12,500 barrels per month nor less than 10,000 barrels per month from the date hereof to and including December 31st, 1905, and not to exceed 15,000 barrels per month, nor less than 12,500 barrels per month during the calendar year 1906." These provisions were followed by stipulations covering grade and deliveries. It will be observed that the contract of January 11, 1904 (Exhibit BE), and that of February 17, 1904 (Exhibit BF), overlapped for the year 1905. Adding to the latter contract the 2,500 barrels per month provided for by the earlier one, it may properly be said that the parties had contracted for a delivery of not less than 12,500 barrels, and not more than 15,000 barrels, per month during the two years 1905 and 1906. And thus the contracts are described in the exhibit attached to the agreement between the parties to this action.

The court finds that during these years the gas company did order and receive from the Union Oil Company "for and during certain of the calendar months of said period less than 12,500 barrels per month, and for and during certain other calendar months of said period more than 15,000 barrels of oil per month." This finding is, as appellant concedes, supported by the evidence. Thus, taking a few months as examples, we find that in March, 1905, the Gas Company received from the Union Oil Company 17,259 barrels, in April, 1905, 20,384 barrels, in December, 1905, 32,866 barrels, in January, 1906, 28,835 barrels, while in May, June and July, 1905, the receipts were, respectively, 5,157, 9,981, and 8,912 barrels. These months were all prior to March, 1906, when, as the court finds, the defendant made its first breach of the contract by commencing the delivery of topped oil. It may be remarked, however, that the receipt of oil from the Union Oil Company in quantities of more than 15,000 or less than 12,500 barrels continued during the rest of 1906, the plaintiff thus receiving, in the months of November and December, 1906, in excess of 60,000 barrels. With the exception of this item of 60,000 barrels, the aggregate of the oil received from the Union Oil Company, as the court finds, "did not exceed the amount of oil which said Union Oil Company of California by the contracts referred to in the schedule attached to said contract" (i. e., the one here sued upon) "undertook to deliver during the years 1905 and 1906." It may be remarked in passing that this is not, as appellant contends, a finding that the Gas Company did not, in the aggregate, purchase of the Union Oil Company more oil than it was entitled to take from that company. The 60,000 odd barrels taken in November and December, 1906, are expressly excepted from the calculation. But, without regard to this point, we are brought to consider the question lying at the base of the branch of the case now under discussion, viz., whether the Gas Company violated the provisions of its contract with the Oil Company by taking oil from the Union Oil Company in quantities greater than the monthly maximum or less than the minimum called for by the terms of its contract with the said Union Oil Company. We entertain no doubt that this question must be answered here, as it was in the court below, in the affirmative. The construction of the contract between the parties herein, as affected by the contracts with the Union Oil Company, therein referred to, was discussed by the learned trial judge in an opinion, from which we quote as follows:

> "The contract which is the basis of this action —i. e., the contract between the Gas Company and the Associated Oil Company—requires the latter, during the term of the contract, to furnish the Gas Company with all the crude oil necessary to operate its plant, excepting only such oil as had theretofore been 'contracted for to be delivered' to the Gas Company by the Union Oil Company. The oil which the Gas Company had contracted for to be delivered by the Union Oil Company was not a fixed monthly quantity. For the years 1905 and 1906 it was a monthly amount not less than 12,500 barrels nor more than 15,000 barrels. The contract with the Union Oil Company required the latter to deliver to the Gas Company during each month of said two years an indefinite quantity of oil—a quantity ranging somewhere between said minimum and maximum amounts. None of these indefinite monthly quantities, ranging somewhere between said maximum and minimum quantities, became definite, fixed, or certain until in a particular month the Gas Company had ordered and received from the Union Oil Company the quantity for that particular month—a quantity not less than 12,500 nor more than 15,000 barrels. When, however, the Gas Company had actually received from the Union Oil Company, in any particular month, a quantity of oil ranging somewhere between 12,500 barrels and 15,000 barrels, the quantity so received for that month became the quantity 'contracted for to be delivered' to the Gas Company for that month.
> "The contract between the Gas Company and the Oil Company—the contract for the alleged breach of which plaintiff is seeking damages—was a contract for oil to be used in the Gas Company's plants. The contract contemplates that it shall be so used, and not otherwise.
> "The contract between the Amalgamated Oil Company and the Gas Company did not call for monthly deliveries, nor even weekly or daily deliveries; nor did it fix any prescribed period or periods of time during which deliveries should be made. By it the Oil Company agreed to furnish, and the Gas Company agreed to receive, all the oil necessary to meet the latter's 'requirements' in the manufacture of gas and electricity, except such as had theretofore been 'contracted for to be delivered to' the Gas Company by the Union Oil Company. The Gas Company's plants were in operation day and night—in practically continuous operation. It was necessary that it should always have on hand quantities of oil sufficient to operate its plants. The maximum monthly amounts which it had contracted for to be delivered by the Union Oil Company were not sufficient for its requirements in all the months of the year. Its business required it to have on hand at all times, or practically at all times, oil furnished by the defendant. This amount necessarily fluctuated. It was not the same at all the seasons of the year. But the defendant or its assignor was required to be prepared to make 'runs' into plaintiff's tanks on receiving from plaintiff 'three days' notice of its requirements.' So that, while the contract did not require the Oil Company to make monthly or even weekly or daily deliveries, it did contemplate a continuous series of deliveries—deliveries running over the whole term of the contract—and made whenever and as often as the Gas Company's requirements might necessitate, conditioned only by the Oil Company's right, before making any delivery, to receive three days' notice of the amount required by the Gas Company.
> "So far I have treated the clause in the contract between the Amalgamated Oil Company and the Gas Company in which reference is made to the prior contracts as a clause providing that the Amalgamated Oil Company shall deliver all oil sufficient to operate the Gas Company's plant over and above the 'oil' theretofore 'contracted for to be delivered' by the Union Oil Company. But the provision is that the Amalgamated Oil Company shall furnish all the oil sufficient to operate the Gas Company's plants over and above the 'amounts' theretofore contracted for to be delivered by the Union Oil Company. And it may be argued that, inasmuch as the Oil Company was to sell and deliver the oil sufficient to operate the Gas Company's plants, except the amount of oil contracted for to be delivered by the Union Oil Company, the Gas Company could add together all the maximum deliveries which it had the right to purchase and receive from the Union Oil Company, thus laying the foundation for the assertion of a right to cumulate the difference between the monthly amounts actually received from the Union Oil Company, in the months when it received less than the prescribed maximum, and the maximum amounts provided in the contracts with the Union Oil Company. But I am of the opinion that the result is the same, whether we read the clause in question as a provision excepting from the Gas Company's total requirements the 'oil contracted for to be delivered' by the Union Oil Company or the amounts 'contracted for to be delivered' by the Union Oil Company. The reference is not to an aggregate amount, but to amounts. The amounts are monthly amounts. They are not, as has been shown, fixed or definite amounts. The monthly amount to be purchased and received from the Union Oil Company remained indefinite and uncertain until it was actually purchased for the month in which it was to be used by the Gas Company. When purchased, and not before, it became, the amount 'contracted for to be delivered' in or for the particular month for which it was purchased.
> "The Gas Company, of course, was not obligated to purchase and receive from defendant, or its assignor, in any particular month the oil necessary to meet its requirements during that month, over and above the amount purchased and received by it in that month from the Union Oil Company. So much of the oil furnished by the defendant as the Gas Company was obligated to purchase or receive from the defendant for any particular month it could purchase and receive from the defendant in some prior month or months. But if for any month the Gas Company purchased and received from the Union Oil Company a quantity of oil exceeding the maximum fixed in its said contracts with the Union Oil Company (thus decreasing the amount of oil which the defendant would otherwise have furnished for that month), or if for any month the Gas Company purchased and received from the Union Oil Company a quantity of oil less than the minimum fixed in its said contracts with the Union Oil Company (thus increasing the amount of oil which the defendant would otherwise have furnished for that month), the Gas Company would be guilty of a breach of its contract with the Oil Company.
> "From the foregoing it follows that the Gas Company, without violating its contract with the Associated Oil Company, could not cumulate the difference between the minima and maxima prescribed in its contracts with the Union Oil Company and receive and use such cumulations. Though the contract between the Gas Company and the Associated Oil Company was an entire contract and one which contemplated a continuous series of deliveries, covering the whole term of the contract, the contracts with the Union Oil Company contemplated monthly purchases and deliveries; i. e., the purchase of and receipt in each and every month of a quantity of oil not less than a prescribed minimum nor more than a prescribed maximum—an amount which, when ascertained at the end of the month, became the amount 'contracted for to be delivered' during that month by the Union Oil Company.

"For the same reason, the defendant, without violating its contract with the Associated Oil Company, could not anticipate in any month deliveries due from the Union Oil Company in future months. To the extent that by such anticipations the Gas Company purchased and received for any one month oil above the maximum prescribed for that month in its contracts with the Union Oil Company, it decreased the amount which the defendant would otherwise have furnished for that month. And, since the right to such anticipations is not given to the Gas Company in any of its contracts with the Union Oil Company, deliveries of such anticipations are not deliveries of oil 'contracted for to be delivered to' the Gas Company under any contract made by it with the Union Oil Company, and therefore such deliveries of anticipated oil, to the extent that they decreased the oil which the defendant would otherwise have furnished in or for any particular month, are breaches of the contract between the Gas Company and the Oil Company (Associated Oil Company).

"It is reasonable to infer that the Gas Company used in the operation of its plants all the oil which it ordered and received from the Union Oil Company; and therefore it is reasonable to infer that if, in any particular month, the Gas Company ordered and received from the Union Oil Company an amount of oil less than the minimum prescribed in its contract with the Union Oil Company, the defendant was called upon to supply for the Gas Company's needs, in operating its plants during that month, an amount of oil in excess of the amount which, under the contract between the Gas Company and the Associated Oil Company, the defendant could rightfully be called upon to supply for that month; and, in the same manner, it is reasonable to infer that if, in any particular month, the Gas Company ordered and received from the Union Oil Company an amount greater than the maximum prescribed in its contracts with the Union Oil Company, the defendant was called upon to supply for the Gas Company's needs in operating its plants an amount of oil less than the amount which, under the contract between the Gas Company and the Associated Oil Company, it was rightfully entitled to supply for that month."

We think the passages just quoted afford a sufficient and convincing refutation of the appellant's claim that the oil company was not concerned with the amounts of oil taken in the several months of 1905 and 1906 from the Union Oil Company, provided only that the aggregate so taken did not exceed the sum of the maximum amounts of 15,000 barrels per month, computed for the entire period. In the interpretation of contracts, so much depends upon the language used by the parties in the particular case that it is often impossible to find decisions which furnish any real assistance in solving the problem presented. In the present instance we content ourselves with citing Central Oil Co. v. Southern Refg. Co., 154 Cal. 165, 97 Pac. 177, as a case which lends substantial support to the construction here approved.

[3] The finding that the breaches which we have been discussing were not waived by the defendant is supported by sufficient evidence. The record is a very large one, and we must limit ourselves to a mere reference to the testimony which we regard as affording justification for the court's finding. While the defendant did, in December, 1905, receive a letter from plaintiff stating that said plaintiff was "at present receiving the balance of oil to make deliveries the maximum, as contracted for with the Union Oil Company," the testimony of defendant's officers and agents was that they had no knowledge, until shortly before the repudiation of the contract, that the plaintiff had disregarded the limitations of its contract with the Union Oil Company. Giving to this letter its full force, the only information it conveyed was that, in December, 1905, the gas company was receiving amounts which, if delivered in prior months, would have been within the maximum of 15,000 barrels per month. There was no suggestion that theretofore the deliveries had, in certain months, been short of the minimum, and, in others, in excess of the maximum contracted for. Waiver of a right presupposes knowledge of the facts which give the right, and the letter relied on falls far short of informing the defendant of the full extent of the breaches upon which it now relies. Furthermore, the contract was again broken by plaintiff in the months of January, February, and March, 1906, and these breaches were not brought to the attention of defendant by the letter of December 20, 1905.

For the same reasons, and others as well, the interview of January, 1906, in which an officer of defendant was advised of the taking of "the accumulated quantity for 1905 under the Union contract," followed by the continued delivery of oil by the defendant thereafter, did not require the court to find that the plaintiff's violations of the contract in the matter of purchases from the Union Oil Company had been waived. It may be added that there was testimony that defendant, at the time of the interview last mentioned, notified the plaintiff that the right to receive accumulated balances was not conceded.

Of the issue regarding defendant's violation of the contract, it is sufficient to say that the evidence fully supports the finding that the defendant was guilty of no such violation prior to March 20, 1906.

The conclusions stated dispose of the case. It being held that the particular findings considered in this opinion are supported by evidence, the judgment must stand, whether or not other contentions of the appellant be correct.

The judgment is affirmed.

MADSEN v. MARYLAND CASUALTY CO. OF BALTIMORE. (S. F. 6659.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 6, 1914.)

1. Insurance (§ 375*)—Accident Policy—Waiver of Condition—Power of Soliciting Agent.

A mere soliciting agent of an insurance company cannot waive conditions and warranties, and hence the fact that he, in writing an application, knew that a statement or warranty therein was false did not effect a waiver of the warranty.

2. Insurance (§ 376*)—Policy—Limitation in Power of Agent—Validity.

A provision in a policy that no condition, warranty, etc., contained therein can be waived, altered, etc., by any soliciting agent is a valid limitation.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; Geo. E. Church, Judge.

Action by Robert K. Madsen against the Maryland Casualty Company of Baltimore. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed on rehearing.

Myrick & Deering, of San Francisco (James Walter Scott, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant. L. L. Cory, of Fresno, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. [1] A rehearing was granted in this case for further consideration of the principal question involved, namely, the power of a mere soliciting agent of an insurance company to effect the waiver of a warranty exacted from the insured by the insurer, either expressly or, as here, by himself writing the application for insurance and embodying a known false statement touching such warranty therein. Still further, a rehearing was granted because the identical question was before the court in another case, that of Sharman v. Continental Insurance Co., 138 Pac. 708. The decision in that case is controlling in this. It is to the effect, as there fully expressed, that such soliciting agent has not the power to waive conditions and warranties. The opinion of the District Court of Appeal hereto appended is therefore adopted, and the judgment appealed from is reversed.

"Appeal from judgment and order denying defendant's motion for a new trial. Plaintiff recovered judgment against defendant for the sum of $1,300 upon an accident insurance policy.

"One Graff, a soliciting agent for defendant, solicited the insurance from plaintiff, who was very deaf, as was well known to said Graff. The application for the policy was filled out by Graff, and without being signed, or read to or by plaintiff, was sent to the general agent of defendant. It contained a warranty to the effect that plaintiff was neither partially nor totally deaf. A policy was issued by the defendant and sent to plaintiff through the mail in August, 1904. It remained in his possession until and after the accident, which occurred in January, 1911.

"Among other things it in terms stated that it was issued 'in consideration of the warranties made in the application * * * (copy of which application is indorsed herein and made a part hereof).'

"A copy of the application was indorsed on the policy. The policy also contained the following condition: 'An agent has no authority to change this policy, nor to waive any of its provisions, nor shall notice to any agent or knowledge of his or any other person be held to effect a waiver or change in this contract, or any part of it. No change whatever in this policy and no waiver of its provisions shall be valid unless an indorsement is added thereto signed by the president or secretary of the company, expressing such change or waiver.

"Plaintiff placed this policy in his safe deposit box without reading it. It was for a term of one year, but for six successive years thereafter upon payment of the premium plaintiff procured from defendant renewal certificates as follows: 'In consideration of the premiums * * * Maryland Casualty Company of Baltimore hereby agrees to continue in force the above-numbered policy for twelve months, * * * provided the statements in the schedule of warranties in the original contract are true at this date, and that nothing exists at the date hereof to render the hazard greater than or different from that shown by said schedule.'

"Plaintiff was injured in a railroad accident. His deafness, which had existed from childhood and was permanent, in no way contributed to his injuries.

"No officer, agent, or other person connected with defendant, save Graff, had any knowledge of plaintiff's deafness. Graff, as we before stated, was but a soliciting agent.

"The points involved in this appeal are raised by specifications as to the insufficiency of the evidence to support the findings of fact, as well as to objections to certain evidence.

"Plaintiff's theory of the case is that the fact that Graff had knowledge of plaintiff's deafness charged the defendant with such knowledge, and effected a waiver of the warranty.

"But, aside from the fact that Graff was but a soliciting agent, the policy contains an express condition that no such waiver shall result from any such knowledge or notice.

[2] "That such a condition is a valid limitation upon the authority of a mere soliciting agent at least is now well established. Iverson v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., 151 Cal. 746, 91 Pac. 609, 13 L. R. A. (N. S.) 866; Fidelity & Casualty Co. of N. Y. v. Fresno Flume & Irrigation Co., 161 Cal. 466, 119 Pac. 646, 37 L. R. A. (N. S.) 322; Modern Woodmen of America v. Tevis, 117 Fed. 369, 54 C. C. A. 293; Wilkens v. Mut. Ben. Reserve Fund Life Ins. Co., 54 Hun, 294, 7 N. Y. Supp. 589; Fitzmaurice v. Mutual Life Ins. Co., 84 Tex.

61, 19 S. W. 301. There is no pretense or claim that any fraud was practiced upon the plaintiff.

[3] "By accepting and retaining the contract without objection, plaintiff was bound by its terms and cannot now be heard to say that he did not read it or know its terms. Quinlan v. P. W. Ins. Co., 133 N. Y. 356, 31 N. E. 31, 28 Am. St. Rep. 645; Cleaver v. Traders' Co., 65 Mich. 527, 32 N. W. 660, 8 Am. St. Rep. 908; Bostwick v. Mutual Life Ins. Co., 116 Wis. 392, 89 N. W. 538, 92 N. W. 246, 67 L. R. A. 705; Wierengo v. American Fire Ins. Co., 98 Mich. 621, 57 N. W. 833; McFarland v. St. Paul F. & M. Ins. Co., 46 Minn. 519, 49 N. W. 253; Reeve v. Phoenix Ins. Co., 23 La. Ann. 219; Overton v. Am. Cent. Ins. Co., 79 Mo. App. 1; Johnson v. Dakota F. & M. Ins. Co., 1 N. D. 167, 45 N. W. 799; Monitor Mut. Fire Ins. Co. v. Buffum, 115 Mass. 343; Conner v. Manchester Assur. Co., 130 Fed. 743, 65 C. C. A. 127, 70 L. R. A. 106.

"The fact that the deafness did not contribute to the injury is of no consequence. This is conceded by respondent.

"From what has been said as to the law concerning the assured's acceptance of a policy, plaintiff must be assumed to have known of the terms and conditions of the contract. From this it follows that the findings made upon a contrary theory are not supported by the evidence, and the judgment and order must be reversed; and it is so ordered."

LAW et al. v. SAN FRANCISCO GAS & ELECTRIC CO. (S. F. 6223.)

1. Novation (§ 6*)—What Constitutes.

Where defendant agreed with plaintiffs, who owned three buildings, to supply all three buildings with steam, and plaintiffs sold two of the buildings, defendant consenting to an assignment of the contract and agreeing to supply the purchaser, there was a novation, under Civ. Code, § 1531, declaring that a novation is made by the substitution of a new obligation between the same parties with intent to extinguish the old one; defendant's agreement to supply the purchaser of the two buildings with steam in accordance with the contract with plaintiffs, and consent to the assignment, rendering the purchaser an independent customer.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 5, pp. 4848–4851; vol. 8, p. 7733.*]

2. Steam (§ 5*)—Contracts—Construction—Indivisible Contracts.

A contract to supply three separate buildings with steam is not an indivisible contract, and, upon a sale of two of the buildings, the contract may, with the consent of the power company, be assigned to purchaser

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Steam, Dec. Dig. § 5.*]

3. Steam (§ 5*)—Contracts—Construction—Liability of Contractor.

Where defendant agreed to supply three buildings owned by plaintiffs with steam, and, upon plaintiffs' sale of two of the buildings, consented to an assignment of the contract to the purchaser, defendant's obligation to furnish plaintiffs steam for the building retained was not dependent upon the continued existence of all three buildings; there being no provision in the contract for its abrogation in such event.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Steam, Dec. Dig. § 5.*]

4. Steam (§ 5*)—Contract for Furnishing—Construction.

Where defendant, who agreed to furnish plaintiffs' three buildings with steam, consented to a partial assignment of the contract upon plaintiffs' sale of two of the buildings, the partial assignment relieved plaintiffs from the obligation to pay for steam for all three buildings, plaintiffs not occupying a position analogous to a lessee, who has assigned his lease, and hence plaintiffs may demand steam for the building retained, though the purchaser, after the destruction of the other buildings, did not require steam.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Steam, Dec. Dig. § 5.*]

5. Steam (§ 5*)—Contracts—Construction.

Where defendant agreed to furnish plaintiff steam for three buildings, the contract providing that defendant should not be responsible for interruptions of service due to municipal interference, strikes, fires, actions of the elements, etc., it is no defense, to an action for damages for failure to furnish steam, that, after the destruction of defendant's plant, it was not rebuilt.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Steam, Dec. Dig. § 5.*]

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by Hartland Law and another against the San Francisco Gas & Electric Company, a corporation. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Wm. B. Bosley, of San Francisco, for appellant. Edgar C. Chapman, of San Francisco, for respondents.

MELVIN, J. Defendant appeals from a judgment entered in accordance with the award of arbitrators and from an order of the superior court refusing to vacate said award.

On or about the 20th day of July, 1905, the plaintiffs entered into a contract with the defendant corporation by which the latter agreed to furnish steam for heating the Monadnock, Rialto, and Crossley buildings situated in the city and county of San Francisco. At that time plaintiffs owned all three of these buildings. The steam was generated at the manufactory of defendant known as "Station C," and under the terms of the contract was to be delivered at a designated point to the pipes of plaintiffs running to said buildings. The corporation agreed to furnish steam for 24 hours a day at an approximate pressure of 100 pounds, and payment was to be made at the rate of one cent per cubic foot of distilled water returned through meters from the heating systems. The life of the agreement was to be ten years. Under this contract steam was delivered and paid for. On the 16th of March, 1906, plaintiffs conveyed the Rialto and Crossley buildings to Mrs. Theresa A. Oelrichs.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

On that date the president of the San Francisco Gas & Electric Company, Mr. John A. Britton, wrote to Messrs. Tobin & Tobin, attorneys for Mrs. Oelrichs, consenting that the contract for the supply of steam might be assigned to her in so far as it related to the two buildings which she had purchased. The letter also contained the following paragraph:

"Should it be your client's desire to have a separate contract made upon the same terms, ending at the same period of time as the contract with Mr. Law, I shall be pleased, on behalf of the San Francisco Gas & Electric Company, to enter into such a contract at your pleasure."

On the 17th of March, 1906, plaintiffs assigned the contract of July 20, 1905, in so far as it affected and applied to the Crossley and Rialto buildings, to Mrs. Oelrichs, and the assignment was delivered to her. Said assignment has never been canceled or rescinded. Mrs. Oelrichs never accepted defendant's offer to enter into a separate contract regarding the two buildings which she had purchased from the Law brothers.

On the 18th day of April, 1906, in the great conflagration in San Francisco the Crossley and Rialto buildings were practically destroyed, and the Monadnock building, together with defendant's Station C, were partly demolished. At the time of the arbitration the two buildings belonging to Mrs. Oelrichs had not been rebuilt, but the plaintiffs had reconstructed the Monadnock building, had demanded steam from defendant, and had been refused. Station C, the only plant which defendant had owned prior to April 18, 1906, from which it could supply steam under its contract, had not been rebuilt with a view to continuing steam service. These and other facts were submitted to a board of arbitrators, and the three following questions were, by said submission, propounded to them:

"(a) Was said contract of July 20, 1905, extinguished by reason of all or any of the facts herein recited and agreed upon? And (b) Was the further performance by the defendant of the said contract of July 20, 1905, excused by reason of all or any of the facts hereinbefore recited and agreed upon? And (c) If it shall be determined by said arbitrators that the said contract of July 20, 1905, was not extinguished, and that the further performance thereof by the defendant after the 18th day of April, 1906, was not excused by reason of all or any of the facts hereinbefore recited and agreed upon, then, and in that event only, what is the amount of the loss and damage which the plaintiffs have suffered by reason of the defendant's failure and refusal to further perform said contract of July 20, 1905, and to furnish steam under and pursuant to the provisions thereof for the heating of said Monadnock building subsequent to the 18th day of April, 1906?"

The arbitrators took testimony, considered the matters involved, and made a report in which the first two interrogatories were answered in the negative, and the damages were fixed in the sum of $14,595.

Passing, without deciding, the contention that defendant's attack on the award and judgment entered thereon is not in accord with the provisions of section 1287 of the Code of Civil Procedure, we will consider the arguments of counsel for appellant upon the mistakes of law by which he insists the arbitrators failed properly to analyze the contract and to give the award which a proper analysis would have made inevitable. He relies upon the following propositions:

(1) The contract of July 20, 1905, was in its nature entire and indivisible.

(2) The obligations arising under said contract were contingent upon the continued existence of the three buildings; further performance being excused by the destruction of two of them.

(3) The contract was rescinded by defendant's action in that regard because of partial failure of consideration resulting from destruction of two of the buildings.

(4) The assignment to Mrs. Oelrichs did not modify the obligation of plaintiffs to take and pay for all of the steam necessary for the heating of the three buildings.

(5) The obligations of the parties to continue performance of the contract were contingent upon the existence of defendant's steam plant, and defendant was excused by the destruction thereof from further performance.

[1, 2] It is doubtless true, as appellant's counsel contends, that ordinarily when a contract is made with reference to several parcels of property belonging to one person, the obligations of the agreement will not be met by performance with reference to one of them. Thus in Sterling v. Gregory, 149 Cal. 118, 85 Pac. 305, where the defendant had agreed to purchase all of the oranges from three groves, all belonging to plaintiff, the sale by the latter of the fruit from two of the orchards was held to be a breach of the agreement sufficient to support a rescission. In McConnell v. Corona City Water Co., 149 Cal. 61, 85 Pac. 929, 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1171, this court held that the contract for driving a tunnel a certain distance was indivisible, but held, nevertheless, that where part of the tunnel caved in, by reason of the failure of defendant to furnish proper timbers, plaintiff might sue for the value of the work done and might obtain damages for loss of estimated profits. So in Loudenback Fertilizer Co. v. Tennessee Phosphate Co., 121 Fed. 298, 58 C. C. A. 220, 61 L. R. A. 402, it was held that a contract for the sale of "all phosphate rock which should be needed for the ordinary requirements of plaintiff's factory" was a single contract and not a number of agreements for the sale of definite quantities of rock as ordered from time to time.

Norrington v. Wright, 115 U. S. 188, 6 Sup. Ct. 12, 29 L. Ed. 366, involved a contract for the delivery of 5,000 tons of rails, 1,000 tons during each of five specified months. It was held that partial default in delivery affected the entire contract. But in none of these cited cases was there involved a partial assignment of the contract with the assent of both parties. Respondents insist that the partial assignment to Mrs. Oelrichs with the consent of the defendant amounted to a novation. Appellant's position is that it assented only to the assignment of the benefits of the contract without consenting to the relief of plaintiffs from the obligations thereof. But, as respondents insist, they had the right to make such an assignment without the consent of the other party to the agreement. There can be little doubt that the intention of the defendant was to release the Laws and to substitute their vendee as to that part of the contract relating to the buildings purchased by her. The offer made by the president of the corporation to enter into a separate contract with her for the supply of steam to her two buildings indicates unerringly such intention. It is argued that Mrs. Oelrichs' failure to accept the offer of a separate contract prevented novation; but the plaintiffs would not have been parties to that new agreement, and, if the position of appellant is correct, their original contract was held in suspense until the action of Mrs. Oelrichs and defendant in entering into a new agreement of which they (the plaintiffs) might have no knowledge. The letter of the president of the defendant corporation to Mrs. Oelrichs was accepted in all particulars by the plaintiffs because the assignment of a part of the contract to their vendee was indorsed upon it. In effect that letter said to them and to her:

> "This corporation will allow the Law brothers to substitute their vendee for themselves in that part of the agreement relating to the Rialto and Crossley buildings, and if she wants a more formal substitution we will make a new contract with her."

The transaction was a novation under section 1531 of the Civil Code. By the terms of the original agreement the defendant corporation was empowered to use the pipe system of plaintiffs, if necessary in delivering steam to other customers. If such deliveries had been made, could the company have refused to furnish steam to the three buildings originally owned by the plaintiffs because the other customers had declined to accept delivery after the fire? Assuredly not. The assignment with defendant's consent of the contract for steam to heat the Crossley and the Rialto and the offer by defendant to execute a separate contract with Mrs. Oelrichs had the effect of making her a customer of the San Francisco Gas & Electric Company just as if she had caused that corporation under that contract to make connections of its steam pipes between the system of plaintiffs and some building not included in the original scheme. In other words, the Crossley and Rialto buildings were placed in the same category with newly connected buildings. There was nothing in the original contract limiting the activities of the corporation to the supply of steam to the three buildings of the Law brothers. On the contrary, there was provision for extension, if need be, of the defendant's business of steam supply. In the conduct of such business there would be no essential indivisibility of the subject-matter of the various agreements preventing their assignment, with the consent of the company furnishing the steam, whenever a building connected with the system should be sold. We cannot say that the contract was one, the subject-matter of which might not be divided by consent of the parties.

[3, 4] It is argued that the obligation of the parties to perform the contract of July 20, 1905, depended upon the continued existence of the three buildings, and that performance was excused by the destruction of two of them. In this behalf appellant cities such authorities as Taylor v. Caldwell, 3 B. & S. 833, where the rule is thus announced:

> "There seems no doubt that, where there is a positive contract to do a thing not in itself unlawful, the contractor must perform it or pay damages for not doing it, although, in consequence of unforeseen accidents, the performance of his contract has become unexpectedly burthensome or even impossible. * * * But this rule is only applicable when the contract is positive and absolute and not subject to any condition, either express or implied, and there are authorities which, as we think, establish the principle that where, from the nature of the contract, it appears that the parties must from the beginning have known that it could not be fulfilled unless, when the time for the fulfillment of the contract arrived, some particular specified thing continued to exist, so that, when entering into the contract, they must have contemplated such continuing existence as the foundation of what was to be done; there, in the absence of any express or implied warranty that the thing shall exist, the contract is not to be construed as a positive contract, but as subject to an implied condition that the parties shall be excused in case, before breach, performance becomes impossible from the perishing of the thing without default of the contractor."

The facts in that case were quite different from those involved here. One party to the contract agreed to give to the other the use of a certain music hall on specified days. By the accidental burning of the hall both parties were discharged from the contract. There is nothing in the contract before us, either express or implied, which brings it under the rule in Taylor v. Caldwell and similar authorities cited by appellant. Dexter v. Norton, 47 N. Y. 63, 7 Am. Rep. 415, cited in this behalf, is easily distinguishable from the case at bar. In the opinion in that case it was held that an obligation to deliver specific articles of personal property, namely, certain designated bales of cotton, was excused by the destruction of the property by fire without fault on the part of the vendor. The general rule, however, was there declared to be that, where a person actually contracts to do a certain lawful and not impossible thing, neither inevitable accident nor those events denominated acts of God will excuse him; the reason for the rule being that he might have provided for such contingencies by contract. In Lorillard v. Clyde, 142 N. Y. 458, 37 N. E. 489, 24 L. R. A. 113, the court was considering a contract by which certain dividends of a corporation were guaranteed. Dissolution of the corporation without fault of either party was held a sufficient reason for failure to perform. The agreement between the parties in the case now under discussion was drawn in anticipation of the possibility of interruption in the service by reason of fire or other destructive force, yet no provision was made for abrogation of the contract as the result of such event. The paragraph on this subject is as follows:

> "This company will not be responsible for interruptions of said service due to municipal interference, strikes, fires, actions of the elements, or causes beyond its control, but will endeavor to furnish an uninterrupted supply."

It is contended that the partial assignment of the contract did not operate to relieve the assignors from the obligation to pay for steam for the three buildings, and in this behalf an attempt is made to draw an analogy between this agreement and a lease. It is true that authorities are not wanting for the proposition that the assignment of a lease, even with the lessor's consent, does not necessarily relieve the lessee from the liability for any breach of covenant or condition contained therein. Clarke v. Cummings, 5 Barb. (N. Y.) 339; Jackson v. Clark, 7 Johns. (N. Y.) 227. But in a lease there is ordinarily a privity of estate and a privity of contract between lessor and lessee; therefore the assignment of the lease, considered as an estate in land, does not necessarily carry with it the assignment of an express covenant to pay rent. In this contract there was no stipulation for payment by plaintiffs for all of the steam furnished at all events. They were to pay for all the steam delivered at the three buildings, but the general assignment of the contract, so far as it affected and applied to two of the buildings, carried with it the obligations and benefits relating to the entire subject-matter of the agreement, so far as those two buildings were involved. There was no privity of contract as distinguished from privity of estate, and consequently no analogy between this assignment and the transfer of the ordinary lease.

[5] Appellant's counsel insists that continued existence of the steam plant, as well as continued existence of all the buildings, were conditions and essential parts of the existence of the contract of July 20, 1905. This argument is met by the clause quoted above, in which interruption of the service by fire or other destructive agency is excused but not made the basis for the termination of the status of the parties.

We conclude, therefore, that the contract was severed by the act of the parties on March 17, 1906, culminating in the assignment to Mrs. Oelrichs of the part relating to the two buildings which she had purchased; and that this severance resulted in a novation. The contract was then not one depending solely upon the continued existence either of all of the buildings or of the steam producing machinery at defendant's Station C. It follows that plaintiffs were entitled to an award of damages for the refusal of the San Francisco Gas & Electric Company to continue to furnish steam to the Monadnock building, on account of which they were obliged to make expensive changes in their heating system. It is not asserted that, if the defendant was bound to continue furnishing steam to plaintiffs as requested, the amount of damages fixed by the arbitrators was excessive.

The judgment and order are therefore affirmed.

We concur: LORIGAN, J.; HENSHAW, J.

POSTLETHWAITE v. MINOR et al.

(S. F. 6075.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 959*) — REVIEW — DISCRETION OF LOWER COURT—PLEADING—AMENDMENT.

The discretion of the court in allowing amendments is so broad that the Supreme Court will disturb it only upon a distinct showing of an abuse of such discretion.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3825–3831; Dec. Dig. § 959.*]

2. GUARANTY (§ 6*)—AGREEMENTS TO GUARANTEE—REMEDY FOR BREACH.

A provision of an agreement for the formation of a corporation that certain of the parties should indorse and guarantee the payment of bonds of the corporation to be issued to another party was entirely executory and contemplated a future guaranty of the bonds by indorsement and was not a present guaranty, and hence the remedy for the failure of such parties to indorse the bonds was not by an action against them as guarantors but by a suit for specific performance or other appropriate action on the agreement to guarantee or on the breach thereof, in view of Civ. Code, § 3109, providing that one who agrees to indorse a negotiable instrument is bound to write his signature upon the back of the instrument, if there is sufficient space thereon for that purpose.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Guaranty, Cent. Dig. § 8; Dec. Dig. § 6.*]

3. GUARANTY (§ 27*) — CONSTRUCTION OF GUARANTY.

Contracts of guaranty create no liability beyond what is expressed in the terms used, as interpreted by the proper rules of construction, and the words are not to be interpreted, save in their ordinary popular sense.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Guaranty, Cent. Dig. § 28; Dec. Dig. § 27.*]

4. GUARANTY (§ 30*)—AGREEMENTS TO GUARANTEE—RIGHT OF ACTION.

The holder of bonds of a corporation, who was not a party to the agreement to form such corporation nor interested in it by transfer, assignment, or otherwise, could not sue certain parties to such agreement for their breach of their agreement therein to indorse such bonds.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Guaranty, Cent. Dig. §§ 30–32; Dec. Dig. § 30.*]

5. GUARANTY (§ 76*)—AGREEMENTS TO GUARANTEE—ASSIGNMENT.

The guaranty of a note or bill, made in a separate instrument, will not pass by the transfer of the note or bill.

Shaw and Henshaw, JJ., dissenting.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Geo. A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Action by Hugh W. Postlethwaite against Isaac Minor, Sr., and others. From a judgment for defendants and orders discharging a writ of attachment and denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

John A. Wright, of San Francisco (Geo. F. Hatton and H. F. Peart, both of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant. Knight & Heggerty, Frank McGowan, Gillett & Cutler, and McGowan & Westlake, all of San Francisco, and Otto C. Gregor, of Eureka, for respondents.

MELVIN, J. Plaintiff appeals from a judgment against him, from an order discharging a writ of attachment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The action was one whereby plaintiff sought to enforce an alleged guaranty by defendants of certain bonds of the Central Casket & Supply Company (a corporation). The court found that 87 of the 90 bonds issued by the Central Casket & Supply Company together with interest thereon from February 15, 1906, remained unpaid; that there was due to the plaintiff, as owner and holder of said bonds, something more than $55,000, but that the defendants did not, nor did either or any of them, in any manner guarantee the payment of any of said bonds either on the 21st of June, 1905, the day alleged in the complaint, or at any other time. Therefore, as learned counsel for appellant aptly phrases it:

> "The existence or nonexistence of the guaranty is therefore the question which forms the core of the case."

Plaintiff does not assert that the bonds were actually and physically indorsed by the defendant, but his position is that by a certain contract, called in the briefs the "fundamental agreement," in which the defendants promised that they would, under the conditions mentioned therein, jointly and severally indorse and guarantee the payment of the bonds, they had become indorsers by virtue of the completion of the contract in all other particulars. The agreement in question was one looking to the formation of the Central Casket & Supply Company. The parties were the California Mercantile Investment Company (party of the first part), Isaac Minor, Sr., Joseph Ancell, and D. K. Minor (parties, repectively, of the second, third, and fourth parts). To the new enterprise the party of the first part was to contribute all of the assets and good will of the Central Hardware & Supply Company of San Francisco, of which it owned all of the capital stock, and it was to subscribe for 60,000 shares of the capital stock of 300,000 shares of the par value of $1 per share. The other parties were to contribute all of the assets and good will of the D. K. Minor Company (a corporation) and to subscribe for and take in payment therefor 140,000 shares of the capital stock of the Central Casket & Supply Company. It was also agreed that immediately upon the formation of the new corporation, in addition to delivering 60,000 shares of its stock to the party of the first part, it would issue and deliver its promissory note for $25,000, payable one year after date, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, and 90 bonds for $500 each, bearing interest at 5 per cent. per annum. There were other features of the agreement relating to a cash payment by the Minors and Ancell and certain credits to the various parties to be given upon the books of the new corporation, but they need not be detailed here. The fourth paragraph of the fundamental agreement is as follows:

> "The parties of the second, third and fourth parts will jointly and severally indorse and guarantee the payment of the said promissory note and bonds of the proposed corporation so to be given to the party of the first part and will waive any and all right and claim upon the party of the first part or its assigns for contribution or liability of any kind to pay any part of the said promissory note or bonds otherwise than out of the assets of the said proposed corporation; and as security for the indorsement and guaranty by the parties of the second, third and fourth parts of the said promissory note and bonds and for the waiver of all claims on the party of the first part or its assigns to pay any part of the said promissory note or bonds otherwise than out of the assets of the proposed corporation the parties of the second, third and fourth parts shall deposit in escrow in the Central Trust Company of California all of the stock of the proposed corporation hereinafter subscribed for by them until the said promissory note and bonds are fully paid without right on the part of the parties of the second, third and fourth parts before then to sell, assign, transfer or hypothecate their said stock unless with the consent in writing of the said party of the first part or its assigns."

Under this agreement the new corporation was formed, and to it the assets and good will of D. K. Minor Company and the Central Hardware & Supply Company of San Francisco were assigned. The other provisions of the contract were, generally speaking, carried out, but the bonds (which were made payable, not to the "party of the first part," but to the Central Trust Company of California or bearer) were not indorsed by the defendants when the said bonds were delivered to the California Mercantile Investment Company, and they never have been so indorsed, although demand has been made by plaintiff that such indorsement be made.

The complaint contains the averment:

> "That on the 21st day of June, in the year 1905, the defendants in writing signed by them jointly and severally guaranteed the payment of all of the said bonds."

This is denied by the amended answer, and there are a number of separate defenses, some of which were evidently abandoned at the trial. One of these, however, is based upon an alleged want of consideration for the contract of June 21, 1905, for the indorsement of the bonds; another upon alleged waiver of performance by the California Mercantile Investment Company of that part of the fundamental agreement providing for the indorsement of the bonds; and it is also averred that about September 15, 1905, 140,000 shares of the capital stock of the Central Casket & Supply Company, which had been deposited with the Central Trust Company, together with an indorsed promissory note for $25,000, payable by the casket company to the California Mercantile Investment Company, were taken in full satisfaction by the last-named corporation of the contract of June 21, 1905, and that, relying upon such acceptance, the casket company paid the note, with interest. There is a further defense based upon an alleged sale by the Central Casket & Supply Company with the consent of the California Mercantile Investment Company of the former's good will and personal property to the Western Casket Company, whereby it is alleged the otherwise adequate security of the 140,000 shares of stock was rendered valuless. The last special defense is based upon an alleged conveyance in trust of certain real property by the Central Casket & Supply Company to the Central Trust Company of California, to secure the payment of the bonds here in suit. It is alleged that neither the plaintiff nor the investment company has ever resorted to this security.

[1] Appellant insists that the court erred in permitting the filing of this amended answer at the opening of the trial without permitting him to show that it was sham and false. We perceive no error in this. The discretion of the court to allow amendments is so broad that we would only disturb it upon a distinct showing of abuse of that discretion, and none appears here. Nor need we examine minutely all of the separate defenses, although some of them were sustained by the court, because in our opinion the court correctly interpreted the fundamental agreement as not constituting a guaranty of the bonds by the defendants and as not being in any manner available to the plaintiff, who was not a party thereto nor one having capacity to sue thereunder by reason of any assignment or transfer of any interest therein or otherwise.

[2, 3] An examination of the fourth paragraph of the fundamental agreement quoted above will disclose the fact that it is entirely executory and that it contemplates a future guaranty of the bonds in a certain manner; that is, by indorsement. Section 3109 of the Civil Code provides:

> "One who agrees to indorse a negotiable instrument is bound to write his signature upon the back of the instrument, if there is sufficient space thereon for that purpose."

It was unquestionably the intention of all of the parties to the fundamental agreement that the note and the bonds mentioned therein should be actually indorsed. The former was indorsed. The bonds, which were prepared by the secretary of the California Mercantile Investment Company, had a form of indorsement printed upon each of them. There was some evidence that, when the bonds were tendered for indorsement, Mr. Isaac Minor, Sr., in the presence of plaintiff, of Mr. Barnett, secretary of the investment company, and of others, including Mr. Ancell and Mr. D. K. Minor, flatly refused to indorse the bonds. The other defendants did not indorse them, and as late as November 4, 1907, plaintiff wrote to Mr. Isaac Minor, Sr., demanding that he do so. In that letter it is also suggested that there may be a cause of action for damages against defendants by the investment company. Obviously there could be no tenable action for damages if the existing contract was as good as a physical indorsement. All of these things indicate that the parties to the contract contemplated some future act to be done in a particular manner. It is plain that the contract is not a present guaranty, and therefore not corresponding to the one upon which plaintiff declares. Johnson v. Moss, 45 Cal. 517; McIver v. Richardson, 1 M. & S. 557; note to Lanusse v. Barker, 16 U. S. (3 Wheat.) 148, 4 L. Ed. 343; Stafford v. Low, 16 Johns. (N. Y.) 68; Stockbridge v. Schoonmaker, 45 Barb. (N. Y.) 105. Contracts of guaranty create no liability beyond what is expressed in the terms used as interpreted by the proper rules of construction. Baylies on Sureties, 146. Words in a contract of suretyship are not to be interpreted save in their ordinary popular sense. Hewlett v. Beede, 2 Cal. App. 565, 83 Pac. 1086; Barrett-Hicks Co. v. Glas, 9 Cal. App. 497, 99 Pac. 856. If defendants failed in any of their promises under the fundamental agreement, the remedy of the party of the first part to that contract was by a suit for specific performance or other appropriate action based upon the agreement itself or the breach thereof. If they had failed, for example, to pay the money mentioned in the fundamental agreement or to assign their interest in the D. K. Minor Company, such would have been the remedy. We do not see how a different rule applies to their failure, if any, to meet the requirement for the indorsement and guaranty of the bonds.

[4, 5] Not being a party to said contract nor interested in it by transfer, assignment, or otherwise, the plaintiff cannot maintain this action. The rule on this subject is expressed as follows in 7 Cyc. 542:

> "That the guaranty of a note or bill made in a separate instrument will pass by the transfer of the note or bill has been held in England, but American authorities have held to the contrary."

See Gamwell v. Pomeroy, 121 Mass. 215; Watson's Executors v. McLaren, 19 Wend. (N. Y.) 561; McLaren v. Watson's Executors, 26 Wend. (N. Y.) 430, 37 Am. Dec. 260.

In McLaren v. Watson's Ex'rs, supra, Chancellor Walworth said:

> "The testator in this case, by a separate and distinct instrument, which contained no words of negotiability, and was not indorsed or written upon the note, guaranteed the payment of a note at 60 days. * * * But, to make a guaranty negotiable as a part of the note to which it relates, it must be on the note itself, or at least it must be annexed to it: in the nature of an allonge or ekeing out of the paper upon which the note is written."

[6] The general rule is that an action against a guarantor must be brought specially upon the contract of guaranty itself. 20 Cyc. 1482.

It follows that the judgment of the lower court must be sustained upon the broad general grounds above discussed, and this makes it unnecessary to review the other defenses which were also recognized as sufficient by that tribunal. Nor need we consider matters of alleged error having reference to aspects of the case which we have not discussed. Bancroft v. Haslett, 106 Cal. 153, 39 Pac. 602; Dyer v. Brogan, 70 Cal. 139, 11 Pac. 589; Malone v. County of Del Norte, 77 Cal. 218, 19 Pac. 422; McCourtney v. Fortune, 57 Cal. 619.

The judgment and orders from which plaintiff has appealed are affirmed.

We concur: LORIGAN, J.; SLOSS, J.; ANGELLOTTI, J.

SHAW, J. I dissent. The agreement to "indorse and guarantee the payment of the said promissory note and bonds" became a present guaranty of payment as soon as the transaction was closed by the formation of the new corporation, the turning over by the mercantile company of all its business and property to said new corporation, and the issuance of the bonds of the new corporation to the mercantile company. The making of the agreement in this form was an offer to guarantee the bonds. The turning over of the property and the issuance of the bonds, as agreed, was an acceptance of the offer, and it put the guaranty in force at once as a binding contract. I do not think there is any disagreement in the authorities on this point, with respect to the agreement to guarantee. See Bishop v. Eaton, 161 Mass. 496, 37 N. E. 665, 42 Am. St. Rep. 437; Petty v. Gacking, 97 Ark. 217, 133 S. W. 832, 33 L. R. A. (N. S.) 175; James v. E. G. Lyons Co., 134 Cal. 191, 66 Pac. 210.

The last-cited case was so held because of the section of the Civil Code (3197) covering a promise to accept a bill of exchange, and it may not be authority directly to the point above stated. But it cites the common-law rule as the foundation of the section. It does not derive its force from the Code entirely, and the other cases cited refer to the other classes of cases similar to the case at bar.

It is not necessary to hold that the same effect follows with regard to the agreement to "indorse" the bonds. An indorsement, in the strict sense, is a technical transaction, doable only by writing the indorser's name on the back of the instrument, or on an allonge attached to it. There is some conflict of authority, even where the consideration has passed, over the question whether one can be sued in equity as an indorser if he has merely signed an agreement to indorse. But it is universally agreed that in such a case he is liable for the damages for the breach of contract, if he fails or refuses to make the indorsement.

I concur: HENSHAW, J.

PEOPLE v. MAMMILATO. (Cr. 1794.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 6, 1914.)

1. Homicide (§ 253*)—Sufficiency of Evidence—Premeditation.

On a trial for homicide, evidence held to warrant a jury finding that the killing was premeditated, and hence to support a conviction for murder in the first degree.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 523–532; Dec. Dig. § 253.*]

2. Homicide (§ 22*)—Degrees—Murder in the First Degree.

If accused, incensed and angered by vile epithets addressed to him by deceased, and smarting under repeated accusations against his honesty, left a saloon where deceased was, went to his room, and procured a dagger with the premeditated intent and purpose of assailing deceased, and returned to the vicinity of the saloon, waited until deceased came out, and without warning stabbed him to death, the killing was murder in the first degree.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 35–38; Dec. Dig. § 22.*]

3. Criminal Law (§ 1170½*)—Appeal—Harmless Error—Use of Interpreter.

Where an Italian on trial for homicide, as appeared from the record, had a very good command of English, readily understood the questions asked him, and had no difficulty in narrating all that occurred between himself and deceased, and his counsel apparently did not consider that he failed to understand questions or to give a direct and intelligent answer except in a couple of instances when he did not understand the meaning of a few words, and an interpreter was used, no prejudice from the court's ruling in refusing to permit him to give his testimony through an interpreter was apparent.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 3129–3135; Dec. Dig. § 1170½.*]

4. Homicide (§ 159*)—Evidence—Previous Quarrels between Parties.

On a trial for homicide, evidence that shortly before the killing, when deceased and accused were in a saloon and deceased was applying vile epithets to accused and charging him with theft, accused opened a pocketknife and rushed towards deceased was properly admitted as tending to show his state of mind towards deceased.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 297–300; Dec. Dig. § 159.*]

5. Witnesses (§ 277*)—Cross-Examination of Accused in Criminal Prosecutions.

Where, on a trial for homicide, accused undertook to testify to all that occurred in a saloon shortly before the homicide, and testified that, after an altercation between the parties in the barroom was quieted by third parties, he retired to the card room, and immediately left the saloon by the back door, the prosecution was properly permitted to cross-examine him as to whether he did not open a knife and make an effort to return to the barroom, though he had not mentioned this matter, since, while the cross-examination of accused must be confined to matters testified to in chief, he may be cross-examined as to details not brought out by his direct examination.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. §§ 925, 979–983; Dec. Dig. § 277.*]

6. Homicide (§ 203*) — Evidence — Dying Declarations — Sense of Impending Death.

Where, though, when deceased first made an alleged dying declaration, he stated that he thought he would pull through, he subsequently reaffirmed it as true at a time when he knew he was going to die, it was admissible in evidence.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; William S. Wells, Judge.

Fernando Mammilato was convicted of murder in the first degree, and he appeals. Affirmed.

George F. Cosby, Lawrence Sledge, and Geo. Ingraham, all of Oakland, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

LORIGAN, J. Defendant was convicted of murder of the first degree, sentenced to death, and, from the judgment and order denying him a new trial, appeals.

[1] Defendant was a laborer employed in and about Sunol, Alameda county, when this tragedy took place, and lived at a rooming and boarding house occupied by a Mrs. Andrews. The deceased, John Smith, was a storekeeper at Sunol. Some days prior to November 9, 1912, the day when the stabbing occurred which caused the death of deceased, the defendant came into the store of deceased while the latter was engaged in counting into piles a large amount of money, and, unobserved by deceased, took from one of the piles a $20 piece which he placed in his pocket and went out of the store. Shortly thereafter deceased missed the money, and about the same time that he did so defendant returned to the store. Deceased charged him with stealing the money and threatened him with arrest and prosecution if it was not immediately returned. Defendant repeatedly denied taking it, while deceased persisted in his accusations and threats. Defendant went out of the store but returned immediately and laid the $20 piece on the counter, saying that he had only taken it for fun or as a joke, and departed. Deceased and defendant next met on the evening of November 9, 1912, in the Hazel Glen saloon in Sunol. The deceased came in about 7:30 and was at the bar when defendant and a party with whom he had been playing cards in a back room came out to the bar for drinks. Defendant accosted the deceased, asking him to play a game of cards with him, which deceased emphatically declined to do, accompanying his declination with vile epithets directed to defendant, in the course of which he accused him of stealing $20 from him; charged him with being a thief; that he belonged in San Quentin, and that he intended to put him there. Defendant made no response in kind to the low epithets of deceased, though naturally becoming angered by them, but protested that the taking of the money by him was all in jest, and warned the deceased to look out about making such accusations against him. This altercation was quieted by other parties at the bar, and defendant immediately retired to the card room, where another game had started. He did not participate in it but seated himself near the players. He was angry and muttering to himself in Italian. He was seated but a few minutes when deceased, who had remained at the bar talking to the barkeeper, again referred to defendant and in a loud tone of voice and with a vile epithet declared that he would fix him. Defendant, immediately that this last remark of deceased was made, took out a pocketknife and, opening its large blade, made a rush for the barroom, but one of the players in the room, who had been watching him, caught him as he passed, took the knife from him, brought him back into the card room, and gave the knife to the barkeeper. Defendant remained in the card room but a few minutes and then left the saloon by the back way. The theory of the prosecution is that the defendant left the saloon at this time to secure a dagger, which he had in his room at the boarding house, for the purpose of killing the deceased. After leaving the saloon he was seen going rapidly in the direction of his rooming place at Mrs. Andrews. The evidence shows that in a washstand drawer in his room there the defendant had a dagger with a blade four or five inches long. This was seen in the drawer Friday night; the deceased was stabbed on Saturday night. Search was made for this dagger in the room of the defendant the Monday following, but it could not be found, and, in fact, has never been seen since. After the departure of the defendant from the saloon, of which it does not appear deceased had any knowledge, the latter remained about 20 minutes and left. Within a very short interval afterwards he was brought into a barber shop adjoining the saloon, having been stabbed with a weapon in the hand of defendant.

There were no witnesses as to what took place between the defendant and deceased when they met outside the saloon and the latter received his death wound. The meeting occurred on the street in the vicinity of the Southern Pacific Railroad depot. A witness, approaching in the direction where defendant and deceased met, testified that he could see indistinctly through the darkness—the night was dark and drizzly—two men together as though they were fighting, and immediately one turned and ran away, passing by the witness, who then recognized him as the defendant. He could not recognize who they were when they met each other. In fact, as to what then actually occurred there is but the testimony of the defendant and the dying declaration of the deceased. In his dying declaration the deceased stated that the defendant stabbed him near the Southern Pacific depot about 20 minutes to 8 o'clock without a word, except "Hello, Smith"; that he then stabbed him and ran away. The testimony of the defendant is that, after leaving the Hazel Glen saloon, he had gone to the saloon of a countryman of his to see a friend, and, not finding him, was on his way back to the Hazel Glen saloon when he met deceased, who had just come out of it; that, when they met, deceased immediately commenced to again revile him with low epithets and struck him twice in the face; that defendant started to run away, but deceased pursued him along the street; that, at the time deceased struck him in the face, in putting up his hand to protect himself he felt a knife in the inside pocket of his coat, and as he ran he drew it out; that deceased overtook him and again struck him in the face; that he warned deceased that he had a knife, but nevertheless deceased rushed upon him and grabbed him by the neck with both hands; that, as deceased rushed in on him, the defendant held the knife in front of him to defend himself, and deceased rushed upon it and was wounded; that he did not force the knife into him but only held it out in defense; that deceased then released his hold on him, and defendant ran away, leaving deceased standing there; that he ran away because he believed that deceased intended to shoot him as he had placed his hand in his hind pocket, at the same time declaring that he would kill defendant. Defendant walked that night to Niles, a town some distance from Sunol, and was arrested the next morning. He testified that as he ran away he put the knife in his pocket again but had lost it while running. The morning of his arrest he told the officers practically the same story as he testified to on the trial. When arrested he complained that his face was sore and swollen from the blows inflicted by deceased upon it, but witnesses who examined his face at the time he made the statements observed no swelling or any abrasion or discoloration upon it.

The weapon with which deceased was wounded was the dagger that was usually kept in the room of the defendant. It belonged to Mrs. Andrews, although defendant kept it in his room. He testified that he had put it in his pocket—sheathed in its wooden case—the morning of the day of the stabbing to use it in gathering mushrooms, but was prevented from going out for that purpose and had forgotten to put it back in his room; that he had forgotten that he had it at all times thereafter, even while in the Hazel Glen saloon, until, when putting up his hands to protect himself from the blows of deceased, he had felt it in his inner coat pocket and drew it out. The deceased lived about four hours after being wounded. The autopsy showed that the dagger penetrated the body of deceased the full length of the blade; that the seventh rib was cut nearly three-fourths through, and the weapon penetrated into the heart of deceased some two inches. Neither the deceased nor the defendant were intoxicated that evening.

[2] Appellant makes the point that the evidence was insufficient to sustain the verdict against him. His counsel make this claim without any discussion of it at all, simply submitting "all the testimony taken on the trial" for the consideration of the court. Discussing this point as briefly as appellant presents it, it is only necessary to say that under the evidence, the salient portions of which we have stated, the jury was warranted in determining that, incensed and angered by the vile epithets addressed to him by the deceased, and smarting under the repeated accusations against his honesty, the defendant left the saloon, went to his room, and procured the dagger with which the killing was done with the premeditated intent and purpose of assailing the deceased; that, having procured it, he returned to the vicinity of the saloon, waited until deceased came out of it, and without warning stabbed him to death. A homicide committed under such circumstances and with such intent constitutes murder of the first degree, and, as the evidence here was sufficient to support such a verdict, we cannot disturb it.

[3] It is next insisted that the court erred in not permitting the defendant to give his testimony through an interpreter. The defendant is an Italian, and at the time of the trial was about 25 years of age. He had lived in Canada and the United States about six years. The court was of the opinion that the defendant understood English sufficiently well to testify without an interpreter, although one was sworn and instructed to follow the defendant, and, if it appeared he did not fully understand the questions asked, to aid him. The testimony of the defendant appearing in the record covering a long direct and cross examination does not disclose that any error was committed by the court in denying him an interpreter. He had a very good command of English, and the record does not disclose that he did not readily understand the questions asked him or had any difficulty in narrating all that occurred between himself and deceased according to his account of it. From the beginning to the end of his narrative his counsel, according to the record before us, do not seem to have considered that at any point in it he so failed to understand questions asked or to give a direct and intelligent answer to them that the use of an interpreter was required, save in a couple of instances when he did not understand the meaning of a few words, and then the interpreter was used. From an examination of the record and of his testimony as given by question and answer, we do not perceive that any prejudice at all followed from refusing the defendant the aid of an interpreter.

[4, 5] It is next insisted that the court erred in allowing the prosecution to cross-examine the defendant on the subject of his opening his pocketknife in the card room and rushing towards the barroom where decedent was, which we have referred to in our statement of the evidence. This matter had been detailed by a witness for the prosecution without any objections on the part of the defendant, and properly so, as tending to show the state of mind of the defendant towards deceased growing out of his revilement of defendant. It is not now insisted that such evidence would not be relevant, but it is claimed that, as on his direct examination nothing was testified to by defendant as to his actions when he returned from the bar to the card room, it was improper to permit the prosecution on cross-examination to go into that matter. While the rule is that the cross-examination of a defendant must be confined to matters testified to in chief, this does not mean that such examination must be confined to a mere categorical review of matters testified to by him on direct examination. In his testimony in chief, defendant undertook to testify to all that occurred in the saloon from the time he and deceased met there until defendant left, the conduct and actions of the deceased and his own conduct and actions there, and testified that he left the barroom when the revilement of him by deceased had ceased and went into the card room and from there immediately left the saloon by the back door, when he heard the deceased in a loud voice declare to the barkeeper that he intended to fix him; that he then left because he was afraid of deceased. The defendant, having undertaken to testify to all that occurred in the saloon from his meeting with deceased there until his departure therefrom, could not preclude the prosecution on cross-examination from inquiring as to matters pertinent to the case which it claimed defendant had omitted to testify to while assuming to state all that occurred between these two intervals of time. It could cross-examine him for the purpose of bringing out in detail anything bearing on the case that occurred during that period as to the conduct and actions of defendant, respecting which he had testified about only in a general way, and to that end direct his attention to a precise matter and inquire whether it did not occur. People v. Russell, 46 Cal. 121. In this view it was proper for the prosecution to make inquiry of defendant whether, as part of what transpired in the card room, he had not then taken out a knife and made an effort to return to the barroom where deceased was.

[6] It is next insisted that the court erred in admitting in evidence the dying declaration of deceased. The claim is that it was not made by deceased under a sense of impending death. The deceased, after he was stabbed, was taken first to a barber shop in the vicinity and from thence to his residence. E. E. Ritter, a local attorney and notary public, was sent for and arrived at the residence of deceased about 10 o'clock, and being informed by the attending physician that the deceased wanted to make a statement Ritter asked him if he wished to do so. Deceased said he did. Ritter said to him:

> "Now, if you make a statement it is necessary for you to realize that you are going to die; it is important that you realize for certain that you are going to die to make this."

Then deceased answered as to his dying:

> "Well, I don't know; I think I will pull through; I want to state how this thing happened."

He then made a statement which Ritter reduced to writing, read over to him, and which the deceased signed. This statement was:

> "I realize that I am about to die, and wish to make a statement. Fred stabbed me near Southern Pacific depot about 20 minutes of 8 o'clock p. m., without a word, except 'Hello, Smith,' and then stabbed me, and then ran away from me. I had an argument with him over the stealing of $20 on election day. He gave the $20 back after I had a row with him, 15 or 20 minutes after, and said he was only fooling. Frank Mendonca seen me have the argument with him. [Signed] John Smith.
> "Subscribed and sworn to before me this 9th day of November, 1912. Edward M. Ritter, Notary Public in and for the County of Alameda, State of California."

Ritter then left the residence of deceased to go to his office to prepare a deed which deceased desired to execute. He retained the written statement made by deceased. He returned in about an hour—in fact was sent for and informed that the deceased was dying.

He testified that when he reached deceased he asked:

> "'Now, John, do you realize that you are going to die?' And he says, 'Yes,' he says, 'I know I haven't got a chance.' The Court: He says what? A. He says, 'I know I haven't got a chance.' Well, I says, 'Do you want to acknowledge this statement now as your dying statement that you made a while ago?' And I read it over to him, I read this statement that I had written out, and he had signed; I read it over to him, and he said, 'Yes, I acknowledge that as my dying statement.' I marked the time here as 11:10. I think he died at 12:05."

While the Christian name of defendant is Fernando, the evidence shows that he was known about Sunol as Fred. In fact, there is no question but that the person referred to in the statement of deceased as Fred was the defendant.

While it appears that the statement received by the court as his dying declaration, when originally made by deceased, was not made under a sense of impending dissolution, his subsequent ratification of it at a time when it appeared that hope of living was gone was sufficient to entitle it to admission by the court. It was not necessary, at the time when deceased was conscious that he could not live, that he should make another statement independent of the one already made. If, while in the possession of his reasoning faculties and under a sense of impending death, a declarant reaffirms as true a statement of facts previously made and produced and reread to him, as the evidence shows was the case here, that is sufficient to entitle it to be admitted in evidence as a dying declaration. People v. Crews, 102 Cal. 174, 36 Pac. 367.

We have considered and disposed of all points presented on this appeal for a reversal, and, as all of them are untenable, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

We concur: MELVIN, J.; HENSHAW, J.; SLOSS, J.; SHAW, J.; ANGELLOTTI, J.

STRAIN et al. v. SUPERIOR COURT OF LOS ANGELES COUNTY. (L. A. 3514.)

1. RECEIVERS (§ 73*)—APPOINTMENT—PROTECTION—DUTY OF COURT.

A court appointing a receiver is bound to protect him in the discharge of his duties and in the control of the property against any one interfering therewith, whether a party to the proceeding in which the receivership is created or not; the court's jurisdiction not being affected by the fact that the act of interference was committed outside the territorial jurisdiction of the court, if the alleged offenders are within such jurisdiction.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Receivers, Cent. Dig. § 131; Dec. Dig. § 73.*]

2. CONTEMPT (§ 54*)—COURTS—JURISDICTION—AFFIDAVIT.

An affidavit, which is made the basis of a contempt proceeding, must show facts constituting a contempt, or the court acquires no jurisdiction to proceed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contempt, Cent. Dig. §§ 143–149; Dec. Dig. § 54.*]

3. RECEIVERS (§ 74*)—POSSESSION OF PROPERTY — INTERFERENCE — CONTEMPT — AFFIDAVIT—OWNERSHIP.

Where an affidavit for contempt alleged that affiant, as receiver in a certain corporation, was in possession of and used certain irrigation canals and the water therein, a portion of which were located in Mexico, by which property in I. county, Cal., was irrigated, and that petitioners had interfered with such canals by diverting water therefrom in Mexico, the affidavit was not fatally defective because it did not allege that the corporation was the owner of the canals or that the particular canal in Mexico, from which the water was diverted, was owned or under the control or possession of the receiver.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Receivers, Cent. Dig. §§ 132–135; Dec. Dig. § 74.*]

4. RECEIVERS (§ 74*)—OWNERSHIP OF PROPERTY — INTERFERENCE — CONTEMPT — AFFIDAVIT.

Where an affidavit for contempt alleged unlawful interference by petitioners with water in a system of irrigation canals in affiant's possession, as receiver of a corporation, by withdrawing water from one of the canals in Mexico, and that all the water flowing through the various Mexican canals, including the one from which water was diverted, was water diverted under an appropriation from the Colorado river by the corporation and was conducted through its canals in California to the international boundary, there turned into connecting canals in Mexico, whence it flowed back into California, such allegation did not warrant an inference that the water was abandoned as soon as it passed into the Mexican canals, and hence the affidavit was not objectionable for failure to allege that the receiver was ever in possession or control of the "water" so diverted in Mexico.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Receivers, Cent. Dig. §§ 132–135; Dec. Dig. § 74.*]

5. CONTEMPT (§ 67*)—EVIDENCE—REVIEW—CERTIORARI.

On a writ of certiorari to review a judgment punishing petitioners for contempt, the Supreme Court cannot review the evidence in so far as it affects or applies to the merits, but only to ascertain whether there was proof of jurisdictional facts, without which the court had no power to punish for contempt.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contempt, Cent. Dig. §§ 221, 222; Dec. Dig. § 67.*]

6. RECEIVERS (§ 74*)—POSSESSION OF PROPERTY—INTERFERENCE.

Where, in a proceeding for contempt for interfering with a California receiver's possession of a system of irrigation canals and the water contained therein, including a portion of the works located in Mexico, there was evidence that the receiver was in actual control and possession of the entire system, and particularly the canal in Mexico, from which petitioners diverted water, and that petitioners knew of such control and possession when they diverted the water, the evidence was sufficient to confer jurisdiction of the proceeding, though there was other evidence that so much of the works as were located in Mexico were under the control of another receiver appointed by the Mexican courts.

7. RECEIVERS (§ 74*)—PROCEEDINGS—ISSUES—TITLE TO PROPERTY—CONTEMPT.

The rule that title or right to property cannot be tried in a contempt proceeding against one for interfering with the possession of a receiver only means that the court in such proceeding cannot take property from the possession of a stranger to the action in which the receiver has been appointed, who claims title to it or right to its possession, and does not prevent the court from passing on an issue as to whether the receiver is in actual possession of the property interfered with, so as to charge the parties proceeded against with contempt.

In Bank. Petition by Frank Strain and others for a writ of certiorari to review an order of the superior court of Los Angeles county adjudging petitioners in contempt. The District Court of Appeal having sustained the writ and annulled the judgment, the petition was removed to the Supreme Court for further consideration. Writ dismissed.

Campbell & Moore, of Los Angeles, for petitioners. W. B. Mathews and S. B. Robinson, both of Los Angeles, for respondent. O'Melveny, Stevens & Millikin, and Walter K. Tuller, all of Los Angeles, amici curiæ.

LORIGAN, J. This proceeding in certiorari was inaugurated in the District Court of Appeal to review an order of the superior court of Los Angeles county adjudging the petitioners guilty of contempt. The proceeding in the superior court against the petitioners for contempt was initiated by the filing of an affidavit in said court by W. H. Holabrid, as receiver of the California Development Company, charging petitioners with interfering with him in the discharge of his duties with respect to the property of said company in his charge and possession as receiver.

The facts stated in the affidavit of said receiver are as follows:

The California Development Company is a corporation duly organized under the laws of New Jersey and authorized by its corporate charter to "acquire, hold, construct and maintain headings, dams, ditches, canals, reservoirs and other structures and appliances for carrying, conserving and conducting water and irrigating land, and supply and distribute water to and irrigate and cultivate the lands of the company and of others, and sell or let such water or the right to use the same."

On December 13, 1909, and long prior thereto, said company was the owner in charge and possession of a system of waterworks situated in Imperial county, this state, and consisting of headgates, canals, ditches, and structures and property used in diverting water from the Colorado river and distributing and supplying it to consumers and users of water in said Imperial county for the purposes of irrigation, domestic use, and generating electricity, and was using and operating said works, structures, and property for diverting and distributing water as aforesaid. On said December 13, 1909, in an action pending in the superior court of Imperial county (subsequently transferred to Los Angeles county), entitled Title Insurance Company, Plaintiff, v. California Development Company et al., Defendants, an order was duly made by said court whereby W. H. Holabird, the affiant, was appointed receiver of the said property of the California Development Company, and has ever since been and now is such receiver in charge and possession of the said property, using and operating the same for the purpose of diverting water from said Colorado river and delivering and distributing the same to consumers in said county of Imperial. The water so diverted by said company and its receiver from the Colorado river is conveyed through a canal from a point of diversion in Imperial county to a point on the international boundary line between the United States of America and the republic of Mexico; thence for a distance approximately of 60 miles through the said republic of Mexico by means of a channel or canal, part natural and part artificially constructed, known as the Alamo canal, and from said Alamo canal by means of a connecting canal to various points of use of water in said republic of Mexico, and still by another canal connecting with said Alamo canal to various points on said international boundary line, where, at different points thereon, it is delivered to customers in said Imperial county. The aforesaid canals, as far as the same lie within the county of Imperial, are part of the above-described property of the California Development Company. Among said canals connecting with the Alamo canal in Mexico and diverting water therefrom is one known as the East Side Main canal, extending northerly from the Alamo canal to said international boundary line and known as the Holt canal, which connects with the said East Side canal at a point known as Holt heading in the republic of Mexico, and through which water is diverted at said heading and conducted across said international boundary line to various points in said Imperial county and delivered and supplied by said receiver to customers. The affidavit then states: That certain persons named (the petitioners in this case) in the year 1912 caused a gate to be constructed in said Holt canal near said Holt heading within the republic of Mexico, connected a canal therewith, and by means thereof diverted large quantities of water from said Holt canal across said boundary line into Imperial county for use on lands therein owned by them. That said parties knew, prior to the diversion by them of said water from said Holt canal, that said receiver was in the control and possession of the said property of said California Development Company, and was then and there using and operating the same. That all of the water flowing in said Holt canal was diverted from said Colorado river by means of headgates and works of the said California Development Company and would, if it had not been so diverted as aforesaid, flow through said Holt canal to said international boundary line and into Imperial county and be distributed and sold by said receiver for use therein.

On the filing of this affidavit petitioners were cited to show cause why they should not be adjudged guilty of contempt, and on a hearing were adjudged guilty thereof in having interfered with said receiver in the use and operation of said property of said California Development Company in his charge and possession as receiver, and as a punishment were each fined $50. Thereafter petitioners inaugurated this proceeding in certiorari before the said District Court of Appeal, in which they attack the validity of the order or judgment of contempt on the ground that it is in excess of the jurisdiction of said superior court in the particulars following: First, that the affidavit upon which the proceeding in contempt is based is insufficient in that it fails to allege facts showing a contempt; and, second, that, conceding the sufficiency of the affidavit, the evidence nevertheless shows that the court had no jurisdiction in the contempt proceeding for two reasons: (1) Because it related to property beyond the territorial jurisdiction of the court and not under the control or in the possession of the receiver; and (2) that it involved the question of the title of property which the court had no jurisdiction to determine in a contempt proceeding. The District Court of Appeal sustained these claims of petitioners and annulled the judgment of contempt. Thereafter, on petition therefor, the matter was ordered before this court for further consideration.

It appears that the petitioners, though not parties to the action wherein Holabird had been appointed receiver, were nevertheless residents within the territorial jurisdiction of the court when the alleged interference with the Holt canal took place, and were such when this proceeding in contempt was commenced against them.

[1] It is the duty of a court appointing a receiver to protect him in the discharge of his duties and in the control and possession of the property in his custody, as such against any one interfering therewith, whether a party to the proceeding in which the receivership is created or not, and the jurisdiction of the court to do this is not affected by the fact that the act of interference was committed, as in this case, outside the territorial jurisdiction of the court, if the alleged offenders are within its territorial jurisdiction. High on Receivers (4th Ed.) § 164; Smith on Receivers, § 47; Chafee v. Quidnick Co., 13 R. I. 442; Richards v. People, 81 Ill. 551; Sercomb v. Catlin, 128 Ill. 556, 21 N. E. 606, 15 Am. St. Rep. 147.

No question is made here but that the court had jurisdiction over the persons of petitioners in this proceeding, and, if the act charged to have been committed by them constituted an interference with the duties of the receiver respecting the property in his control and possession as such, then, under the authorities just cited, they were subject to punishment by the superior court, and its action in that respect was justified.

[2] As to the claim that the statement of facts in the affidavit was insufficient to confer jurisdiction: It is settled that an affidavit which is made the basis of a contempt proceeding must show facts constituting a contempt or the court acquires no jurisdiction to proceed in the matter. Hutton v. Superior Court, 147 Cal. 156, 81 Pac. 409.

[3] Against the sufficiency of the affidavit it is asserted that it is nowhere alleged therein that the California Development Company was the owner of any of the canals referred to in the affidavit as located in the republic of Mexico or of the waters flowing therein, nor, particularly as to the Holt canal from which water is alleged to have been diverted by petitioners where the same lies in said republic, it is alleged that the same or the waters therein were ever owned by said company, or were ever in the possession or under the control of the receiver thereof.

It is true that the affidavit does not show who owned the canals in Mexico, including the Holt canal. It is entirely silent on this subject. But it was not essential to the sufficiency of the affidavit that a statement of this fact should be made. It does appear, taking all the allegations of the affidavit into consideration, that the receiver was operating as such an established system of the California Development Company, whereby, through works owned by said company in Imperial county, water diverted from the Colorado river under an appropriation thereof was conveyed by a canal through said county to the international boundary line between the United States and Mexico and discharged into canals connecting therewith in the latter territory; that through these connecting Mexican canals it was thence brought 60 miles and discharged at the international boundary line into still further connecting canals and conduits of said California Development Company in said Imperial county controlled by the receiver and by means thereof distributed to customers and users. It shows one continuous diverting and distributing system, as an integral part of which said canals in Mexico were used for the purpose of delivering the water from the intake in the Colorado river to the points of delivery in Imperial county, and were being actually used by the receiver for that purpose when interfered with by petitioners. This actual use as part of such system was all that was required to be alleged respecting these canals. It was immaterial, as far as the sufficiency of the affidavit is concerned, whether they were or were not owned by the California Development Company or whether there was any allegation therein on that subject. It was sufficient to show, as the tenor of the affidavit does, that they were being used by it and its receiver for the purpose of conveying a continuous flow of water therein from the intake of the company on the Colorado river to the point for distribution in Imperial county, and that they and the water therein were in the control and possession of the receiver when the alleged act of interference by petitioners was committed.

[4] This brings us to a consideration of the next point made by petitioners, which is that it is not alleged in the affidavit that the specific water which petitioners are charged with having diverted from the Holt canal—nor in fact the water in any of the Mexican canals—was owned by the California Development Company, or was ever under the control or in the possession of its receiver. It appears from the affidavit that all the water which flows through these various Mexican canals, including the Holt canal, consisted of water diverted under an appropriation from the Colorado river in the state of California by the California Development Company, was conducted by it through its canals in that state to the international boundary line and there turned into the connecting canals in Mexico for beneficial use on irrigable lands. When so appropriated through actual diversion into its canal by the company for such intended beneficial use it became at once its property, and control and possession of it was in its receiver. When he started it flowing from the canal of the company into the Mexican canals located in this foreign country, he did not thereby relinquish control or abandon possession of it, as appears to be claimed by petitioners. This of itself did not constitute abandonment either in law or fact. Abandonment is a question of intent—a question of fact to be determined from the act and intention of the party claimed to have abandoned a thing. But it is apparent, from the allegations of the affidavit here, that there never was any intention on the part of the receiver to abandon the water so appropriated by the company when he turned it into the Mexican canals. As part of an entire system operated by that company, these canals in Mexico were being used by it in connection with canals in California for the purpose of conveying the water appropriated by the company from its intake on the Colorado river in a continuous flow to the points in Imperial county where its distribution would be made and controlled. This, from the recitals in the affidavit, was obviously what the canal system in its entirety was constructed for, devoted to, and being used for. As it is alleged in the affidavit that the company was using the canals in Mexico in connection with its own, it is to be assumed that it was rightly using them in conducting the water which it had appropriated and owned to its destined point of distribution, and the facts alleged in the affidavit sufficiently show that, at the time of the alleged interference of petitioners, the receiver of the company was in the control and possession of the water in the Mexican canals, which, as receiver, he had diverted from the river and started on its flow, and which was the only water flowing through all the canals as comprehending an entire system of water distribution.

[5] As to the next point made by petitioners which is based on the evidence adduced at the hearing had in this proceeding: This is, that, even if the affidavit was sufficient, nevertheless the evidence at such hearing shows that the court had no jurisdiction to adjudge petitioners guilty of contempt. Under this claim, of course, the evidence cannot be reviewed by us in this proceeding on certiorari, in as far as it affects or applies to the merits of the case. It can be considered only for the purpose of ascertaining whether there was proof of the jurisdictional facts alleged in the affidavit, and without proof of which the court would have no power to punish for contempt. Stumpf v. Board of Supervisors, 131 Cal. 364, 63 Pac. 663, 82 Am. St. Rep. 350; 4 Ency. of Plead. & Prac. p. 262.

[6] It appears from the evidence without question that petitioners, who were residents and property owners in Imperial county and whose lands were not being supplied with water under the system of the California Development Company, constructed a ditch through their said lands and extended it some 600 feet across the boundary line into the republic of Mexico so as to be able to connect it with the Holt canal in said republic, part of the continuous system used by the California Development Company heretofore referred to; that they applied to Holabird, the receiver of the California Development Company, to furnish water from the Holt canal to this canal constructed by them, offering payment therefor, but that the receiver refused to furnish the water. Petitioners insist that the evidence further shows beyond any question that one Andrade had, in an action brought by a creditor in the courts of Mexico against a Mexican corporation which owned the canals in Mexico, been appointed, by said Mexican court, receiver of the property of the Mexican corporation and was, at the time petitioners connected their canal with the Holt canal and diverted its waters, in exclusive control and possession of all the canals in Mexico, including said Holt canal, and that Holabird never had control or possession of any of said canals; that the appointment of said Andrade as such receiver of the property of the Mexican corporation had been made a month prior to the appointment of Holabird as receiver of the California Development Company's property; that petitioners, upon the refusal of Holabird to allow them to take water from the Holt canal, as requested, applied to the Mexican receiver Andrade, in possession thereof, for permission to do so; that he granted them permission, and thereupon they connected their canal with said Holt canal. Of course, if the evidence showed, as petitioners claim, that these canals and water were, at the time of the alleged interference, not in the possession of the receiver Holabird but in the control and possession of the Mexican receiver, there could have been no interference with the possession of Holabird, and the superior court was without jurisdiction to punish the petitioners for contempt. But it is not a fact that the evidence shows this to have been the situation. There was, it is true, evidence of acts and conduct on the part of Andrade designed to annoy and hamper Holabird in the control which, after his appointment, he was constantly exercising over the Mexican canals and works as part of the water supply system of the California Development Company. But there was sufficient evidence to warrant the superior court in concluding, as it necessarily did, that, notwithstanding this conduct of Andrade, Holabird, as receiver, himself and through his agents and employés, was in the actual control and possession of the entire system of the California Development Company, including the Mexican canals, and particularly the Holt canal, and that petitioners had knowledge of that fact when they interfered with his control and possession as receiver of the latter canal. This is as far as we may look into the evidence on this proceeding. We have considered it, as alone we may do, solely for the purpose of ascertaining whether there was in fact evidence before the superior court tending to show possession of the property by its receiver for the purpose of determining whether that court had jurisdiction of the proceeding against petitioners for alleged contempt in interfering with it. As we say, there was such evidence. Whether the superior court was right in its conclusion from it cannot be considered in this proceeding, which, as we say, is limited solely to an inquiry whether the superior court had or had not jurisdiction of the contempt proceeding.

[7] There was further evidence in the case that the canals in Mexico were owned by a Mexican corporation over whose property Andrade had been appointed receiver, and that certain contracts between that corporation and the California Development Company were introduced in evidence by petitioners, from the terms of which it appeared that the two corporations had agreed that the use of water diverted by the California Development Company from the Colorado river and turned into the Mexican canals should be divided between the two corporations, a portion to be used in Mexico and a portion in Imperial county; that under these contracts the Mexican receiver claimed the right to control the property in Mexico, and under such asserted claim gave permission to petitioners to take waters from the Holt canal. Under this showing petitioners assert that the right to the control of the Mexican property as between the two receivers, Andrade and Holabird, under their respective appointments, and the right of petitioners claiming under the Mexican receiver, could only be determined by an interpretation of these contracts in a proper action brought for that purpose, where petitioners claiming under the Mexican receiver would be entitled to be heard, and that proceedings for contempt do not constitute such an appropriate action.

In this contention petitioners seek to invoke the well-settled rule that title or the right to property cannot be tried in a contempt proceeding. But what is thus meant is that a court in such a proceeding cannot by its order take property from the actual possession of a stranger to the action in which the receiver is appointed who claims title to it or right to its possession. Such an order would be void because one in possession of property cannot be dispossessed of it without due process of law which means an appropriate action brought against him where, upon issues framed and a regular trial before a court or jury, his title or right to retain possession may be determined, and a proceeding in contempt is not such an action. But this is not the situation here. There was no question of title or right to possession involved in the contempt proceeding, and petitioners could not force that question into the proceeding as a basis for attacking the jurisdiction of the court to entertain it. The sole question before the court in this proceeding was one of actual possession. Was the receiver in the actual possession of the canal and water in Mexico when petitioners interfered with it? If he was, then such interference, without leave of the court appointing him, was contempt. If there was a question between petitioners and the receiver Holabird as to the possession of said property, the courts were open to the petitioners, and therein they could have had any dispute between them on that subject settled. In a dispute like the present, it was the duty of petitioners, asserting that Holabird had no right under his order of appointment to take possession of the canals and water in Mexico, and that such possession belonged to the Mexican receiver under whom they claimed, to have petitioned the court, in the action in which Holabird was appointed, to pass upon the question of how far, if at all, Holabird was authorized to take possession of such canals and water under its appointment of him as receiver. This the court would undoubtedly have done if they had applied to it. They could not, however, invade or interfere with the actual possession of the receiver without subjecting themselves to a proceeding for contempt and punishment therefor, if it was proven that they did.

We are satisfied that there is no merit in any claim of petitioners under which they assert that the superior court exceeded its jurisdiction in entertaining the contempt proceeding against them and rendering the judgment now sought to be reviewed. It did not. It proceeded within its jurisdictional limits, and the petition for the writ of certiorari is therefore dismissed.

JOYCE v. TOMASINI. (Sac. 2079.)

1. Specific Performance (§ 114*)—Actions—Complaint.

Under Civ. Code, § 3391, which declares that specific performance of an executory contract cannot be enforced against a party if he has not received an adequate consideration, or, if it is not, as to him, just and reasonable, a complaint seeking specific performance of a contract must set forth facts showing that the consideration is adequate and just and reasonable to the defendant, and the bare allegation that the contract is supported by good consideration and is just and reasonable is insufficient.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. §§ 356–370, 372; Dec. Dig. § 114.*]

2. Specific Performance (§ 29*)—Contracts—Sufficiency.

A contract for the lease of 105 acres of tule land, not stating the county or state, or otherwise bounding it so as to definitely locate it, may be specifically enforced where extrinsic evidence showed that the lessor owned a tract of tule land, consisting of 105 acres, in a certain county and that the tract was bounded by the lands of the persons named in the agreement, for it will not be inferred that the lessor owned a similar tract of land in that county or in other counties.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. §§ 69–82; Dec. Dig. § 29.*]

3. Specific Performance (§ 29*)—Contracts—Sufficiency.

Specific performance of a contract to lease land, which also contained an option allowing the lessee to purchase, will not be denied because the contract, instead of describing the land, recited that it was bounded by certain individuals; the recitals obviously meaning that it was bounded by the land of the named persons.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. §§ 69–82; Dec. Dig. § 29.*]

4. Landlord and Tenant (§ 124*)—Lease—Property Covered—Appurtenances.

Where there was a way rightfully in use for ingress and egress to land contracted to be leased, such a way is appurtenant to the land and will pass without special description.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Landlord and Tenant, Cent. Dig. §§ 437–440; Dec. Dig. § 124.*]

5. Specific Performance (§ 114*)—Actions—Pleading.

In a suit for specific performance of contract for the lease of land with an option to purchase, where the agreement did not definitely describe a way to the land, plaintiff, in order to have the way described in a lease executed by the court, must lay the foundation therefor by alleging and proving extrinsic facts showing the location and description of the way.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. §§ 356–370, 372; Dec. Dig. § 114.*]

6. Evidence (§ 460*)—Extrinsic Evidence—Admissibility.

In a suit for the specific performance of a contract for the sale of land, extrinsic evidence is admissible to identify and apply the description.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 2115–2128; Dec. Dig. § 460.*]

7. Specific Performance (§ 28*)—Agreements—Definiteness.

An agreement for the leasing of land, which recited that defendant agreed to lease to plaintiff certain land for a term of three years, commencing January, 1912, at a rental of $200 per year, to be paid in advance before taking possession, is sufficiently definite, as to the term and time of payment of rent, to be specifically enforced.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. §§ 61–68; Dec. Dig. § 28.*]

8. Specific Performance (§ 28*) — Agreement—Sufficiency.

Under Civ. Code, § 1731, declaring that an agreement to sell real property binds the seller to execute the conveyance, an option for the purchase of land agreed to be leased is sufficiently definite to be specifically enforced, though it does not expressly provide when the conveyance is to be made; the grantor being bound to execute the conveyance upon the payment of the purchase money, which payments were provided for in the agreement.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. §§ 61–68; Dec. Dig. § 28.*]

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Solano County; A. J. Buckles, Judge.

Action by Thomas Joyce against G. Tomasini. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

T. T. C. Gregory and C. J. Goodell, both of San Francisco, for appellant. Lewis A. Hilborn and Robert R. Moody, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The judgment was entered on June 6, 1912. The appeal therefrom was taken on June 21, 1912. The record includes a bill of exceptions setting forth the evidence and proceedings taken at the trial.

The complaint purports to state a cause of action to enforce specific performance of a contract to execute a lease. The findings are in favor of the plaintiff on all the issues. Judgment was rendered that the agreement be specifically enforced and that the defendant, on or before June 21, 1912, upon the payment to him by the plaintiff of $200 as rent, should, in compliance with the agreement, execute a formal lease of the premises, in form as set forth in the judgment, and substantially the same in terms as that provided for in the agreement sued on. It also declared that, upon the receipt of the $200, the defendant should deliver to the plaintiff the possession of the premises.

[1] The defendant demurred to the complaint upon the ground that it does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The demurrer was overruled, and this is assigned as error. We think the demurrer should have been sustained. The contract is sued on as an executory agreement to execute a lease, in substance an agreement to grant an estate for years in the parcel of land. The object of the action is to enforce specific performance of this executory agreement. The Civil Code, following the settled doctrine of equity jurisprudence, declares that specific performance of an executory contract cannot be enforced against a party, if he has not received an adequate consideration therefor, or if it is not, as to him, just and reasonable. Section 3391. It is well established as a rule of pleading in such cases that the plaintiff, in order to allege a good cause of action, must set forth facts which show that the consideration provided for in the contract sought to be enforced is adequate, and that the contract is just and reasonable to the defendant. A complaint which fails to state such facts does not state a cause of action to enforce such contract.

> "This does not mean that it must be alleged in haec verba that the contract was supported by an adequate consideration, and is, as to the defendant, fair and just. These might be held insufficient. but the fact that the contract is such as will satisfy the conscience of the chancellor in the respects mentioned must appear from a proper statement of facts." Stiles v. Cain, 134 Cal. 172, 66 Pac. 231.

See, also, Wait v. Kern etc., Co., 157 Cal. 25, 106 Pac. 98; Sunrise Land Co. v. Root, 160 Cal. 97, 116 Pac. 72; Herzog v. Atchison, etc., Co., 153 Cal. 496, 95 Pac. 898, 17 L. R. A. (N. S.) 428; Kaiser v. Barron, 153 Cal. 790, 96 Pac. 806; White v. Sage, 149 Cal. 616, 87 Pac. 193; Flood v. Templeton, 148 Cal. 377, 83 Pac. 148; Prince v. Lamb, 128 Cal. 129, 60 Pac. 689; Arguello v. Bours, 67 Cal. 450, 8 Pac. 49; Bruck v. Tucker, 42 Cal. 354; Agard v. Valencia, 39 Cal. 302; Boyd v. Warden, 163 Cal. 157, 124 Pac. 841; Smiley v. Read, 163 Cal. 644, 126 Pac. 486.

The complaint does not purport to set forth any facts whatever on the subject. The only allegation concerning it is the bald statement "that said agreement, and the terms and conditions thereof, aforesaid, were and are, in all respects, just, fair, and reasonable between the parties thereto." This is in the precise form which was condemned as insufficient in the passage above quoted. Doubtless the appellate courts should give the language of a complaint on this subject liberal construction in favor of the action of the court below, where it shows an attempt by the pleader to comply with this requirement. But here we have no attempt to state any facts at all—nothing more than the general language of the statute—a mere conclusion of law without facts to support it. The objection was presented by demurrer and was not waived at the trial. There is no escape from the conclusion that the complaint was insufficient and that the judgment must be reversed for that reason.

[2, 3] In view of the possibility of further proceedings below, it is proper to notice certain other objections urged against the validity of the agreement. The agreement itself is as follows:

> "Suisun, Cal., Jan. 6, 1912.
> "This is to certify that I—G. Tomasina—agrees to lease to Thos. Joyce 105 acres of tule land bounded by F. Chadbourne on S., Mrs. Payton on East, Oakland Club N. & W., and a right of way to said tule land for a term of 3 years commencing Jan. 1912, at a rental of $200. per yr paid in advance before taking possession, Thomas Joyce to have privilege of buying said land for $50.00 per acre, during the 1st year terms ½ cash, and bal in 1 yr at 6 per cent per annum, after 1st year Joyce is to have first privilege of buying tule land, terms to be ½ cash & bal in 1 yr at 6 per cent. Thomasina is to reserve the hunting privileges thro lease. Rec'd paymt $1.00 on acct.
> "G. Tomasini."

In the absence of explanatory extrinsic facts, the description of the land to be leased would be so uncertain that performance of the agreement could not be enforced. The objects named as boundaries are the names of individuals, which is absurd. Furthermore the agreement does not show the state or county in which the land is situated. But it appears that Tomasini was and is the owner of 105 acres of tule land in Solano county, Cal., which is bounded south by the lands of F. A. Chadbourne, east by the lands of Mrs. L. S. Payton, and on the north and west by the lands of the Suisun Gun Club. The evidence shows that the Suisun Gun Club was also known as the "Oakland Club." These facts remove the difficulty in identifying the land. True, the names of the owners were used to designate the bounds instead of stating that the lands of the persons named constituted the boundaries, but this method of expression is not uncommon and is well understood. When used in the connection in which they appear in this agreement, the words could not reasonably be taken otherwise than as referring to the lands owned by the several persons named, respectively. Tibbetts v. Moore, 23 Cal. 213; Tredinnick v. Mining Co., 72 Cal. 81, 13 Pac. 152; Central I. D. v. De Lappe, 79 Cal. 355, 21 Pac. 825. So understood, the description is sufficient to identify the land. The county and state is not given. But it further appears that the land, bounded as above stated, is in Solano county, Cal. It will not be presumed, for the mere purpose of nullifying the agreement, that there is another tract of 105 acres of tule land, either in Solano county or elsewhere, and that is bounded by other lands belonging to the same persons as are named. If such an extraordinary coincidence does exist, it is incumbent on the defendant to plead and prove it. In the absence of such proof, it will be presumed, upon the other facts shown, that these boundaries do identify the tract of land in question.

[4, 5] The agreement is indefinite and uncertain with regard to the exact location of the right of way. The complaint contains no allegation to remove this defect. It may be that this ambiguity can be cured by a showing of extrinsic facts, if the complaint be amended. If it is made to appear that there was at that time a way rightfully in use for access and egress to and from this land, running from the county road "No. 480" to a point on the tract of land to be leased, such way would be appurtenant to the land and would pass with a conveyance of the land without special description. The plaintiff would be entitled to have such way properly described, however, if he demands it, in a lease executed under an order of the court if he should finally prevail in the action. But, in order to entitle him to such relief, it is necessary that he should lay the foundation therefor by alleging and proving extrinsic facts showing the location and description of the right of way. The complaint should also have alleged that the Suisun Gun Club, the owner of one of the adjoining tracts of land, was also known as the "Oakland Club," the designation used in the agreement aforesaid.

[6] Upon these points the rule allowing testimony of extrinsic facts to identify and apply the description of land in a written contract is well stated by Justice Field in Stanley v. Green, 12 Cal. 162, as follows:

> "That the evidence of the circumstances under which the deed was executed is admissible does not admit of a question. These circumstances place the court in the position of the parties, and enable it to interpret intelligently the language used by them. It is not to contradict or vary the terms of the instrument that the evidence is received, but to apply them to the subject-matter. For this purpose, extrinsic evidence must be admissible in the interpretation of every instrument; and the law will not declare the instrument void for uncertainty, until it has been examined with all the light which cotemporaneous facts may furnish. If these render the intention clear, and the words of the instrument are, by fair rendering, susceptible of a construction to uphold such intention, then they will be so construed, and the instrument enforced."

This rule has been frequently applied in this state. Marriner v. Dennison, 78 Cal. 207, 20 Pac. 386; Jenny Lind Co. v. Bower, 11 Cal. 198; Kimball v. Semple, 25 Cal. 449; Hancock v. Watson, 18 Cal. 139; Colton v. Seavey, 22 Cal. 503; Reamer v. Nesmith, 34 Cal. 626; Piper v. True, 36 Cal. 615; Sprague v. Edwards, 48 Cal. 249; Truett v. Adams, 66 Cal. 222, 5 Pac. 96; Wheeler v. Bolton, 66 Cal. 86, 4 Pac. 981; Preble v. Abrahams, 88 Cal. 251, 26 Pac. 99, 22 Am. St. Rep. 301; Towle v. Carmelo, 99 Cal. 398, 33 Pac. 1126; McCullough v. Olds, 108 Cal. 532, 41 Pac. 420; Best v. Wohlford, 144 Cal. 738, 78 Pac. 293; Burton v. Mullenary, 147 Cal. 259, 81 Pac. 544.

[7] The agreement gives the duration of the term and the time of payment of the rent with sufficient certainty. Its effect in these particulars is that the term began January 1, 1912, and extended three years from that date, and that the first year's rent was to be paid when the lessee should take possession, and the subsequent rentals on the 1st of January of each subsequent year, and in advance.

[8] The agreement does not fix the time for the making of the deed in case the option should be exercised, nor does it expressly declare that the defendant will execute a deed. But the contract, in that event, would become an agreement to sell the land for the stated price, and, by section 1731 of the Civil Code, such an agreement binds the seller to convey the title. In the absence of anything appearing to the contrary, covenants to pay the price on the one hand and to transfer the property on the other are deemed to be dependent, and a conveyance would be due, in this instance, upon payment of the price. 1 Sugden on Vendors, bottom p. 239. We do not deem it necessary to notice any other points urged in the briefs.

The judgment is reversed.

TURNER et al. v. EASTSIDE CANAL & IRRIGATION CO. (Sac. 1926.)

1. TRIAL (§ 404*)—FINDINGS—GENERAL FINDINGS—SPECIAL FACTS.

A general finding, independent of particular facts found, can be upheld, where there is evidence to sustain it, regardless of the legal effect of the particular facts found, but a general finding, in a suit involving water rights, that defendant has the right to use and divert a specified quantity of water from a stream is not a general finding, where the quantity referred to therein is made up of that mentioned in particular findings stating in detail the places where the water may be used and the quantities that may be used, and the particular findings control as to the quantity and use of the water.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 957-962; Dec. Dig. § 404.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 878*)—PARTIES WHO MAY ALLEGE ERROR—RESPONDENT.

A finding of fact in favor of appellant is conclusive on respondent on the appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3573-3580; Dec. Dig. § 878.*]

3. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 79*)—RIPARIAN OWNERS—RIGHT TO USE WATER.

An owner of riparian land may use the water of the stream, and to do so he may go to a point on the stream above his land with the consent of the abutting and intervening owners, and there take the water and conduct it to his land, so long as he takes only his reasonable share and uses it only on his riparian land.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. §§ 70, 71; Dec. Dig. § 79.*]

4. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 78*)—ACQUISITION OF WATER RIGHTS—PRESCRIPTIVE RIGHT.

A corporation organized to divert water from a river for sale, rental, and distribution for irrigation, and to carry water to its lands, took the water at a point above the riparian lands of plaintiffs and carried the same through a canal. It delivered water on the land of plaintiffs for use there without any charge therefor or without exercising any supervision over the taking by plaintiffs, who, when desiring water for their land, opened the gates into the canal and let the water out into their fields without asking leave of the corporation so to do. Held, that the taking of the water by the corporation was not hostile to plaintiffs to the extent of the water used by them, and though the corporation had the right to make its diversion at the place maintained by it, and to insist that the water used by plaintiffs should be taken through the canal, it did not acquire the right to take the water from plaintiffs and use it elsewhere.

5. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 138*)—RIPARIAN RIGHTS—USE OF WATER FOR IRRIGATION.

The use of water for irrigation by a riparian owner is not adverse to the riparian owners above or below, but he may only use the water in equal right with them.

6. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 49*)—RIPARIAN RIGHTS—USE OF WATER FOR IRRIGATION.

Where the appropriation of water is for a riparian use, the question of the right to the use of the water must be confined to an inquiry whether the water claimed for the riparian land is its reasonable share of the water of the stream.

7. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 257*)—RIPARIAN RIGHTS—USE OF WATER FOR IRRIGATION.

Where an irrigation company acquired the right to use a specified quantity of water of a river through a canal over the land of a riparian owner, and the corporation furnished the riparian owner water from the canal for the irrigation of his land, the riparian owner was entitled, under Civ. Code, § 552, to have the supply of water continued on the established rates and terms.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Merced County; E. N. Rector, Judge.

Action by Elizabeth Turner, administratrix of William C. Turner, deceased, and another against the Eastside Canal & Irrigation Company. From a part of the judgment establishing the rights of defendant to divert water, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed and remanded for new trial of issues involved in the part reversed.

Frank H. Short, of Fresno, J. W. Knox, of Merced, and Edward F. Treadwell, of San Francisco, for appellants. James F. Peck, of Oakland, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The plaintiffs appeal from the part of the judgment declaring that the defendant "is entitled to divert" from the San Joaquin river, at a point above plaintiffs' land, 281 cubic feet of water per second, "for sale, rental, and distribution, for the irrigation of land and for the watering of stock and domestic uses thereon," and quieting the title of the defendant to said water "against plaintiffs as the owners of the riparian lands above described."

The plaintiffs each own a large body of land on and near the San Joaquin river. Other large bodies of land belonging, respectively, to J. J. Stevinson, the Sharon estate, and J. W. Mitchell lie farther down the river and were, in part at least, riparian thereto. The defendant corporation was formed by Stevinson and Mitchell in 1887, mainly as an agency by means of which to divert water from the river and carry it to their lands. In order to do this, it was found necessary or convenient to take the water from the river at a point above the lands of the plaintiffs herein and carry it through a canal over the intervening lands of the plaintiffs and others to the Stevinson and Mitchell lands. The canal company obtained rights of way through said intervening lands, made tne canal thereon, and by a dam in the river took water therefrom into the canal and carried it therein to the lands below. This diversion began in the year 1888. The plaintiffs' lands, at that time, all belonged to William C. Turner. In March, 1906, some 3,000 acres of it were sold and conveyed to the Las Animas & San Joaquin Land Company, hereinafter designated the "land company."

On September 28, 1906, the plaintiffs began this action. The complaint alleges that for two years past the defendant, by means of said dam and canal, had been taking water from the river above plaintiffs' lands, carrying it through the canal to the lands below, not riparian to the river, and there discharging it; that it had no right to take from the river any greater flow than 75 cubic feet per second, at any stage, and no right at any time to take a quantity that would leave less than 25 cubic feet per second flowing down the river over its dam, but that it claimed the right to divert and carry below plaintiffs' lands a flow of 500 cubic feet per second, and threatened and intended to do so. They prayed for an injunction to prevent the excessive diversion.

In its answer the defendant alleged that it had acquired by prescription the right to take from the river at said dam a flow of 500 cubic feet of water per second when that quantity was then flowing, and to take the entire flow when there was less, and to carry the same through the canal to points below the plaintiffs' lands and there sell and distribute the same for use on other lands.

One of the important questions arising in the case is whether the use made by the defendant of the water it diverted, and which was adjudged to belong to it, was of a character adverse to plaintiffs and such as to give the defendant a prescriptive right to continue the diversion. The court found that, ever since the year 1888, the defendant had been continuously diverting into the canal at the said dam 281 cubic feet per second of the water of the river and causing the same to run down the canal and to be applied to beneficial use as follows: It delivered 70 cubic feet per second upon 5,600 acres of land for the irrigation thereof, 1,400 acres of which were lands described in the complaint as belonging to the plaintiff land company, and 4,200 acres thereof were lands owned by Miller & Lux, which said water was used for the irrigation of said lands; it delivered to other lands of Miller & Lux, 500 acres in extent, 10 cubic feet per second; it delivered to 750 acres of land belonging to the Sharon estate 15 cubic feet per second; it delivered to 2,500 acres of land belonging to the estate of Mitchell 50 cubic feet per second; it delivered to 4,000 acres belonging to Stevinson 80 cubic feet per second—all of which water was used upon the said lands, respectively, for the irrigation thereof, making the total amount of 225 cubic feet per second actually put to beneficial use, and that the remaining 56 cubic feet per second of the water so diverted was necessarily lost by unavoidable seepage and evaporation in transmission. It further found that the defendant made said diversion for said uses openly, uninterruptedly, and under a claim of right to do so, and adversely to the plaintiffs and all other persons; that the defendant "took and appropriated said quantity of 281" second feet of flowing water "for the purpose and with the intention of supplying the same, for beneficial purposes, to the inhabitants of the lands situated along the line of and below the water in said canal, for the irrigation of the land so situated, and for the sale, rental, and distribution by said defendant to all persons desiring to use the same"; that said lands constituted a "farming neighborhood"; that the plaintiffs and their predecessors in interest at all times knew that said quantity of water was being so diverted and used under a claim of right; that never, prior to June 12, 1906, did they deny or dispute said right; that many owners of other lands along the canal, relying on the neglect and failure of the plaintiffs to deny or dispute said right, obtained water from year to year from the defendant, improved their lands by planting trees, vines, and alfalfa, and irrigated the same with water from said canal; and that the trees, vines, and alfalfa would perish if deprived of said water.

[1] The court also made a general finding that the "defendant is the owner of and has the right to use and divert the water naturally flowing in the San Joaquin river" 281 second feet when that quantity is flowing in the river, and the entire flow when there is less than 281 second feet. The respondent contends that this general finding is supported by evidence of uses upon other lands than those above set forth and particularly found, and that this is sufficient to sustain the general finding. It is true that, if the general finding was intended to be independent of the particular facts found, it could be upheld, if there was enough evidence to sustain it, regardless of the legal effect of the particular facts. But this finding is not of that character. The findings clearly show that the 281 second feet referred to in the general finding is made up of that mentioned in the particular findings, above recited, in which the court sets forth in detail the exact places where the water was used and the quantities used on each place and necessarily consumed in transmission, going to make up the 281 second feet, and that the right to that quantity was gained solely by virtue of the delivery upon these lands and the use thereon of the respective quantities mentioned. It is therefore unnecessary to further consider the claim that there was evidence of adverse diversion and use upon other lands than those specifically mentioned.

The court further found that all of the plaintiffs' lands are and always have been situated along and bordering on the San Joaquin river and its various channels; that the waters of said river naturally flow and always have naturally flowed "to, upon, through, and over said lands, and all of said lands are and at all times have been riparian to said river."

Upon an analysis of the facts we have stated, it will be observed that the prescriptive right of the defendant, if any, to 17½ second feet of the water included in the water right adjudged to it (that is, one-fourth of the 70 second feet) is based solely on the finding that, for the essential period of time, the defendant had taken 17½ second feet of water from the river into its canal, carried the same down the canal to lands of the said land company, and there delivered it upon 1,400 acres of said land for the irrigation thereof, and that the same has been there used for that purpose upon the lands of the company. It is contended by plaintiffs that the 4,200 acres of land belonging to Miller & Lux were also riparian to the river, and that the 52½ second feet delivered from the defendant's canal upon that land and used to irrigate it were of the water to which that land was entitled by virtue of its riparian character. There is no finding that this 4,200 acres is riparian to the river.

[2] The finding above mentioned, to the effect that all the lands of the plaintiffs were and always have been riparian to the San Joaquin river, is conclusive of the fact, so far as the respondent is concerned, upon this appeal. Consequently all that part of the respondent's argument directed to the proposition that said lands are not riparian, or based on that assumption, is unavailing and requires no further consideration.

We now come to the question whether or not the defendant has acquired title by prescription, as against the land company, to the 17½ second feet of water taken from the river into the canal of defendant and delivered upon the 1,400 acres of riparian land belonging to the land company.

[3] The owner of riparian land has the right to use the water of the stream. In order to obtain it, he has the right to go to a point on the stream above his land, with the consent of the abutting and intervening owners, and there take out the water and conduct it to his land. So long as he takes in this manner only his reasonable share of the water and uses it only on his riparian land, he is exercising his riparian rights and nothing more. Turner v. James, 155 Cal. 92, 99 Pac. 520, 22 L. R. A. (N. S.) 401, 132 Am. St. Rep. 59, 17 Ann. Cas. 823; Rose v. Mesmer, 142 Cal. 329, 75 Pac. 905; Charnock v. Higuerra, 111 Cal. 480, 44 Pac. 171, 32 L. R. A. 190, 52 Am. St. Rep. 195. As is said in Charnock v. Higuerra, it is frequently the case that he cannot conveniently or profitably bring the water to his land for irrigation thereof otherwise than by taking it out on other land above him. It is not claimed that the water so used on the 1,400 acres was more than its appropriate share.

[4] The taking of water into the canal above, carrying it down to and delivering it upon the land of the land company for use by it thereon, was not an act in itself hostile, adverse, or injurious to the land company with respect to that water. The canal passed through the land of the land company, and it is conceded that no charge has ever been made by the defendant against the owners of the land for this water. It appears further that the defendant exercised no supervision whatever over the taking of this water by the land company. When the latter desired water from the canal for its land, it opened the gates into the canal, of which there were several, and let the water out into its fields, and it does not appear, nor is it claimed, that it ever asked leave of the defendant to do so. Apparently it was doing by means of this canal only that which by any available means it had a right to do, taking the water of the river for use on its riparian land. Our attention has not been called to any evidence indicating that the defendant ever denied its right to this water or disputed that it was a riparian right. It is therefore clearly established that the taking was neither hostile nor injurious to the land company, so far as the water right and the water itself is concerned, to the extent of the 17½ second feet used on the said 1,400 acres.

It may be that, by means of this continuous diversion of the water above the plaintiffs' land, the defendant has acquired a right to divert it at that place. Such right may be of advantage to the defendant, since it may enable it the better to carry to the other places below the excess over and above that delivered to or taken by the land company. This question it is not necessary to consider. It may be that the parties have to some extent confused this right to an established place of diversion with the right to the water itself. The two are not dependent. And this appears to be the true solution of the difficulty. The defendant has the right to make its diversion at the place it has maintained so long and to insist that the 17½ second feet used by the land company shall also be taken out at that place and through said canal; but it has not acquired the right to take that water from the land company and use it elsewhere, nor indeed any right whatever to the use of that water.

[5] With regard to the 52½ second feet used on the land of Miller & Lux, the facts are not precisely the same. There is no finding that the Miller & Lux land is riparian to the river. We have not examined the evidence to ascertain whether it is riparian or not. It appears that, before the defendant constructed its canal, Miller & Lux granted to it a right of way over the Miller & Lux land for the canal, in consideration of which the defendant agreed that Miller & Lux should at all times have the right to have 50 cubic feet of water, of the natural flow of the canal at its current flow on a grade of 6 inches per mile when there was 200 of such cubic feet flowing in the canal, turned out to them upon said land along the canal through gates to be constructed by the defendant. It was further agreed that the rights of Miller & Lux, whether as appropriators, riparian proprietors, or otherwise, to the waters of the river should be in no wise impaired or affected by the agreement, and that, if the defendant should take water from the river, its taking should be based upon such rights thereto as it had prior to the making of the agreement. If the Miller & Lux land is also riparian to the river, as claimed, it may be that the use by it of the water taken through the canal under this agreement would also be attributable to the riparian right. Such use would be like that of any other riparian owner, not adverse to those above or below, but only the use in equal right with them of its reasonable share. This we cannot determine, inasmuch as there is no finding that said land is riparian. If it should turn out upon another trial that it is riparian, the rules above stated with regard to the 1,400 acres of the land company would apply with equal force to the water used on the land of Miller & Lux under the said agreement. The defendant's canal would be a mere agency of Miller & Lux as riparian owner, and the effect on the land company's right to the water so used by Miller & Lux would be the same as if Miller & Lux had made and used the canal to carry said water to said land.

[6] The findings and evidence suggest that perhaps similar questions may arise with regard to the use of the water applied upon the Stevinson land. It also appears to be, in part at least, riparian to the river. Having that character, there would attach to it the right to the reasonable use, as compared to other riparian lands, of the waters of the river. There is some evidence indicating that the defendant company was a mere agency of Stevinson to carry the water from the river to his land. If so, such taking may be, to that extent, an exercise of his riparian rights and not an appropriation by the defendant. The parties do not appear to have well understood the distinction, and in their testimony they generally use the word "appropriation," in speaking of their right. If it should be found to be a riparian use, the question to be determined as to the water used thereon would not be with respect to a right by prescription, but would be confined to the inquiry whether the water claimed for that land is its reasonable share of the water of the river. The answer alleges that several thousand acres of the land irrigated with the water taken by defendant is riparian to the river. It is uncertain in that it does not describe the land referred to; it may be that of Miller & Lux or the land company, and not that of Stevinson. The findings do not state the character of the Stevinson land. It should be added that the answer does not allege that the taking by the defendant was a taking for use on riparian land or in exercise of any riparian right pertaining to the land to which the water was to be applied. It alleges a taking for sale, rental, and distribution, or, in other words, an appropriation to public use, but it does not clearly appear in the evidence that it was offered for sale generally. All these matters can be ascertained upon a new trial, if proper pleadings are presented.

[7] We add that, even if the defendant had by adverse use, or in any other manner, acquired the title to the 281 second feet of water, the judgment is too broad. The land of the land company lies on the line and within the flow of the canal of the defendant. If the defendant has furnished water from said canal for the irrigation of said land, as the court found, it would be entitled, under section 552 of the Civil Code, to have the supply of water continued upon the established rates and terms.

The award of 281 second feet to the defendant was excessive by at least 17½ second feet, so far as the land company is concerned. It is possible that it was also excessive so far as it included the right to take from Miller & Lux the 52½ second feet and the 15 second feet from the Sharon land which was taken under an arrangement similar to that relating to the Miller & Lux land. The Turner estate is, or may be, interested in these questions. It is possible that the use of the water on the lands of the land company, Miller & Lux, and the Sharon estate, all of which are adjacent to the Turner land, or nearer to it than the Stevinson land, would be less detrimental to the Turner lands than its use on lands below it and more remote from it. We therefore deem it advisable to sustain the appeal as to both plaintiffs.

The part of the judgment appealed from is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial of the issues involved in the part of the judgment reversed.

We concur: SLOSS, J.; ANGELLOTTI, J.; LORIGAN, J.; HENSHAW, J.; MELVIN, J.

MACDONALD v. DE FREMERY et al.

(S. F. 6361.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 6, 1914. Rehearing Denied Aug. 5, 1914.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1010*)—FINDINGS—CONCLUSIVENESS.

The findings of the trial court on conflicting evidence will not be disturbed on appeal.

2. FRAUD (§ 11*)—ACTION FOR DECEIT—OPINION.

An expression of an opinion, to avoid an action for deceit, must be an expression of an opinion honestly entertained by the person making it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fraud, Cent. Dig. §§ 12, 13; Dec. Dig. § 11.*]

3. FRAUD (§ 24*)—ACTION FOR DECEIT—SOLE INDUCEMENT.

It is sufficient, in order to maintain an action for deceit in representations inducing the purchase of stock, that defendant's false statement was one inducement to the purchase, although not the sole inducement.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fraud, Cent. Dig. § 8; Dec. Dig. § 24.*]

4. BANKS AND BANKING (§ 253*)—NATIONAL BANKS — REPORT BY DIRECTORS — FEDERAL STATUTE.

The federal statute requiring directors of a national bank to report its condition to the comptroller of the currency requires the report to contain a true statement of the condition of the bank.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Banks and Banking, Cent. Dig. §§ 944–949; Dec. Dig. § 253.*]

5. BANKS AND BANKING (§ 253*)—ACTION FOR DECEIT—FALSE REPORT OF BANK DIRECTORS.

The act of directors of a national bank in signing a report of its condition to the comptroller of the currency, falsely reporting an item of loans and discounts containing paper worth much less than its face value, which would materially affect the value of its stock, would render them individually liable to a purchaser of the stock who in good faith relied upon such report as stating the bank's true financial condition, regardless of whether such report was made for the express purpose of inducing any particular individual to purchase.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Banks and Banking, Cent.Dig. §§ 944–949; Dec.Dig. § 253.*]

6. FRAUD (§ 13*)—FALSE REPRESENTATIONS—BELIEF—NEGATIVE FRAUD.

Where statements by bank directors in a report of the bank's condition to the comptroller of the currency were, in fact, false, it was immaterial that they believed that the bank would eventually come through its difficulties or that they did not intend to cheat a purchaser of the bank's stock; and, as deceit may be negative, consisting in suppression of what it is one's duty to declare as well as in the declaration of that which is false, the directors, if they did not and could not have believed that the report contained a true statement of the bank's financial conditions, and failed to disclose such fact to plaintiff in handing him the report, were liable under the express provision of Civ. Code, § 1710, defining deceit.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; William H. Waste, Judge.

Action by A. S. Macdonald against James L. De Fremery and others. Judgment for the surviving defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Pillsbury, Madison & Sutro, of San Francisco, for appellant. Williamson & Dibblee, of San Francisco, and Fitzgerald, Abbott & Beardsley, of Oakland, for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. This action was brought to recover damages for deceit. The complaint charged that plaintiff was induced through the false representations of defendants to purchase stock of the Union National Bank of Oakland at a gross overvaluation, whereby plaintiff sustained damages in the sum of $37,400, alleged to be the difference between the price paid for the stock and its actual value at the times of purchase. The defendants were, respectively, president, first vice president, and second vice president of the Union National Bank. Defendant De Fremery died before the trial of the action, which as to him consequently abated, and was dismissed. Upon the trial had against the remaining defendants the court made findings and gave judgment in favor of them. The plaintiff prosecutes this appeal under sections 953a et seq., Code of Civil Procedure, contending that the findings and decision are not supported by the evidence.

The complaint charges upon three causes of action. In the first plaintiff seeks to recover damages in the sum of $10,400, the amount paid for 54 shares of stock bought from defendants, and 50 shares of a new issue of stock, for all of which stock plaintiff paid the par value of $100 per share. The second cause of action seeks damages in the same amount, growing out of the purchase of the same stock, but is founded on certain other allegations of fact and of fraudulent representation, which will hereinafter be set forth. In the third cause of action the allegations of the second are repeated, and it is charged that, in reliance upon the alleged facts and the asserted fraudulent representations, plaintiff purchased from a third person, one Perine, 270 shares of the stock, paying therefor the par value.

For the better understanding of the controversy a brief historical presentment of certain unquestioned facts becomes necessary. The Union National Bank of Oakland had been in existence for many years. In 1907 its stock had sold for $243 per share. Defendants had purchased small amounts of this stock at that price. It became too closely affiliated in its banking business with the California Safe Deposit & Trust Company of San Francisco, which latter institution closed its doors and went into insolvency. The Oakland bank then took advantage of the so-called "panic holidays" of the autumn of 1907 and suspended business, not as an insolvent institution, but under the protection of the holiday act. A committee of ways and means was appointed from the directorate of the bank to investigate its financial condition and formulate a plan for the resumption of business. The three defendants in this action, with three others, constituted this committee. It employed Mr. Knight, an expert accountant, to make a complete examination of the assets of the bank and to report the result of this examination to the committee. Mr. Knight made this examination, placing specific valuations upon the bank's notes, bonds, and other securities. In so doing he consulted with De Fremery, Roeth and other members of the board. The result of his examination, after such consultations, was embodied in a report in which these various securities were classified under the designations of "Good," "Not Valued," "Doubtful" and "Bad." By "good" it was meant that the securities so classified were worth their face; by "not valued," that they were worth one-half of their face; by "doubtful," that they were worth one-third of their face; and by "bad," that they were valueless. Mr. Knight's report was carefully examined and passed upon by this committee of ways and means and expressed the opinion of the committee as to the value of the assets. This report was completed and presented on November 26, 1907. The bank then effected an agreement with its depositors touching the amounts and times of the withdrawal of their deposits and opened its doors for business on January 2, 1908. The three defendants became actively interested in the management of the bank. Mr. De Fremery was elected president, with a salary of $500 per month, Mr. Gray first vice president, with a salary of $200 per month, and Mr. Roeth second vice president, with a salary of $300 per month, positions which they retained up to and including the time of their transactions with plaintiff. A plan was proposed and accepted by the stockholders of the bank to bring in new capital by increasing the capital stock from $150,000 to $300,000, selling 1,500 shares of the new issue at par. On January 24th the three defendant officers and directors, together with three other directors, passed a resolution at the directors' meeting awarding these three defendants each $5,000 in consideration of their services in selling the new issue, and conditioned upon their success in so doing. The bank did not prosper. Depositors withdrew their money, necessitating the sale of the bank's securities and the calling in of its loans to meet their demands. Thus over $400,000 of loans were called in, and salable securities to the extent of $145,000 were disposed of. No new loans were made. Hence the bank was not engaged in that essential part of a lucrative business, but was, in fact, in liquidation, meeting its creditors' demands. In so doing its operating expenses exceeded its income, and such business as it was transacting was conducted at a loss of over $1,600 a month. In April, 1908, defendant Roeth, by his own testimony, gave up his salary of $300 per month, "so that the bank might live. I did not want to see the bank fail if I could help it." During this time defendant Gray, first vice president, took an active interest in the bank's collections. He used a classified list of the notes of the bank, and upon this list made his own notations touching their value. He classified the notes as "N. G." (meaning no good), "good," "bad," "doubtful," and "slow." Upon this list the bad loans of the bank aggregated over $226,000; the doubtful loans over $146,000, or a total of over $373,000; while the "N. G." or worthless notes had an aggregate face value of over $29,000.

Such was the condition of affairs and such was the knowledge of the defendants of this condition of affairs when, on May 22, 1908, there was published in the Oakland Tribune in the city of Oakland, the following report, entitled:

"Report of the Condition of the Union National Bank of Oakland at the Close of Business, May 14, 1908."

This was an official report to the Comptroller of the Currency as required by the national bank act. It set forth:

Resources:
Loans and discounts..........	$675,587.45
Bonds, securities, etc..........	303,346.67
Capital Stock:
Capital stock paid in..........	150,000.00
Surplus fund	100,000.00
Undivided profits	51,052.01

Correct—Attest: Geo. Roeth,
George D. Gray,
James L. De Fremery,
Directors.

In this report the item "Loans and discounts, $675,587.45," included at their full face value: First, every one of the "doubtful" loans of the Knight report, which loans had been set down as worth only one-third of their face, aggregating $107,155.59; second, every one of the "not valued" loans set forth in the Knight report and valued at one-half of their face value, aggregating $194,756.05; third, every one of the "bad" and "doubtful" loans specified in Gray's list, which aggregated $373,684.74; and, fourth, every one of the "N. G." and "bad" loans of Gray's list, aggregating $29,581.42, believed by Gray to be worthless. All of these notes and loans were included among the resources of the bank as being worth their full face value. Under the item "Bonds, securities, etc., $303,346.67," were bonds of the face value of $100,000 which in the Knight report, approved by the committee, were held to be worth only $50,000. Accepting the Knight report as containing a fair estimate of the value of the bank's assets, and comparing it with the published statement of May 22d, above quoted, it is apparent that the value of the capital stock paid in, there represented to be $150,000, and the amount of the surplus fund, there represented to be $100,000, and the amount of the undivided profits, there represented to be $51,052.01, or a total of $301,052.01, were actually worth $55,310.90. And from this valuation so fixed in November must be deducted the admitted losses which the bank had sustained since its reopening in January. And that the Knight report erred rather upon the side of liberality than conservatism is established by the facts that in May, 1909, a receiver took charge of the bank as an insolvent institution under the national bank act, and although between the date of this report and the failure of the bank $150,000 had been added in cash capital, and although during all of that time no new loans had been made, the assets proved insufficient, after two years of liquidation, to pay off the depositors, to whom $60,000 are still owing. It is unnecessary to add that the stockholders have received nothing. Mr. Morris, the receiver of the bank, testified that many of the notes which were valued at one-half and one-third of their face in the Knight report were still in his hands uncollected and uncollectible.

The full amount of the subscription to the $150,000 new issue of the bank stock had not been secured by the defendants. A number of subscriptions were conditional upon full subscriptions being obtained by or before July 15, 1908. The defendants were not only in managerial charge of the affairs of the institution, but had undertaken to secure these subscriptions, and had voted themselves a $5,000 commission each for so doing. On July 9th plaintiff, who was not a stockholder of the bank, and who had not been interested in the affairs of the bank, was approached by the president on the sidewalk in front of the bank, with the request for a business conversation, in the hope of interesting him in the institution. They withdrew to the president's office, where a conversation was had. There plaintiff met Mr. Roeth, the president stating that he was endeavoring to induce Mr. Macdonald to purchase some of their stock, and Mr. Roeth replying that he hoped Mr. Macdonald would become interested. The published report of May 22d was handed to Mr. Macdonald, the court finding that:

> "At said time and place defendant Roeth said to plaintiff that said report correctly set forth the financial condition of said bank as shown by the books of the bank."

Plaintiff, at the close of the interview, declared that he did not think that he was sufficiently interested to proceed in the matter, and left the bank, but, at the solicitation of the president, agreed to return the following morning. Mr. De Fremery conferred with defendant Gray after plaintiff's departure, told him he was trying to induce appellant to take some of the stock, and Gray expressed his approval. Plaintiff returned to the second conference upon the morning of July 10th, with the result that he agreed to buy 54 shares of the old issue of stock from the defendants, and did so, paying them $100 per share; they having previously bought the stock during the period of the bank's suspension for $50 per share. He also purchased 50 shares of the new issue. Plaintiff not only purchased this stock, but further undertook to aid in the rehabilitation and upbuilding of the bank. Before the purchase of the 104 shares was actually consummated, 10 shares of the stock were placed in plaintiff's name to qualify him for admission to the directorate, to which he was immediately elected. On the following day, July 11th, he wrote to his friend Mr. Metcalf a letter, urging the latter to join with himself and his associates in the reorganization of the bank. The opening paragraphs of that letter are as follows:

> "My Dear Metcalf: With a number of strong men as directors, we are reorganizing the Union National Bank, and I have suggested your name for president, or vice president, whichever position you would entertain. Inclosed is the last statement. The capital stock, fully subscribed for, has been increased $150,000, giving $300,000 capital, with $100,000 surplus and $51,000 undivided profits."

The letter proceeded to say that the writer could secure for Metcalf some of the stock at $100 per share if he desired to purchase it, and that "it would unquestionably be a very profitable venture for you." On July 17th plaintiff completed the purchase of the 104 shares. A few days thereafter one Perine, whose brother was employed in the bank, offered to sell plaintiff 270 shares of the stock at par. Plaintiff entered into an agreement for this purchase on July 31st. This sale was consummated on August 15th, when the stock was paid for by plaintiff. The day following this last purchase plaintiff testified that he was confidentially informed by the cashier of the falsity of the representations which had been made to him and of the true condition of the institution. He immediately proceeded to make an investigation, and, finding the cashier's information to be true, tendered to defendants the stock which he had purchased, demanding a return of the money and other properties paid therefor. The defendants refused to acknowledge the justice of his demand, and this action followed.

The gravamen of the charges of fraud and deceit in the second and third causes of action are the same. Plaintiff charged the official and managerial capacity of the defendants; that they were familiar with and knew the financial condition of the bank; were familiar with the values of all of the assets and liabilities of the bank; that they requested plaintiff to purchase 100 shares of the capital stock of the bank and delivered a copy of the report of the condition of the bank at the close of business on May 14, 1908, to plaintiff, at the same time telling him that that report was correct and was a true statement of the financial condition of the bank. He pleaded further that the report was attested as being correct by each of the respondents, and was made, issued, and published as required by the national bank act; that he believed and relied upon the report, and was thereby induced to buy the stock; that if the report had been correct the stock would have been worth at least the price paid for it; but "that at all of said times and at all times herein mentioned said report was false and untrue in the following particulars, to wit: The loans and discounts of said bank which were stated in said report to be of the value of $675,587.45 were of no greater value than $375,000; the bonds, securities, etc., which were stated in said report to be of the value of $303,346.67 were of no greater value than $200,000." Further plaintiff alleged that the defendants and each of them knew the report to be false and untrue in the particulars stated, and that the stock of the bank was at all times without value, and that in consequence of these fraudulent representations plaintiff sustained the damage for which he sought recovery. The third cause of action charges upon the same report and representations, and alleged that in reliance upon them he purchased the 270 shares of stock from Perine. Each defendant filed a separate answer, and to the allegations concerning the report they pleaded as follows:

> "This defendant denies that at all or any of said times or at any time said report was false or untrue in the particulars mentioned in paragraph 3 of said second cause of action or in any particular, and further denies that the loans and discounts of said bank were of no greater value than three hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars ($375,000), and further denies that the bonds, securities, etc., of said bank were of no greater value than two hundred thousand dollare ($200,000), and in connection with said denials, said defendant alleges that the statements of the value of the loans and discounts of said bank, and of the bonds, securities, etc., of said bank, and the statements of value as to all the assets and liabilities of said bank contained in said report were and each of them was an expression of opinion as to the value of said assets and said liabilities, and that said statements and none of them were statements of facts, and that said defendants and each of them believed at the time said report was made that said report represented the true condition and affairs of said bank, and that said report represented the true value of the assets and liabilities of said bank, and that said report represented the opinions of defendants and each of them as to the value of the bank's assets and liabilities and each item thereof."

The court found that the defendants were such officers of the bank, and "actively participated in the business of the bank and constituted the managing officers of the bank," and each of the defendants was familiar with and knew the financial condition of the bank, but no one of the defendants, nor all of them, "knew the value of all of the assets and liabilities of said bank." "Plaintiff knew that the defendants had been and were such managing officers and directors of the bank," and "that they and each of them were and was at all such times familiar with the financial condition of said bank, and that it is a fact that at said times plaintiff believed that said defendants and said James L. De Fremery were familiar with the value of all the assets and liabilities of said bank." The court further found it to be a fact that defendants requested plaintiff to purchase the stock of the bank. It found that defendants did deliver a copy of the official report of May 22d to defendant on the 9th of July, but found that none of the defendants "then or there or at all told plaintiff that said report was correct, or that said report was a true statement of the financial condition of said the Union National Bank"; but that it is a fact that at said time and place defendant Roeth stated to plaintiff that said report correctly set forth the financial condition of said bank as shown by the books of said bank. Touching the specific allegations of the falsity of the report as averred in the complaint, it found:

> "That it is not a fact that at all or any of said times, or at all or any of the times herein or in said amended complaint mentioned, said report was false or untrue in that the loans and discounts of said bank which were stated in said report to be of the value of $675,587.45, were of no greater value than $375,000, and that it is not a fact that at said time or place said report was false or untrue in that the bonds, securities, etc., which were stated in said report to be of the value of $303,346.67 were of no greater value than $200,000."

Additionally, the court found:

> "That it is a fact that plaintiff believed or relied on said report, but that it is not a fact that by reason of plaintiff's reliance on said report plaintiff purchased or subscribed for any shares of stock of said bank."

Finally the court found that at the time of the first purchase of stock and at the time of the second purchase of stock it was "not a fact that plaintiff had no knowledge of the financial condition of said bank or of the truth or falsity of said alleged statements or said alleged representations, and that it is not a fact that plaintiff believed or relied upon said alleged statements or said alleged representations; that it is not a fact that on or about the 31st day of August, 1908, plaintiff ascertained the true condition of said bank, but that it is a fact that some time in the month of July, 1908, plaintiff ascertained the true condition of said bank; that it is a fact that plaintiff was familiar with the condition and the affairs of said bank and knew the condition thereof at the time of the purchase of said stock of said bank as hereinbefore mentioned."

From the discussion which follows will be eliminated any consideration of other false representations alleged to have been made by defendants to plaintiff, as that the bank was in a sound financial condition, that it was making money, that its stock was of the value of $145 a share, as would have been the case had the official report of May 22d been true.

[1] Upon all these matters there is, as is usual, a sharp conflict in the evidence, and the findings of the court may not here be disturbed. We will limit the consideration under the findings actually made to the question whether or not these findings are supported by the evidence, and to the final question whether, if so supported, they sustain the judgment. This task would be much simpler were it not for the evasive and inconclusive nature of the findings which the court actually made. Thus the complaint charged that the official report admittedly attested and published by the defendants as representing the condition of the bank (which, as we shall hereafter see, means the true condition, and not a mere transcript from the books) was false in specified particulars. The answer tendered issue by a denial to the effect that it was not true, as stated in the complaint, that the loans and discounts were of no greater value than $375,000, and that the bonds and securities of the bank were of no greater value than $200,000, as pleaded in the complaint. The answer does not attempt to say that the loans and discounts and the bonds and securities were of the actual value placed upon them in the official report. Manifestly a pleader in such a verified answer would escape all consequences attaching to false denials by evidence that the loans and discounts, instead of being worth $375,000, were worth $376,000, and that the bonds and securities were worth $201,000, instead of $200,000. But such a denial, with proof to establish it, would not at all meet and avoid the allegations of the complaint that the report was materially false in these essential particulars. What the defendants rested upon in their answer in avoidance of the complaint is made clear by the last portion of the paragraph above quoted. They rested, and pleaded that they rested, upon the proposition that the statements in the official report were not statements of fact at all, but statements of opinion, and that the report "represented the opinions of defendants and each of them as to the value of the bank's assets and liabilities and each item thereof."

[2] But an expression of an opinion, to avoid an action for deceit, must be the expression of an opinion honestly entertained by the person making it. Barron's Estate Co.

v. Woodruff Co., 163 Cal. 561, 126 Pac. 351; Phelps v. Grady et al., 141 Pac. 926.

Confronted by the Knight report, wherein it is shown that the opinion of these defendants as to the value of the bank's assets was radically different from, and showed a valuation materially less than, the opinion expressed in their official report, the conclusion that the report contained a false and dishonest expression of opinion, unless a reasonable explanation be presented, is well-nigh inevitable. But the court does not find upon this, but, to the contrary, shifts its ground and declares that the defendants, in giving the report to plaintiff, declared only that it "correctly set forth the financial condition of said bank as shown by the books of said bank." Moreover, when the court comes to find upon the question of the falsity of the published official report, it fails utterly to find, as it should, what was the difference between the published value of the loans and discounts and bonds and securities and the real value, but limits its findings to the evasive declaration that this report was not false or untrue, in that the loans of the bank stated in the report to be of the value of $675,587.45 were of no greater value than $375,000. It nowhere declares what the true value was, nor what was the discrepancy between the published value and the actual value. Yet, manifestly, such a finding is essential to the disposition of the case, since, if plaintiff had the right to rely upon this published report, it is of the highest importance in determining the rights and equities of the parties to know how great is the variance between the official statement and the facts as known to, or believed by, the officials themselves when that statement was promulgated. The evidence to support such a finding was before the court in the Knight report. It was evidence of singular persuasiveness, in that it was evidence of the values fixed by the accountant employed by these defendants, which values were by the accountant himself arrived at after consultation with the defendants, and which values were carefully considered and approved by the defendants. In the same way the court limits its finding to a declaration that it is not true that the stock purchased by plaintiff was "without any value whatever." What was that value actually was easily susceptible of determination, and the evidence of the Knight report was before the court from which it could have determined it. Plaintiff paid $100 a share for his stock. If he was defrauded into making the purchase and the stock, though not valueless, was worth but $10, $15, or $20 a share, it was for the court so to have found. Again, it is to be noticed that the court fails utterly to find whether or not the report was or was not false in any essential particular, precisely as it fails to find upon the good faith of the defendants which they pleaded, to the effect that, whether correct or incorrect, the report was but the expression of their honest opinions upon questions of values. Still further, the court find it to be a fact that plaintiff relied on this report, but also finds that it is not a fact that by reason of his reliance on the report plaintiff purchased or subscribed for any shares of stock. It is difficult to comprehend this finding. Plaintiff was handed a report of the financial condition of the bank as contained in its last official published report. By that report the book value of the stock was approximately $145 a share. The court finds that he relied on that report, which can only mean that he relied upon it in making his stock purchases. But at the same time the court finds that it is not a fact that he purchased because of his reliance on the report. The two statements are absolutely at war with each other, and are self-destructive, saving upon the one theory that the court meant that plaintiff did not purchase in sole reliance upon the report. But this, if it be true, is not destructive of plaintiff's right of action.

[3] "It is sufficient, in order to maintain the action, that the false statement was one, although it may not have been the sole, inducement for the purchase." Morgan v. Skiddy, 62 N. Y. 319; Hindman v. First Nat. Bank, 112 Fed. 931, 50 C. C. A. 623, 57 L. R. A. 108; Sioux Nat. Bank v. Norfolk State Bank, 56 Fed. 141, 5 C. C. A. 448; Oliver v. Bank of England, 1 Ch. Div. 610; Addington v. Allen, 11 Wend. (N. Y.) 374.

Again, while the court finds, in effect, that appellant was familiar with the condition and affairs of the bank at the time of the purchase of the stock, this finding manifestly clashes with the finding which we have just been considering, that he relied upon the published report. Since it is found that he relied upon the published report, it becomes proper to consider what character and extent of reliance he was entitled to place upon it. From plaintiff's testimony it appears that he purchased heavily of the stock of a moribund institution, buying that stock at par when it had previously been purchased by the defendants at $50 per share, and when the report of the expert accountant fixed a value on it of slightly over $30 a share. Also we have plaintiff's letter to his intimate friend, Mr. Metcalf, inviting him also to purchase at the same price, and giving the figures from the report showing that at that price it was an advantageous purchase. We have, moreover, the verified pleadings of the defendants that the report, in their opinion, "represented the true condition and affairs of said bank, and that said report represented the true value of the assets and liabilities of said bank." It is inconceivable that, having solemnly sworn that this was what the report expressed, they should have made any other representation than that to the plaintiff.

[4] Besides, that was precisely what the law called upon that report to express. Thomas v. Taylor, 224 U. S. 75, 32 Sup. Ct. 403, 56 L. Ed. 673; Yates v. Jones National Bank, 206 U. S. 158, 27 Sup. Ct. 638, 51 L.

Ed. 1002. In Thomas v. Taylor it is said by the Supreme Court of the United States that the statute requires the report "to contain a true statement of the condition of the bank."

[5] In Smalley v. McGraw, 148 Mich. 384, 111 N. W. 1093, 112 N. W. 915, it is said:

> "If the directors signing the report knew, * * * prior to signing such report, that the item 'Loans and discounts' contained paper worth much less than its face value, which would materially affect the value of its stock, they would be individually liable to a purchaser of the stock who relied in good faith upon such report as stating the true financial condition of the bank."

And it matters not whether such a report was put forth for the express purpose of inducing any particular individual to purchase. Prewitt v. Trimble, 92 Ky. 176, 17 S. W. 356, 36 Am. St. Rep. 586; Heard v. Pictorial Press, 182 Mass. 530, 65 N. E. 901; Hubbard v. Weare, 79 Iowa, 678, 44 N. W. 915; Morgan v. Skiddy, supra; Thomas v. Taylor, supra.

[6] If the statements and representations which were made were, in fact, false, it is immaterial that the defendants believed that the bank would eventually come through its difficulties, or that the defendants did not intend to cheat the plaintiff. Alvarez v. Brannan, 7 Cal. 504, 68 Am. Dec. 274; Bank of Woodland v. Hiatt, 58 Cal. 234; Groppengiesser v. Lake, 103 Cal. 37, 36 Pac. 1036; Spreckels v. Gorrill, 152 Cal. 387, 92 Pac. 1011; Hubbard v. Weare, supra. The reliance which plaintiff was entitled to place upon this report then, was a reliance that the report was a true statement of the bank's financial condition, and not, as the court found, a mere transcript of the condition of the bank as shown by the bank's books. Moreover, deceit may be negative as well as affirmative. It may consist in suppression of that which it is one's duty to declare, as well as by the declaration of that which is false. If it be so that defendants did not believe, and could not have believed, that the report contained a true statement of the bank's financial condition, their failure to disclose this fact to the plaintiff in handing him the report forms the foundation of an action for deceit under the principle above stated. Civ. Code, § 1710.

[7] And, finally, upon this proposition it may not be disputed that plaintiff was justified in relying upon the respondents' representations, either actual or as contained in the report, without further independent investigation of his own. Bank of Woodland v. Hiatt, supra; Spreckels v. Gorrill, supra; Senter v. Senter, 70 Cal. 621, 11 Pac. 782; Dow v. Swain, 125 Cal. 683, 58 Pac. 271; Merrill v. Florida Land & Imp. Co., 60 Fed. 17, 8 C. C. A. 444; Union Nat. Bank v. Hunt, 76 Mo. 439.

On behalf of respondents it is urged that they were men of standing and integrity; that their good faith is shown by the fact that they invested their own money in an effort to save this failing institution; that the general findings of the court upon the question of false representation are entirely in their favor; that the $15,000 which they voted to themselves were later, upon suggestion of the bank's attorney, restored to the bank; and, finally, that in all respects they acted with a good faith which is abundantly shown. This statement is made in order that it may not be supposed that the counter contentions of respondents have been overlooked. The fact nevertheless remains that, because of the incompleteness, the evasiveness, and contradictoriness of some of the material findings, as well as the absence of other material findings, the judgment cannot be supported and must be reversed.

It is ordered accordingly.

AALWYN v. COBE et al. (S. F. 6371.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 3, 1914. Rehearing Denied July 31, 1914.)

1. Pleading (§ 205*)—Complaint—Allegations as to Adverse Claim—Demurrer.

A compalint stating a cause of action to quiet title to real property is not rendered subject to general demurrer by the addition of allegations of the details of the asserted fraud, whereby defendants' purported title was created, without clearly stating the facts constituting the fraud.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 491–493, 495, 496, 498–510; Dec. Dig. § 205.*]

2. Pleading (§ 207*) — Complaint — Sufficiency—Demurrer.

In an action to quiet title, a complaint alleging fraudulent acts by the defendants, in connection with the title to the real estate involved, held subject to special demurrer, as it could not be told whether plaintiff was asserting a title under defendants or superior to their asserted rights, or how their fraudulent acts could cloud her title.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 511, 512; Dec. Dig. § 207.*]

3. Quieting Title (§ 34*)—Complaint—Sufficiency.

In an action to quiet title, a complaint alleging fraudulent acts respecting the title to the real estate involved on the part of defendants held not to sufficiently allege fraud as against a defendant, to whom another defendant was charged with making a deed for a fraudulent purpose.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Quieting Title, Cent. Dig. §§ 69, 71, 72, 76, 77; Dec. Dig. § 34.*]

4. Pleading (§ 225*) — Demurrer — Amendment—Necessity of Asking Leave.

Where a special demurrer was sustained for uncertainty by an order making no mention of an amendment, and plaintiff for 17 days made no application for leave to amend, the court did not err in granting a motion to deny leave to amend and in dismissing the action.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 575–583; Dec. Dig. § 225.*]

5. PLEADING (§ 225*)—DEMURRER—RIGHT TO AMEND.

It is error for a court arbitrarily to refuse permission to amend a complaint after sustaining a demurrer on the special ground of uncertainty or the like.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 575–583; Dec. Dig. § 225.*]

6. PLEADING (§ 225*) — DEMURRER — ORDER —LEAVE TO AMEND.

While the court, if requested, should grant leave to amend after sustaining a special demurrer for uncertainty, the order sustaining the demurrer need not say anything about leave to amend.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 575–583; Dec. Dig. § 225.*]

7. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 907*) — BURDEN OF SHOWING ERROR.

On appeal from the judgment of dismissal after the sustaining of a special demurrer, error would not be presumed, where the record failed to show that leave to amend was asked and refused.

8. PLEADING (§ 223*)—DEMURRER — FAILURE TO AMEND—EFFECT.

A plaintiff who has declined to amend his complaint, after a demurrer sustained, which is both general and special, must stand upon his pleading, as against both grounds of demurrer.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; G. H. Buck, Judge.

Action by Alice Aalwyn against Ira M. Cobe, S. W. Swabey, and others. From a judgment dismissing the action as to the defendants named, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Arthur Crane, of San Francisco, for appellant. P. L. Benjamin, of Oakland, for respondents.

MELVIN, J. Plaintiff sued to quiet title to land claimed by her, and in addition to the ordinary allegations in a complaint under section 738 et seq., Code of Civil Procedure, set up certain alleged fraudulent acts whereby her title was clouded. She asked for general equitable relief in addition to the usual prayer that her title to the property should be quieted. Defendants Ira M. Cobe and S. W. Swabey demurred generally and specially. On August 12, 1912, the demurrer was sustained, and on August 29, 1912, defendants Cobe and Swabey moved that plaintiff should be denied leave to amend her complaint and for judgment dismissing said action as to them. Their motion was granted in an order reciting that the matter came on regularly, and judgment was accordingly entered dismissing the action as to these two defendants. The appeal is from this judgment.

Appellant insists that the general demurrer could not have been properly sustained because two paragraphs of the complaint state a cause of action to quiet title, and the other parts of the pleading, however imperfect they might be, would not destroy it as against a general attack for want of facts.

It is true that in the fifth and sixth paragraphs of the complaint there is a statement of a cause of action to quiet title. These paragraphs are as follows:

"(5) That plaintiff is the owner and entitled to the possession of all that real property described as follows, to wit: All of the property referred to, described, and designated as 'Burlingame Terrace,' as recorded June 4, 1906, at page 25 on Map Book 4, county recorder's office of San Mateo county, except lot 5 and 25, block 9; lot 5, block 7; lot 24, block 1; lot 5, block 11, lots 1 and 2, block 3; and lot 4, block 12—there being sundry lots and area of and in said Burlingame Terrace in addition to the exceptions hereinabove numbered.

"(6) That said defendants claim and assert interests therein adverse to the plaintiff, and that the claims of said defendants are without any right whatever, and that said defendants have not, nor have any of them, any estate, right, title, or interest whatever in said land or premises or any part thereof."

[1] Respondents take the position that this is not an ordinary suit to quiet title, but that fraud is one of the constituent elements of the cause of action which the plaintiff endeavored to plead, and that, to support a cause of action which depends upon the proof of fraud, the facts constituting the fraud must be clearly stated. In this behalf such cases as Burris v. Adams, 96 Cal. 667, 31 Pac. 565, Estate of Yoell, 164 Cal. 546, 129 Pac. 999, Burris v. Kennedy, 108 Cal. 343, 41 Pac. 458, and McDonald v. McCoy, 121 Cal. 71, 53 Pac. 421, are cited. Whatever may have been the rule formerly, it is now settled that a cause of action to quiet title, pleaded in general form, is practically the same when to these general allegations are added the details of the asserted fraud whereby the defendant's purported title was created. Henry v. Phillips, 163 Cal. 137, 124 Pac. 837, Ann. Cas. 1914A, 39. The only difference between a general pleading and one containing added averments of fraud is that the first one stated the wrongful claim of defendants in general and the second in detailed terms. There being a general pleading sufficient in form of a cause of action to quiet title to real property, it follows that the general demurrer could not have been properly sustained. We must therefore examine the complaint in view of the special demurrer.

[2, 3] The earlier part of the complaint was devoted to allegations that A. F. Martel was the principal stockholder and the controlling power in the Market Street Bank and the Market Street Securities Company, and that he used his position to appropriate the funds and property of the said corporations, particularly of the bank, to hinder, delay, and defraud the depositors, creditors, and clients of the bank, of whom plaintiff was one. Following the assertion of title quoted above are allegations that Martel, in pursuance of a conspiracy and for his own convenience, "by and with the consent, connivance, and acquiescence of the defendants" (including these demurrants), caused his "general utility man," one Charles W. Smith, fraudulently to execute a certificate and declaration that he was the owner of said property, and that said Smith did "thereon obtain the recording of a map of said real estate, in Map Book 4, at page 25, of the public records of and in the county recorder's office of said San Mateo county, Cal., wherein and whereby the formula and name 'Burlingame Terrace' was substituted for the previous surveys, metes, and bounds, adopted and used to describe and identify, and so accurately describing and identifying, said property, said change and alteration of the description being calculated and intended to confuse and mislead, and so did confuse and mislead, the identification of said property generally, except upon close scrutiny and investigation, which it was assumed by said Martel and his said co-conspirators would not be, and actually was not, made by the persons hereinafter referred to, the patrons of said Market Street Bank, and the general public whom it was intended to confuse and mislead, and likewise give and impress, respectively, with an exaggerated idea and estimate of its importance and value as Burlingame Terrace over and above its estimate and value under the description previously used and in vogue; that said Burlingame Terrace has no existence, except such, if any, as it obtained from the aforesaid false and fraudulent records of said map." It is further averred that, in pursuance of a plan to permit Martel to convert the funds of the bank to his own use, he arranged to "borrow" $4,000 from the bank by giving as security therefor a false claim against the real property, in form a deed, which was to be held by the bank without recordation and exhibited to any person or visiting authority as Martel might desire, either as a mortgage or a conveyance absolute, to impress the person seeing it with the solvency of the institution. According to the pleading, when the deed had served its purpose it was to be returned to Martel without being recorded, and the sum "borrowed" was to be credited by the bank with repayment by personal services falsely and fraudulently assumed to have been rendered by him to the bank. Pursuant to the scheme (it is averred), Martel caused Smith to execute a deed, sufficient in form, to another "utility man," Sylvester, and cause said deed to be recorded. He likewise caused Sylvester to execute a deed of said property, good in form, to the bank, but "no reference was therein made to said Burlingame Terrace, or said map thereof; said real property being described by metes and bounds as and according to survey and description previously thereto in use." This scheme was carried out to the extent of the "borrowing" or converting to his own use by Martel of $4,000 from the bank and the false crediting of its repayment in supposed services. All this, it is stated in the complaint, was done by the connivance and acquiescence of the bank. According to the further allegations, Martel concealed from the directors of the Market Street Securities Company all knowledge of the execution of the deed by Sylvester to the Market Street Bank, but in pursuance of his fraudulent scheme arranged, by mutual agreement between the two corporations, that Sylvester should be employed by the securities company, and as such employé hold a claim to said real property "as and for, and in its, said Market Street Securities Company's, interest and behalf, in order to assert a false claim to said real property." The twelfth paragraph of the complaint follows, in which it is alleged:

> "That said scheme, plan, and arrangement was thereon consummated, effected, and carried out by said Martel with the consent, connivance, and acquiescence of said Market Street Securities Company, and said Market Street Bank, and said other defendants."

It is impossible to tell whether the above-quoted paragraph refers to Martel's scheme to keep the directors of the securities company ignorant of Sylvester's deed to the bank, the arrangement by which Sylvester was employed or the plan whereby the false claim was to be asserted. Next come averments that subsequently the Market Street Bank, with full knowledge of the "falsity of said claims," and "for the purpose of creating an apparent legal title in itself to said land adverse to said beneficiaries and in violation of its agreement to keep said deed unrecorded and unpublished, caused said secret deed to itself, so as aforesaid executed by said defendant Sylvester prior thereto and theretofore, by agreement aforesaid, kept unpublished, and unrecorded, to be recorded." What "beneficiaries" are meant does not appear. It is then alleged that, after such recordation, the defendant bank executed and recorded a deed of the property to Ira M. Cobe "for the purposes aforesaid," describing the property only by reference to the map and as said Burlingame Terrace. The expression "purposes aforesaid" is exceedingly vague in view of the various sinister purposes and schemes sought to be explained in the preceding part of the complaint. Next follows a statement, on information and belief, that Cobe is a "mythical person and a fictitious creation of said Martel, and one or more of said other defendants, and an alias for said Martel." But there is the further assertion that, if he have any existence, he "cannot now, and could not at any time heretofore, be found in the state of California, but is wholly a mythical and fictitious character, assumed and represented by said Martel, or some one procured and employed by him to that end, whenever he or any of said defendants deemed or deems it necessary that he should materialize; that is to say, receive or execute any written instrument in furtherance of said conspiracy to make false claims to said property." There is a statement that Swabey and Cobe, if the latter exists at all, cannot be found in the state; that both are insolvent, and no judgment at law could be enforced against them, or either of them. The next paragraph announces that the acts of the defendants, particularly the recording of the deed executed by Sylvester, are a cloud on plaintiff's title and a fraud thereon, making said title uncertain and "in a great measure valueless." The paragraph before the prayer of the complaint contains the statement that plaintiff cannot, from lack of knowledge, be more certain and specific "as to the particulars of the claims of said defendants, and each of them, to the said property, or as to the dates, times, or further particulars of said claims, but alleges that all the said particulars are, and were at all the said times, within the knowledge of the said defendants."

The complaint is characterized in the special demurrer as uncertain, ambiguous, and unintelligible because it does not appear therefrom with sufficient certainty or at all that Martel, Sylvester, Smith, or the Market Street Bank ever had any title to the property or that the alleged title of plaintiff was derived through these persons, and because it does not appear how the purported acts of fraud denounced in the complaint operated to make plaintiff's title uncertain or in a great measure valueless.

It is asserted by counsel for respondents that plaintiff is attempting to set up a title formerly in Martel and is complaining of various alleged fraudulent acts of Martel and the other defendants tending to cloud her title; but it is very plain, says counsel, that the complaint fails to show that any of the defendants ever had any title to the property. Appellant's counsel insists that the theory of the pleading was that plaintiff had a title superior to any asserted rights of any of the defendants and antedating the false claim set up under the fabricated map of Burlingame Terrace. But the complaint utterly fails to set up any such antecedent title in the plaintiff. It contains the averment that Burlingame Terrace has no existence except such as is derived from the filing of "false and fraudulent records" of a certain map. Yet the paragraph in which is pleaded plaintiff's claim of title describes the property as certain lots designated as being in "Burlingame Terrace as recorded June 4, 1906, at page 225 on Map Book 4, county recorder's office of San Mateo county," the very map which is stigmatized in another part of the complaint as a fraudulent document. So far as these allegations are concerned, it is impossible to determine whether or not plaintiff is endeavoring to establish her title upon that falsely asserted by Smith or not. The fact that the terminology of the map filed by Smith is used lends force to the respondent's contention that here was an attempt to set up a title formerly in one of the defendants. In the view most liberal to the pleading, it is uncertain whether or not plaintiff seeks to found her title upon that of some one of the defendants. For this uncertainty and the ambiguity of the allegations, the special demurrer was properly sustained.

For like reason it is impossible to tell how the alleged fraudulent acts of the defendants could cloud any title which plaintiff might have acquired. Having pleaded that Burlingame Terrace was created in perjury and iniquity, and that she owns property therein, she has failed to allege how her title became lawful and how any fraudulent acts of the defendants or any of them (even granting that fraud is sufficiently pleaded) could impeach her title.

But there was no sufficient allegation of fraud. Cobe is variously described as a fictitious person, an alias and a mythical character assumed by Martel or some one procured by him whenever it was deemed necessary to receive or execute instruments. That such a bodiless, intangible, ethereal, mythical, imaginary, ghostly, and altogether impalpable person may not be convicted of fraudulent practices needs no argument. The commission of a fraud is a personal accomplishment, however airy and unsubstantial the means employed. There is no allegation that Cobe exists except the statement that, if he exists, he is absent from the state and cannot be found. Even if this should be deemed enough to give him a personality, there are no facts sufficiently alleged to connect him with the fraud. He was merely the grantee in the deed from the bank, and, while that conveyance was made "for the purposes aforesaid," there is nothing to show that he knew of those purposes (whatever they were), even if we assume that they were fraudulent purposes. In the seventh paragraph of the complaint both Swabey and Cobe are mentioned. It is there alleged that, "as a part of said scheme" (which had just been referred to as one "hereinafter complained of"), Martel, "with the consent, connivance, and acquiescence of the defendants" (naming Cobe and Swabey among them), caused Smith to make and record the false certificate and map by which Burlingame Terrace was given an apparent existence. It nowhere appears how they connived, in what manner they acquiesced, or how their connivance and acquiescence contributed to the injury to plaintiff's title, nor is there any statement of facts showing their participation in that part of Martel's alleged fraudulent practices following the recordation of the map.

[4] Plaintiff insists that she should have been allowed to amend her complaint, citing in that behalf Schaake v. Eagle Automatic Can Co., 135 Cal. 480, 63 Pac. 1025, 67 Pac. 759, and Bryan v. Abbott, 131 Cal. 223, 63 Pac. 363. Neither authority sustains her position. In the latter case this court merely held that the lower court erred in sustaining the demurrer. In the Schaake Case it was held that whereas the complaint stated a cause of action, and the demurrer was sustained on the ground of uncertainty, the court abused its discretion in forbidding amendment whereby the uncertainty might be cured. In the case at bar the special demurrer was properly sustained, and the court's order made no mention of amendment. Seventeen days later, upon motion which regularly came on to be heard, the order denying leave to amend was made. Plaintiff did not appear by attorney or otherwise at the hearing of this motion, and, as there is no showing that any request was ever made for leave to amend, she may not now complain of the court's action.

[5-7] While it is undoubtedly error for a court arbitrarily to refuse permission to a pleader to amend a complaint after sustaining a demurrer on the special ground of uncertainty or the like, it is not necessary, in making the order sustaining the demurrer, to say anything about leave to amend. Smith v. Taylor, 82 Cal. 541, 23 Pac. 217. Error will not be presumed where the record fails to show that leave to amend was asked and refused. Robertson v. Burrell, 110 Cal. 579, 42 Pac. 1086; Williamson v. Joyce, 140 Cal. 671, 74 Pac. 290; Prince v. Lamb, 128 Cal. 130, 60 Pac. 689; Durrell v. Dooner, 119 Cal. 413, 51 Pac. 628; Buckley v. Howe, 86 Cal. 605, 25 Pac. 132; Campbell v. Freeman, 99 Cal. 549, 34 Pac. 113.

[8] A plaintiff who has declined to amend his complaint, after a demurrer sustained, which is both general and special, must stand upon his pleading as against both grounds of demurrer. Martinovich v. Wooley, 128 Cal. 144, 60 Pac. 760.

The judgment is affirmed.

COOLEY v. MILLER & LUX et al.

(S. F. 6298.)

1. ATTORNEY AND CLIENT (§ 144*)—CONTRACT OF ATTORNEY—CONSTRUCTION.

Where nonresident devisees employed an attorney to represent them in the administration of the estate for a certain interest in their respective shares, and while a settlement of the estate was pending an agreement was executed canceling the first and providing that, in consideration of the termination of the prior agreement and the attorney's services past and future, the devisees granted to the attorney an undivided interest in all the property of the testator equal to 3 per cent. of the interest therein devised to such devisees under the will, the later agreement constituted a present grant of such specific interest to the attorney, and was not a mortgage, though containing a further provision that, whatever compensation should be allowed to him by the superior court as attorney for "absent heirs" should be first applied to reimburse him for all outlays made in rendering services to the grantors, and the balance should be credited to them in final settlement.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Attorney and Client, Cent. Dig. §§ 332, 333; Dec. Dig. § 144.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1099*)—DECISION ON PRIOR APPEAL—CONSTRUCTION ON WRITTEN INSTRUMENT.

A decision on a prior appeal, construing a written instrument which is the basis of the rights of the parties, is the law of the case on a subsequent appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4370-4379; Dec. Dig. § 1099.*]

3. ATTORNEY AND CLIENT (§ 144*)—CONTRACTS FOR SERVICES—INTEREST IN DEVISE—PAYMENTS—ADVANCES.

An attorney having been appointed to represent certain German devisees under testator's will as "absent heirs," they conveyed to him, in consideration of services past and future 3 per cent. of their interest in the estate, the conveyance providing that whatever compensation should be allowed to him as attorney for "absent heirs" by the court of probate should be first applied to reimburse him for all outlays made for their benefit and the balance should be credited to them in final settlement. Held, that allowances, so made to him as attorney for absent heirs, were to be construed as advances on his share of the amount distributable to the various devisees for whom he was attorney in severalty, and as between them as a payment on the percentage conveyed to him, so that on final settlement he should receive property of a value or money in a sum equal with the amount already received to the full amount payable to him under the contract.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Attorney and Client, Cent. Dig. §§ 332, 333; Dec. Dig. § 144.*]

4. PARTITION (§ 87*)—ADVANCEMENT TO COTENANT—EFFECT—ACCOUNTING.

The legal effect of advancement to a tenant in common of a part of his estate is to give him that part in severalty prior to the general partition, when he will be required to account for the property so received, and be entitled to the proportion of the remainder to which he is equitably entitled.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partition, Cent. Dig. § 253; Dec. Dig. § 87.*]

5. ATTORNEY AND CLIENT (§ 144*)—CONTRACT FOR COMPENSATION—CONSTRUCTION.

Where a contract, employing an attorney to represent certain German devisees, granted to him an undivided 3 per cent. of the shares of such devisees in the estate, and provided that whatever compensation should be allowed by the court of probate to the attorney as attorney for "absent heirs" should be first applied to reimburse him for all outlays made by him for their benefit and the balance should be credited to them in final settlement, it was not contemplated that there should be an adjustment of interest between the attorney and the German devisees according to value of the property at each time when he received installments of allowance, but the contract should be interpreted as requiring a single adjustment when his services and outlays and payments terminated.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Attorney and Client, Cent. Dig. §§ 332, 333; Dec. Dig. § 144.*]

6. ATTORNEY AND CLIENT (§ 166*)—CONTRACT OF EMPLOYMENT — VALIDITY — BURDEN OF PROOF—UNDUE INFLUENCE.

The rule that the burden is on one, claiming under a contract obtained by him while acting as an attorney, to show that it was obtained fairly, and to overcome the presumption that it was obtained by undue influence, etc., does not apply to an original contract, employing an attorney to render services to the client.

7. ATTORNEY AND CLIENT (§ 124*)—VALIDITY—TRANSACTION BETWEEN ATTORNEY AND CLIENT—PRESUMPTIONS—UNDUE INFLUENCE.

Civ. Code, § 2219, provides that every person who voluntarily assumes a relation of personal confidence with another is deemed a trustee, not only as to the person who reposes such confidence, but also as to all affairs concerning which he thus acquires information. And section 2235 declares that all transactions between a trustee and his beneficiary during the existence of a trust are presumed to be entered into by the latter without sufficient consideration and under undue influence. Held, that where after an attorney had been employed to represent certain German devisees in the settlement of an estate, they conveyed 3 per cent. of their interest to him in consideration of his services, such conveyance would be presumed to have been obtained by undue influence and without sufficient consideration, so that the burden was on one claiming under it to establish the contrary.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Attorney and Client, Cent. Dig. § 246; Dec. Dig. § 124.*]

8. JUDGMENT (§ 715*) — CONSTRUCTION — ESTATES—FINAL SETTLEMENT.

An attorney having been employed to represent foreign devisees in the settlement of an estate, they conveyed to him 3 per cent. of their interest, with a proviso that whatever compensation should be allowed by the court of probate to him as attorney for "absent heirs" should be first applied to reimburse him for outlays and the balance should be credited to the grantors on final settlement. The devisees subsequently filed a petition in the probate proceeding for revocation of an order allowing the attorney $12,000 a year as attorney for "absent heirs," alleging as a ground therefor that the attorney had already received under the order more than his 3 per cent. of their shares under the grant. The court thereupon revoked the order, but declared that all questions as to compensation of the attorney were reserved until the final account of the administration had been settled and the estate was ready for distribution. Held, that the reservation was only effective to show that the order was revoked without deciding the issue as to the attorney's compensation or the amount he had received under the grant, and hence the order of denial did not constitute an adjudication that the attorney was not entitled to receive any additional portion of the shares of the German devisees.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. §§ 1244–1246; Dec. Dig. § 715.*]

9. PARTNERSHIP (§ 245*)—DECEASED PARTNER—INTEREST IN FIRM—INVENTORY.

The interest of a deceased partner in the property of a firm of which he was a member at death must be inventoried by his administrator or executor, and must be appraised as a single item without reference to how extensive and varied is the character of the firm's property, and for the purposes of administration it must be deemed personalty, and may be sold as such, as provided by Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1445, 1524.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partnership, Cent. Dig. §§ 514–518; Dec. Dig. § 245.*]

10. PARTNERSHIP (§ 244*)—DEATH OF PARTNER—DISSOLUTION OF FIRM—LIQUIDATION.

The death of a partner dissolves the firm, after which the surviving partners are authorized by Civ. Code, §§ 2450, 2459, to act for the firm in the liquidation of its affairs, and by section 2461, the liquidating partner may dispose of the partnership property.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partnership, Cent. Dig. § 511; Dec. Dig. § 244.*]

11. PARTNERSHIP (§ 245*) — DISSOLUTION — PARTNERSHIP PROPERTY—RIGHT TO POSSESSION.

On the dissolution of a firm by the death of a partner neither the executor nor the heirs of the deceased partner have any right of possession of the partnership property, until the surviving partner has liquidated the firm's affairs and has delivered over the interest of the deceased partner to his executor or administrator, who has only a right to enforce settlement and payment of his decedent's interest remaining after settlement of the firm's affairs, the surviving partner being the only legal representative of the partnership, at least as between him and the heirs and legal representatives of the deceased partner.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partnership, Cent. Dig. §§ 514–518; Dec. Dig. § 245.*]

12. PARTNERSHIP (§ 245*)—PROPERTY—INTEREST OF DECEASED PARTNER.

Where certain German devisees of a deceased partner conveyed 3 per cent. of their shares in the estate to their attorney for his services, such attorney thereby acquired no unconditional right to a specific interest in any particular property belonging to the firm, the interest of all of the beneficiaries being subject to liquidation and sale by the surviving partner in the settlement of the partnership affairs and then to administration of the estate of the deceased partner and distribution by the executors.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partnership, Cent. Dig. §§ 514–518; Dec. Dig. § 245.*]

13. ATTORNEY AND CLIENT (§ 144*)—COMPENSATION — CONTRACTS — CONSTRUCTION — DISTRIBUTION DECREE—CONCLUSIVENESS.

Where certain German devisees conveyed 3 per cent. of their interest in decedent's estate to their attorney for services and a portion of the property distributable to them consisted of an interest in the property of a firm of which decedent had been a member, which property during liquidation by the surviving partner was conveyed to a corporation in exchange for shares, and the shares distributed to the heirs, they represented the attorney in the distribution, and the decree divested him of all right to the property of decedent's estate, including any interest in the lands of the firm, except such as had been distributed to his grantors, limiting his claim, if any, to the shares of stock so received by his grantors in lieu of their undivided interest in the property.

SHAW, J. [1, 2] The claim of the plaintiff to an interest in the land is founded upon an instrument, designated in the record as Exhibit B, purporting to be a conveyance from certain legatees and devisees under the will of Charles Lux, who died on March 15, 1887. These persons are referred to in the record as the "German heirs." They were represented in California by one of their number, Henry Lux, who was the attorney in fact for the others and as such executed for them the instrument in question. It was executed on July 14, 1890, to James H. Campbell, who was at that time the attorney for the German heirs, employed by them to represent them in the matter of the administration, settlement, and distribution of the estate of Charles Lux, and to protect their interests therein in the meantime whenever it became necessary to do so. Cooley afterwards obtained the Campbell interest. The same instrument was under consideration on a former appeal in this case, the opinion being reported in volume 156 Cal. at page 510, 105 Pac. 981. In that decision we held that the instrument was not a mortgage to secure Campbell in the ultimate payment of compensation for his services under said employment, but was a present grant of an interest in their part of the estate, and intended as payment for said services. This decision has now become the law of the case, and is conclusive upon us at this time. Upon further consideration we are satisfied that it is the correct interpretation of the instrument. The document is set forth in the previous opinion, but for convenience we here give the parts thereof which are important to our present consideration, substituting "German heirs" for "parties of the first part" and "Campbell" for "party of the second part":

> "The German heirs for and in consideration of the reconveyance and agreement hereinafter contained, and of the services already rendered and to be rendered by Campbell, hereby grant to said Campbell an undivided interest in all the property of the estate of Charles Lux, deceased, equal to three-hundredths (3-100) of the shares and interests therein devised to the German heirs by said decedent in his last will and testament. * * *
> "It is agreed that whatever compensation shall be allowed to Campbell by the superior court of the county of San Mateo, as attorney for absent heirs, shall be first applied to reimburse him for all outlays made by him in rendering his services to the German heirs, and the balance shall be credited to the German heirs in final settlement.
> "It is fully understood that the compensation herein provided for shall embrace all services rendered in the administration of said estate by Campbell up to and including the final distribution thereof."

The former appeal was from a judgment given before the great San Francisco fire of April, 1906, by which the records in the case were destroyed. It was presented in this court upon a somewhat meager restored record. After the reversal, amended answers were filed in the superior court, and there was a new trial, which resulted in the judgment in favor of plaintiff. This is the subject of the present appeal.

[3] In the opinion on the former appeal in discussing the meaning and effect of this instrument, after stating that these allowances to an attorney for absent heirs, though paid to Campbell, were in the nature of a partial distribution to such heirs, and that the instrument evinced an intention to provide for an adjustment of the matter between them and Campbell, we said that the instrument in effect provided that he should deduct his outlays and "adjust the balance on final settlement of the estate, by considering the same as an advancement solely upon the three-hundredths going to him, or, as between him and them, 'crediting' the same to them." This, as we intended it to be understood, meant that upon the final distribution of the Lux estate, the sums paid to Campbell should be taken as having been advanced to the German heirs, and that, as between him and the German heirs, it should be considered as a part of his 3 per cent. given to him in advance, so that on the final settlement between them he should receive property of a value, or money in a sum, which, with the sums already received, would make up his full 3 per cent. of their shares of the estate. In a petition by the defendants for a rehearing, it was urged that the passage quoted might be understood as saying that the instrument constituted a grant to Campbell of an interest in the specific property of the estate, in kind; whereas they claimed the correct interpretation was that it was a grant of an amount equal in value to 3 per cent. of their shares of the estate, real and personal, a grant which would be satisfied by the receipt of either property or money, or both, equal in value to 3 per cent. of the value of their shares. In response to this, in denying a rehearing, the court said that if upon a new trial—

> "it should be claimed that the aforesaid instrument should be construed as a grant of a share in value only of the estate, and not of the specific property, and that Campbell has already received all or a large part, of it, thus satisfying the grant or a due proportion of it or if it should be asserted that he has elected to take the whole, or part of it, in money, by retaining such sums as he may have received under the orders of the court as attorney for absent heirs, and that the plaintiff is thereby estopped from now claiming any of it, or the ratable part of it, as a share of the real estate, there is nothing in the opinion rendered which precludes such inquiries."

Upon the trial from which the present appeal is taken, evidence of the circumstances leading up to and attending the execution of this instrument was introduced, and the defendants again claimed that it should be interpreted as above indicated. The court below held the contrary. It made the following findings of fact with reference thereto:

> "It was not intended to be, nor was it in fact, an agreement that Campbell should receive, as his compensation for his services as the attorney for the German heirs, money and property equal in value to three hundredths of the shares of the German heirs in the said estate, and that he might receive the same from time to time during the administration of the said estate, in cash, through the instrumentality of the probate court. The true intent and meaning of Exhibit B, the conduct of Campbell with reference thereto, and the circumstances of its execution, were as in these findings set out."

Elsewhere the findings state that the instrument was "an absolute present grant of an undivided three hundredths of the interest of the German heirs in the estate of Charles Lux, deceased, and derived under his will," and that "plaintiff, as the successor in interest of the said James H. Campbell, holds the title in fee to an undivided three-hundredths of the shares derived by the German heirs from the estate of Lux."

As to the money, the findings are that the allowances paid to Campbell by the estate of Lux as attorney for absent heirs amounted to $88,500, and that:

"The payments of said $88,500 were not in any sense payments on account of any amount to which Campbell was entitled under said instrument, as claimed by defendants. The only bearing such payments had on the rights of the parties to that instrument was that, on a final settlement between Campbell and the German heirs, the aggregate amount of such payments should be credited to said German heirs, and made a charge against said three-hundredths interest in said property and estate of Charles Lux, deceased, granted and conveyed to said Campbell by said instrument."

The judgment declared that Campbell was the owner in fee of the three-hundredths interest in the lands, and appointed a referee to take an account of the rents and profits of the lands received by the German heirs from and after the decree of distribution of the Lux estate on June 28, 1900, and of the shares of the German heirs received by them of the rents and profits of the estate of Lux on account of their shares therein from and after his death in 1887. It provided further that if, upon the report of the referee, it appeared that the share of Campbell in such rents and profits, that is to say, three hundredths thereof, equaled or exceeded $88,500, then the same should offset the $88,500 previously allowed to and received by him as aforesaid, and three-hundredths interest in the land should be set off to plaintiff, free from any charge against it for the reimbursement to the German heirs of the $88,500, or any part thereof; but that if Campbell's share of such rents and profits did not equal $88,500, the difference between that sum and his share of such rents and profits should be charged as a lien upon the lands finally allotted to plaintiff in the partition.

The circumstances leading up to and attending the execution of this instrument, as disclosed by the findings and the uncontradicted evidence now before us, are as follows: The estate of Lux, at his death, except the Buri Buri ranch and a comparatively small amount of personal property, consisted of the interest of Lux in a very large estate, real and personal, which in his lifetime belonged to Lux and Henry Miller, as partners under the firm name, Miller & Lux. It was a farming partnership carrying on the business of farming the land owned by the firm and bought by it for that purpose. Prior to the death of Lux the partners had executed an agreement, which Lux incorporated in his will and confirmed thereby. This agreement provided that upon the death of either partner, the survivor should continue the business for the joint use of himself and the estate of the deceased partner, for such period of time as he deemed necessary to settle up the business without detriment or sacrifice, not exceeding seven years, during which time he was to have sole control and management, with power to sell and dispose of the same at his discretion, paying to the executor out of the rents and profits an allowance for the family of the decedent, and such part only of the remainder of the decedent's share thereof as he deemed not to be required for the business, of which Miller was to be the sole judge. Miller had control under this agreement, and 2 years and 4 months had passed after the death of Lux. The interest of Lux in the partnership was one-half. The will of Lux gave to the German heirs an undivided one-half of the residue of his estate after paying debts, expenses of administration, and about $250,000 in legacies. The widow, Miranda W. Lux, took the other half as community property. In January, 1888, the German heirs had employed Campbell as their attorney to advise and act for them throughout the administration of the estate until final settlement, bring and defend all actions relating thereto in their interest, and secure as speedy a settlement as possible. A written agreement, dated January 6, 1888, had been executed to that effect, and the German heirs had therein agreed to assign and grant to him, as compensation for such services, three-hundredths of their shares of the estate, upon the condition that if he failed to perform his covenants therein, the contract might be rescinded, and thereupon he should cease to be their attorney, the agreement should be annulled and he should release to them all benefits to be derived by him from its terms. He had been, in April, 1889, appointed by the court as attorney for the German heirs, they being designated in the order as "absent heirs," but he had received no compensation as such, nor any compensation for services under his employment. The estate had been appraised in May, 1890, the Buri Buri ranch being valued at $145,615, the interest of the estate in the Miller & Lux lands at $1,542,610, and the interest of the estate in the Miller & Lux personal property at $920,072.94. The Buri Buri ranch had been distributed on July 10, 1890. It was not community property, and it was devised to the widow for her life, with remainder in fee to Philip

Lux. An agreement for its sale had been made, which was executed soon afterward. On July 10, 1890, Campbell had filed an application to the probate court for an allowance out of the estate to him as attorney for absent heirs, and it had been set for hearing on July 18, 1890. Under these circumstances, on July 14, 1890, the instrument Exhibit B was executed.

[4] We perceive nothing in the extrinsic facts to change the meaning and effect of the instrument as we understood it and stated it to be upon the former appeal. On the contrary, they strengthen and confirm the interpretation then given. The grant was of an undivided interest "equal to" 3 per cent. of their shares. It was made to Campbell as compensation for his services. No debt from the German heirs to him on account of the services thereafter existed, otherwise it would have been a mere mortgage, carrying no title. Upon the former appeal this point was decided, and it has become the law of the case. It was a transfer by tenants in common of an interest in an estate consisting of real and personal property. If at any time Campbell received from the others, in severalty, upon his share, more than his proportion of any one parcel, or more than his proportion of one kind of property, the result would necessarily be that his proportional interest in what remained would be reduced correspondingly. For illustration, if four persons own $1,000 acres of land in common, uniform in value, three having each three-tenths thereof, equivalent to 300 acres each, and the fourth one-tenth, equivalent to 100 acres, and the fourth receives from the others a conveyance of 50 acres in severalty as part of his interest, he would not then be entitled, in partition, to one-tenth of the remaining 950 acres, but only to one-nineteenth thereof, that is, the proportion of 50 to 950. And if the acreage was not of equal value, a partition of the remainder could not be made without a valuation of the land so as to give each his proportion in value of what remained. So if the common estate consisted of real and personal property and before a general partition one tenant received from the others a sum of money in severalty, to be applied upon his share, the same result follows; his interest in the remainder would be reduced accordingly, and a valuation of the remainder would be required in order to make an equitable partition. There is nothing in the instrument of July 14, 1890, or in that of January 6, 1888, which can be treated as providing that the sums paid as allowances to Campbell under the order were to be considered as loans by the German heirs to Campbell, to be charged against his interest and made a lien thereon, upon a final partition, if not repaid by him previously. The intent that they were to be advancements on his share of their interests is clear. The legal effect of an advancement to a tenant in common of a part of his estate is to give him that part in severalty prior to a general partition, with the result that upon a general partition he must account for the property so received, and can have only the proportion of the remainder to which he is equitably entitled.

This is what was actually accomplished by the allowances in question. They were chargeable solely to the shares devised and bequeathed to the German heirs, of which he had an undivided 3 per cent. They constituted a receipt by him of that much of said shares in severalty, being to that extent a division thereof, and they reduced the amount to which he would be ultimately entitled, and correspondingly reduced his interest in what remained undivided of said shares. This would be the legal effect of the transaction even if the provision that they should be credited to the German heirs in final settlement had not been inserted in the grant. It follows that the findings are contrary to the legal effect of the evidence, and the judgment is erroneous. A valuation must be made of the interests of the German heirs as compared to that which Campbell received. After deducting his outlays, if any, the balance must be charged to him as property of the common estate received by him in severalty from the other tenants in common and as a satisfaction, pro tanto, of his interest. If such balance is equal to three-hundredths of the value of the shares of the German heirs, he will have received his full share, and will have no interest in the property in question. If it is less than a three-hundredths, it will not extinguish his interest entirely, but will reduce it proportionally. It will then be only such proportion of the property as the difference between such balance and the three-hundredths to which he was originally entitled bears to the value of the property remaining at that time.

[5] The question arises whether, if this principle is rigidly applied, this adjustment of interest according to value should not be repeated every time Campbell received an installment of the allowance. If this were so, it would make the adjustment at this late date well-nigh impossible, and extremely difficult at all times. We do not think such repetition was contemplated or intended. It is provided that his outlays must be first deducted. This implies that a completion of his contract to perform the services was to precede the adjustment, since until that time it could not be determined what his outlays were. The most reasonable interpretation of the instrument upon this point is that the valuation should be made at the time that his services, his outlays, and the payments under the order ceased. The adjustment could then be made and his precise remaining proportion determined. The valuation of the shares of the German heirs should be made as of the year 1896, and his remaining interest determined as of that date. If any remained to him, it would of course increase or decrease in value with the rise or fall of the value of the property subsequently, but his relative proportion would remain the same.

As the result of these conclusions, the judgment and order appealed from must be reversed. Some points which will be material upon a new trial are fully presented by the record now before us, and we deem it advisable to consider and decide them.

[6, 7] In the ruling upon the motion for a nonsuit the court below held that the burden was upon the defendants to prove that the instrument designated Exhibit B was obtained by undue influence. In this we think the court erred. Campbell's employment as attorney for the German heirs was made by the agreement of January 6, 1888, designated as Exhibit A. He did not become their attorney until that instrument was executed. The relation did not exist until the negotiations were closed and the execution completed. Hence the rules regarding the presumption of undue influence against a person who obtains an advantage from another while occupying the relation of trustee toward him do not apply to that instrument. See Cooley v. Miller, 156 Cal. 524, 105 Pac. 981. But after its execution the confidential relation existed and any transaction thereafter between him and the German heirs, touching the subject-matter of his employment, whereby he gained any advantage from them, would be attended by the presumption against him that it was entered into by them "without sufficient consideration, and under undue influence." Civ. Code, §§ 2219, 2235. The instrument of July 14, 1890, under which the plaintiff claims, constituted such a transaction. The instrument of January 6, 1888, was subject to the condition expressed therein that if Campbell should violate any of his covenants therein, or neglect to perform his duties or obligations thereunder, the grant might be immediately rescinded, and that thereupon he should cease to be their attorney, and should release to them all benefits to accrue to him therefrom. The instrument of July 14, 1890, expressly annulled that of 1888, and did not contain any condition subsequent whatever. It was an outright grant. The elimination of this condition by the second contract was a distinct advantage to Campbell, and the presumption of undue influence attached to the transaction. The burden was therefore upon him to prove that the instrument was not procured by undue influence, in order to establish its validity. The fact that he obtained this advantage from them while the confidential relation existed was shown by the plaintiff's evidence in the opening of his case, but no evidence to overcome the presumption of undue influence was given by him. For this reason the court erred in denying the motion for a nonsuit.

[8] It is claimed that the proceedings upon the settlement of the final account and distribution of the estate of Charles Lux constituted an adjudication to the effect that Campbell was not entitled to receive any additional portion of the shares of the German heirs. We do not think this contention is supported by the record. It is true that in August, 1896, the German heirs, in their petition to the court to revoke the order allowing Campbell $12,000 a year as attorney for absent heirs, alleged as a ground therefor that he had already received, under said order, more than his 3 per cent. of their shares under the grant, and that the court thereupon revoked the order. But the court had power to revoke the order without determining that Campbell had received his full share, and the order of revocation shows that this question was not decided. It declared that:

> "All questions as to compensation of the said J. H. Campbell, as attorney for any heirs of said estate are hereby reserved until, the final accounts of the administration of said estate having been settled, the said estate is ready for distribution; and that said questions be then considered and determined by the court in connection with the final distribution of said estate."

This does not purport to continue the trial of the issues upon the petition for revocation to the time of final settlement, as contended by defendants. That petition was granted and that proceeding terminated. The purpose of the reservation was to show that the order was revoked without deciding the issue as to Campbell's compensation or the amount he had received under the grant, to inform the parties that all questions of compensation would be left for determination at final settlement. If at the final settlement, which took place more than three years afterwards, the German heirs had again presented the issue that his grant was satisfied, either by bringing forward the former petition or by a new one, the denial of further allowances to Campbell might have been an adjudication of the question. But the matter was not so presented. The only issue decided upon the settlement of the final account was that presented by Campbell's exception thereto. This exception was placed upon the narrow ground that the order of allowance was not revoked until January, 1897, and that at that time there had accrued to him under the order the sum of $19,500, which still remained unpaid. His claim was based entirely upon the order and upon the theory that he had a vested right to the compensation fixed until the order was revoked. So far as appears from the record before us, no claim to a share of the estate, nor any claim by the German heirs that his share thereunder had been received, was presented at that time. In fact, he had previously, on November 8, 1896, conveyed whatever interest then remained in him thereunder to John H. Campbell, who, on July 2, 1897, had conveyed and assigned the same to Cooley. No mention of these deeds appears in the record of the proceedings in the Lux estate. The adjudication was nothing more than a decision that Campbell was not entitled to any money in virtue of the order. In the Supreme Court, the decision was based upon the ground that the order was void because Campbell had been employed by the German heirs before the order was made, and hence that they were not "absent heirs" for whom the court was authorized by the statute to appoint an attorney and fix his compensation, and that in such case the attorney's fee must be determined by the contract existing between them, and upon the further ground that, conceding the power to appoint, the court had no power to fix the compensation in advance, but only after knowledge of the facts, and in such amount as it should then deem reasonable.

The remaining question of importance arises upon the claim of the appellants that the interest of Campbell's successor in a considerable portion of the land in controversy was extinguished, or transferred to certain shares of stock in the corporation known as Miller & Lux. It will be necessary to state the facts at some length.

Miller did not settle the partnership affairs as promptly as the interested parties wished. On June 10, 1892, he having resigned as executor, the other executors of Lux began an action against Miller, entitled Potter v. Miller, alleging therein that he had failed and neglected to liquidate the partnership assets and affairs and give over to the executors the money and property due to the estate of Lux, and praying that he be compelled to account and settle the same, and that, if necessary to that end, a partition be made of the land belonging to the firm, and that one-half thereof be allotted to the executors as representatives of Charles Lux, deceased. Afterwards the German heirs were made parties to the action. Campbell, however, was not made a party. In that action a partial partition was made and judgment allotting the lands partitioned was made on December 24, 1896. These are referred to in the record herein as "divided lands." They constitute a part of the lands in which plaintiff claims a three-hundredths interest. By that judgment the Lux share of the so-called "divided lands" was set off in severalty to the executors of the estate of Lux, and certain other lands not here involved were set off to Henry Miller, and it was ordered that the suit should be continued as to other matters. It is conceded by the appellants that the plaintiff is not estopped by this partition, nor by the decree of distribution in the estate of Lux, from claiming an interest in their shares of the Lux "divided lands," under and by virtue of the grant from the German heirs.

Thereafter on April 8, 1897, while said suit was still pending as to the matters not adjudicated, the said Henry Miller, as surviving partner aforesaid, the said executors of the estate of Charles Lux, the German heirs and the successors of the deceased widow, executed an agreement providing for the liquidation and settlement of the partnership affairs of Miller & Lux and for the final settlement and distribution of the estate of Lux. This agreement recited that an account of Miller, the surviving partner, had been settled between Miller and the other interested parties, showing that there was owing to Miller from the firm the sum of $125,027.75, that it had been and then was impracticable to sell any considerable part of the very large landed property of the firm or to liquidate and close the partnership business, and that it would require an extended period to do so, because of the great amount of property and complicated nature of the business, and that all parties were desirous of effecting a settlement and dividing the property between the parties according to their interests. It provided to that end that a corporation should be formed under the name of "Miller & Lux," for the purpose of acquiring the firm property, disposing of the same as speedily as should be advantageous, and dividing the proceeds among the stockholders, and, in the meantime, to conduct the business formerly carried on by the said partnership; that it should have a capital stock of $12,000,000, divided into 120,000 shares of the par value of $100 each; that all stock thereof should be issued as fully paid up and unassessable; that Miller should be the president and general manager of said corporation; that when said corporation should be formed the parties should consent to a final judgment in said suit of Potter v. Miller, ratifying and approving the settlement of the firm accounts, confirming all the acts of Miller as surviving partner, and declaring and specifying the respective interests of Miller and the estate of Lux in the partnership assets; and that thereupon Miller, as such surviving partner and as an individual, and all the other parties, should convey and assign to said corporation all of their and each of their right, title, and interest in and to all the property, assets, and effects of said firm, excepting the said "divided lands" partitioned out as aforesaid. It further declared that the consideration of said conveyances should be the capital stock of said corporation in certain stated proportions and $1,750,000 in money, one-half the stock to be issued to Henry Miller, one-fourth to the German heirs, and one-fourth to the successors of the deceased widow of Lux, the money to be paid by said corporation in the same proportions to the same persons, but in 10 annual installments aggregating $175,000 each. It also provided that a decree of final distribution should be procured in the matter of the estate of Lux, distributing to said corporation all the property so to be conveyed to it by said parties, and that the agreement itself should be subject to the approval of the court, both in Potter v. Miller and in the Estate of Lux.

In pursuance of said agreement said corporation, Miller & Lux, was formed, and on June 4, 1897, Miller, as surviving partner and individually, conveyed to it all the property and assets of said firm, except the "divided lands," and the other parties also conveyed their interests therein to said corporation. Thereafter, on July 22, 1897, in the suit of Potter v. Miller, a supplemental complaint was filed, setting up said agreement and the proceedings and conveyances under it. On August 1, 1898, in said action, judgment was given confirming all the acts of Miller as surviving partner and the account as settled by said agreement, and declaring that the conveyance made by Miller on June 4, 1897, to said corporation, of all the property and assets of said firm, be ratified, approved, and confirmed.

The petition for distribution in the estate of Charles Lux, deceased, which was filed on June 13, 1900, set forth the execution and terms of the agreement of April 8, 1897, aforesaid, the conveyances made in pursuance thereof, and the confirmation thereof in Potter v. Miller, and alleged that the executors of Lux, in pursuance of said agreement and judgment, had received one-half of the capital stock of the Miller & Lux corporation in exchange for the property so conveyed, as provided in the agreement, and that the residuary legatees and devisees under the will of Lux were entitled to distribution of said stock in proportion to their interests in the property of Lux under the will. Upon this petition and after legal notice thereof, the court, on July 3, 1890, made and entered a final decree of distribution of said estate. This decree expressly ratified, approved, and confirmed all conveyances of real property made by Miller as surviving partner prior to June 6, 1897. This included the deed of June 4, 1897, conveying the lands of the firm to said corporation. It then distributed to said corporation the lands conveyed to it in pursuance of the settlement agreement and to the German heirs the shares of stock in the corporation allotted to them by the agreement, that is, one-fourth of said shares, each being given a number of shares equal to his interest in the residue of the Lux estate. The lands so distributed to said corporation are a part of the lands of which the plaintiff now seeks partition under the grant to him of July 14, 1890.

[9-11] The interest of a deceased partner in the property of a firm of which he was a member at the time of his death must be inventoried by his administrator or executor, and must be appraised as a single item, no matter how extensive and varied in character the firm property may be, and for the purposes of administration it is deemed a part of the personal estate and may be sold as such. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1445, 1524; Woerner on Adm. §§ 124, 126. Death dissolves a partnership, and thereafter the surviving partners are authorized to act in the liquidation of its affairs. Civ. Code, §§ 2450, 2459. Such surviving partner so acting in liquidation may "dispose of the partnership property." Civ. Code, § 2461. The agreement incorporated into Lux's will also gave Miller this power. Neither the executor nor the heirs have any right of possession of the partnership property until the surviving partner has proceeded to its liquidation and has delivered it over to them. The executor or administrator has only the right to demand and enforce settlement and payment and delivery over of such part thereof as may remain after final settlement by the surviving partner of the partnership affairs. The surviving partner is the only legal representative of the partnership, at least as between him and the heirs and legal representatives of the deceased member. Smith v. Walker, 38 Cal. 392, 99 Am. Dec. 415; Allen v. Hill, 16 Cal. 119; Robertson v. Burrell, 110 Cal. 568, 42 Pac. 1086.

> "The surviving partner has the right to continue in possession of the partnership, and to settle its business, but the interest of the decedent in the partnership must be included in the inventory, and be appraised as other property. The surviving partner must settle the affairs of the partnership without delay, and account with the executor or administrator, and pay over such balances as may from time to time be payable to him, in right of the decedent." Code Civ. Proc. § 1585.

[12] It will be seen from the foregoing statement of the law that the interest of the German heirs, at the time of the grant to Campbell, was subject to a double process before it could come into their possession: First, the liquidation and settlement of the partnership affairs by the surviving partner; second, the administration of the estate of Lux and the distribution thereof by the executors of his estate, after the partnership affairs were settled. Campbell obtained no greater estate or better right than that of his grantors. He, no more than they, had the unconditional right to a specific interest in any particular parcel of the firm property, and his interest therein, as theirs, was subject to disposal thereof by the surviving partner for the purpose of liquidation.

[13] Upon the former appeal, we held that the decree of distribution did not preclude the plaintiff, as Campbell's successor, from claiming a three-hundredths interest in the property thereby distributed to the German heirs. The decree was not entirely without effect upon the plaintiff, however. It was a proceeding quasi in rem, of which he had due notice. The German heirs, in effect, represented him in the distribution, and he is bound thereby so far as they are bound, he being their grantee, if he had any interest at all. It follows that his claim was thereby divested as to all the property of the Lux estate, including its interest in the Miller & Lux lands, except that which was distributed to them. By that decree, as we have seen, they received no interest in the lands distributed to the Miller & Lux corporation, but, instead thereof, received shares of the stock of said corporation. This disposition is binding upon the plaintiff, and it divested him of any interest he might have had in said lands, and limits his claim, if any, to the shares of stock so received by the German heirs in lieu of their undivided interest in said lands. The decree is the equivalent of a partition, and, as no appeal was taken therefrom, it is now conclusive and binding upon the German heirs and upon all persons claiming under them. William Hill Co. v. Lawler, 116 Cal. 364, 48 Pac. 323; Cooley v. Miller & Lux, 156 Cal. 519, 105 Pac. 981; McKenzie v. Budd, 125 Cal. 602, 58 Pac. 199; Cunha v. Hughes, 122 Cal. 112, 54 Pac. 535, 68 Am. St. Rep. 27; Matter of Trescony, 119 Cal. 570, 51 Pac. 951; Martinovich v. Marsicano, 137 Cal. 359, 70 Pac. 459.

To the suggestion that the lands were distributed to the Miller & Lux corporation as grantee of the German heirs, and that therefore it was substituted to their place with respect to plaintiff's claim upon their shares, and that therefore the corporation stands seized of these lands as for his use, to the extent of his interest, there are, at least, two sufficient answers. In the first place, as above shown, Miller, as surviving partner and in settlement of the partnership affairs, had conveyed these lands to that corporation, in consideration of the stock and money to be issued and paid by it to the parties interested in the firm assets. This was a disposition which he had power to make as surviving partner, and it was binding on the estate of Lux and all persons claiming interests in said estate, including the plaintiff. The heirs and devisees of a deceased partner are as much bound by the disposition of the firm property by the surviving partner in settlement of the firm affairs as they are by the distribution of the decedent's property by the probate court in the proceeding for administration. It was expressly held in Robertson v. Burrell, supra, that the heirs at law or devisees of a deceased partner have no right to sue the surviving partner to compel a settlement of the partnership affairs, that such settlement is not to be made with them, but with the executor or administrator of the deceased partner, and that such executor or administrator alone may demand and sue for such settlement. The settlement here in question was made between the surviving partner and the executors of Lux and, upon the authority of the case just cited, it was conclusive upon the heirs and devisees of the estate of Lux. The title of the corporation, prior to distribution, was therefore received from Miller as surviving partner, and not from the German heirs. Their conveyances added nothing to this title, and imposed no burden or trust thereon in favor of the plaintiff. They were doubtless given merely to forestall questions as to the title. In the second place, the corporation was manifestly acting in good faith and, in reliance upon these agreements and decrees as a final settlement of the partnership affairs and of the estate, it has issued the stock and paid the money as agreed upon. The plaintiff, as grantee of the German heirs, had the right either to present his claim and ask distribution directly to himself of his interest or the equivalent thereof in severalty, or to make no appearance, abide by the result, and be thereby afterward limited to a claim solely upon the property distributed to his grantees. He was constructively a party to the proceeding for distribution, and he is charged with notice of that which the record thereof would have disclosed to him, including the fact that the corporation was receiving this land as a distribution upon final settlement of the estate and of the partnership, and was issuing its stock and paying this money in consideration thereof. Having allowed the matter to proceed and the stock and money to be issued and paid, with full knowledge of the facts, he is now estopped to claim an interest in any property except that which was distributed to the German heirs. He cannot claim an interest in the lands conveyed by Miller to the corporation and distributed to it by the final decree of distribution in the Lux estate. The court erred in declaring that he had an interest in these lands.

The judgment and order are reversed.

PRICE v. NORTHERN ELECTRIC RY. CO.

(Sac. 1975.)

1. Master and Servant (§ 107*)—Liability for Injuries—Unsafe Place to Work.

Where a carpenter, employed to assist in rebuilding a railroad trestle across a river, had been trimming piles at some distance from trestle bents, and had nothing to do with the building of such bents until ordered by the foreman to assist in placing a cap on a bent, and then in removing the staging, and had been working there only about 15 minutes when injured by the bent falling on him when the staging was removed, because it was not otherwise braced, the rule that an employer is under no duty to furnish a safe place to work where the employé is engaged in work that in itself constantly changes the character or safety of the place had no application, since, so far as he was concerned, the place had already been created before he was set to work there.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 199–202, 212, 254, 255; Dec. Dig. § 107.*]

2. Master and Servant (§ 235*)—Liability for Injuries—Contributory Negligence.

Such carpenter, in the absence of actual knowledge to the contrary, or circumstances under which he would be held required to have such knowledge, had a right to assume that the bent had been so braced that it would not fall when the scaffolding was removed, and could not be held negligent as a matter of law in failing to observe the absence of bracing, however obvious that fact might have been had he made an examination.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 710–722; Dec. Dig. § 235.*]

3. WITNESSES (§ 248*)—EXAMINATION—RESPONSIVENESS OF ANSWERS.

In an action for personal injuries, plaintiff was asked if he was suffering from the injury when he went to work for third parties, and answered that his capital was his labor, and he had a family to support, and had to work whether he suffered or not. Held, that the answer should have been stricken out on motion as not responsive to the question, which called for an affirmative or negative answer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. §§ 861–863; Dec. Dig. § 248.*]

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1047*)—HARMLESS ERROR—RULINGS ON EVIDENCE.

The denial of a motion to strike out such answer did not require the reversal of a judgment for plaintiff, where the facts stated in the answer appeared, inferentially at least, by the other testimony of the witness.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4132, 4133, 4146–4152; Dec. Dig. § 1047.*]

5. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1047*)—HARMLESS ERROR—RULINGS ON EVIDENCE.

In an employé's action for injuries sustained while assisting in the construction of a trestle by a trestle bent falling on him, the error, if any, in striking out the testimony of a witness that, to a man of any experience in the construction of trestles, the fact that a trestle was not braced in any way would be a sign that it was unsafe, that this would be discernible and appreciable to any man of experience the moment he went to the trestle to work, and that the fact that a piece of trestle was not in any way braced was open to the inspection of the eye, and its dangerous character was not a hidden one, where no objection was made to the questions asked the witness, was without prejudice, where the answers were substantially the same as the inferences that would be drawn by the jury from the facts in reference to the construction of the trestle bent previously detailed by the witness.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4132, 4133, 4146–4152; Dec. Dig. § 1047.*]

6. MASTER AND SERVANT (§§ 273, 274*)—ACTIONS FOR INJURIES—EVIDENCE.

In an employé's action for injuries, plaintiff's testimony that the foreman's orders were all in a hurry-up style, that it was a rush all the time, and that: "You can guess the language and, most of the time it was language, forcible language. He did not pick the language"—was admissible on the questions of assumption of risk and contributory negligence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 936–949; Dec. Dig. §§ 273, 274.*]

7. EVIDENCE (§ 471*)—CONCLUSIONS OF WITNESS—ADMISSIBILITY.

Such testimony was admissible over defendant's objection that it was an opinion and conclusion of the witness, as the subject-matter was such that the witness was entitled to give his conclusions.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 2149–2185; Dec. Dig. § 471.*]

8. TRIAL (§ 29*)—COMMENTS ON EVIDENCE BY TRIAL JUDGE.

In an employé's action for injuries, plaintiff testified that the foreman's orders were all in a hurry-up style, that it was a rush all the time, and that "you can guess the language and, most of the time it was language, forcible language; he did not pick the language." Defendant moved to strike out the quoted testimony on the ground that it was given only for the purpose of creating a prejudice, to which the court replied that he did not look at it as given for the purpose of prejudicing defendant, and that "it was given to hurry the men along and cause them to work all the faster, and thereby giving them a less opportunity of seeing any danger." Held, that the language of the judge, though not happily chosen, did not invade the province of the jury to determine the credibility and good faith of the witness and the weight of his testimony, it being clear that he intended only to state his reasons why the testimony was admissible, especially where no exception or objection to the remark was made in the trial court; it being a matter the possible prejudicial effect of which would have been obviated by a proper instruction and admonition to the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 80–83, 508; Dec. Dig. § 29.*]

9. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1051*)—HARMLESS ERROR—RULINGS ON EVIDENCE.

In an employé's action for injuries caused by a trestle bent falling on him when a staging was removed, due to the absence of any bracing other than the staging, the admission of evidence that the witness would not consider the bent safe unless secured with bracings, even if improper, was not prejudicial, where it was apparently conceded by all of the witnesses that a bracing of some kind was essential, and the jury could not have found that the scaffolding could be safely removed unless the bent was first braced in some way.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4161–4170; Dec. Dig. § 1051.*]

10. DAMAGES (§ 216*)—PERSONAL INJURIES—INSTRUCTIONS.

In an action for personal injuries, an instruction to award plaintiff, if his power to earn money in the future had been impaired by the injury, such sums as would compensate him for such loss of power was proper.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Damages, Cent. Dig. §§ 548–555; Dec. Dig. § 216.*]

11. TRIAL (§ 260*)—INSTRUCTIONS COVERED BY THOSE GIVEN.

Instructions which, so far as proper and necessary, were covered by other instructions were properly refused.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 651–659; Dec. Dig. § 260.*]

12. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1004*)—REVIEW—AMOUNT OF RECOVERY.

A verdict will not be disturbed on appeal as excessive, unless the damages are so excessive that the award can be sustained on no other theory than that it was the result of passion or prejudice.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3944–3947; Dec. Dig. § 1004.*]

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Butte County; John C. Gray, Judge.

Action by W. G. Price against the Northern Electric Railway Company. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Charles W. Slack, of San Francisco, A. M. Seymour, of Sacramento, W. H. Carlin, of Marysville, and A. F. Jones, of Oroville, for appellant. L. F. Eggers, of Chico, and H. D. Gregory, of Oroville, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an action for damages for personal injuries. Plaintiff had judgment, and defendant appealed to this court from such judgment and from an order denying its motion for a new trial.

The appeal was transferred by this court to the District Court of Appeal of the Third District for hearing and determination, and subsequently submitted therein for decision. Owing to a difference of opinion among the members of that court, the appeal was retransferred to this court with the opinions in writing of the justices of that court. In what follows we are using to a great extent the opinion prepared by Mr. Justice Burnett upon matters as to which there was no disagreement between him and his associates.

Following the verdict of a jury, judgment was awarded plaintiff for the sum of $2,500 as damages for personal injuries. The view that we must take of the facts reveals the following situation: Plaintiff was a carpenter, and, during the month of January, 1909, he was employed by defendant to assist in rebuilding its trestle and approach across the Yuba river, just south of Marysville. Immediately prior to the accident he was at work on a car fixing piles for the driver, that is, trimming the ends of piles so that rings could be driven on them in order that the pile driver would not split the piling. This car upon which he was at work was on the approach of the railroad crossing Yuba river and was the third car behind the pile driver, the pile driver being at the end of the bridge toward Sacramento. While he was thus engaged, the defendant railway company had a gang of men at work building and erecting trestle bents on the south side of the Yuba river. This trestle was composed of bents made of a large mud sill at the bottom, one upright post extending from the center of the mud sill perpendicularly and on each side a batter post. On top of these three posts was placed in horizontal position, at quite a distance above the mud sill, the cap, which was composed of a large, heavy piece of timber. These bents were some 15 or 16 feet apart, and on top of the caps were placed what was called the stringers, upon which were to be placed the cross-ties, and on these the rails. The last bent at the edge of the water, south of the river, had been erected and was in place, excepting that the cap had not been placed in position on top of the posts. A temporary scaffolding had been erected on the south end of this bent, composed partly of two long pieces of timber some 16 or 18 feet in length, and being in size 4 inches by 6 inches. One of these was laid parallel with the line of the railroad on each side of the bent, and they were some 8 or 10 feet apart. The ends of these 4 by 6 pieces rested on a short post 10 or 12 inches high. These two pieces held the scaffold, and they leaned against the batter posts. Upon these 4 by 6 pieces were placed railroad cross-ties built up to form a platform for the purpose of raising the cap from the ground and placing it in its proper place on top of the posts. This cap was very heavy, and it took 8 or 10 men to lift it in place on top of the posts. No bracing other than the scaffolding or staging was placed on said bent to secure it or to prevent it from falling. This bent was 12 feet high. With the bent in this condition, not having been braced except in so far as it was braced by the scaffolding or staging, the plaintiff, Price, was ordered by the foreman of the work to leave the car where he had been working and go to this bent, some 200 yards away, to assist in raising the heavy cap from the ground onto the platform, and from there placing it in its proper place on top of the posts. Plaintiff had nothing to do with the building of this trestle bent, upon which he was to assist in placing the cap, nor with the construction of any of the trestle bents which had been built at that place. The trestle, which had been built from the south up to the edge of the water, as aforesaid, was some 200 yards in length. This had all been built while plaintiff was engaged at other work. When plaintiff arrived at the said bent, as testified by him, "When I got there, there was the staging or platform fixed around the bent that had no cap. It stuck up there in the air. He [referring to Brewster, the foreman] ordered us to go up there. He told us to go up and put that cap on, 'This work is moving damn slow.'" The cap was raised by the men and placed in position and nailed fast to the upright posts. After the cap was placed in position the foreman ordered plaintiff and the other men to throw the ties down, and he then said to plaintiff: "Price, get down there and help that staging away. This thing is moving damn slow." Plaintiff jumped down and stepped to this four by six and put his shoulder under it. He was assisted by a man by the name of Hudson, and one other man and had moved a few steps and was right under the bent with his back toward it when some one called, "Look out." The bent fell and struck the timber they were carrying and knocked the plaintiff unconscious to the ground. As a result of the accident plaintiff was quite seriously injured. From the time he arrived at the bent which fell and injured him until the accident occurred was about 15 minutes. The plaintiff had never been at the place where the accident occurred before.

[1, 2] Appellant contends that the case for the plaintiff rests upon the proposition that it was the duty of the defendant to use reasonable care in furnishing a safe place for plaintiff to work, and that this duty was violated, but that this principle does not apply for the reason that such duty of an employer does not exist where the servants are engaged in a work that in itself constantly changes the character or safety of the place where they are working. In other words, it is the contention of appellant that plaintiff and his coworkers, by their own efforts, created the unsafe place, and therefore the general doctrine does not apply to the facts here.

In this connection much reliance is placed upon the case of Callan v. Bull, 113 Cal. 593, 45 Pac. 1017. We are of the opinion, however, that the principle of that case is not applicable here. In this case Price had nothing to do with the construction of the trestle bent, beyond helping, when called from his other work to do so, in putting on the cap. He was then told to assist in getting the staging away. So far as he was concerned, the place of work to which he was brought, and where he was directed by the foreman to assist, had already been created. He was working under the immediate supervision of a foreman, and was not erecting trestle bents or creating them on his own judgment and at his own risk. In the absence of actual knowledge to the contrary, or circumstances under which he would be held to be required to have such knowledge, he had the right to assume, when directed to assist in removing the scaffolding, that the bent had been so braced that it would not fall when the scaffolding was removed. And it cannot be held as matter of law, under the circumstances, that he was guilty of contributory negligence in not observing the absence of bracing, however obvious that fact might have been if he had made an examination to see what the actual condition was. It must be borne in mind that he was suddenly called to assist in this work when the bent was practically completed, and that he was simply obeying orders of the foreman to do this particular thing and that particular thing, and that the men were being urged to work quickly.

There is evidence that the defendant, through its foreman, had knowledge of the insecure and unsafe condition of the bent in question. The witness Hudson testified, referring to the foreman, that:

> "When he asked me to take down the platform and I realized that the bent needed something, I asked Mr. Brewster, the foreman, if he had a dog or any dogs to drive in to hold the bent and he said, 'To hell with the dogs; that is safe enough; go on and get that out of the way.' The dogs I speak of are sill stays or irons. You can drive it in on the bottom and then on the top, and it will hold it temporarily until you can get it properly stayed."

As said in the opinion prepared by Justice Burnett, we think the case is governed by the rule and principle announced in such cases as Elledge v. Railway Co., 100 Cal. 282, 34 Pac. 720, 852, 38 Am. St. Rep. 290, Hanley v. California, etc., Co., 127 Cal. 233, 59 Pac. 577, 47 L. R. A. 597, Powley v. Swensen, 146 Cal. 471, 80 Pac. 722, and Majors v. Connor, 162 Cal. 131, 121 Pac. 371.

It is believed that there was sufficient evidence to justify the jury in concluding that it was negligence on the part of defendant not to secure said bent; that the foreman had knowledge of its insecure condition; that the plaintiff was ignorant of it, and had a right to assume that it was a safe place in which to work; that he was not guilty of contributory negligence, under the circumstances, in undertaking the removal of the said timber, in obedience to the urgent command of the foreman, without making an examination to ascertain whether the bent was secure; and that a sufficient case was therefore made out, within the principles already announced, to justify the finding of the jury in favor of the plaintiff.

[3, 4] During the progress of the trial the plaintiff was asked by his counsel this question:

> "I will ask you to state if you were suffering from this injury when you went to work for the Diamond Match Company and Cotton Brothers?"

An objection was made by appellant on the ground that the question called for incompetent, immaterial, and irrelevant testimony, and also for his opinion and conclusion. The objection was overruled, and the witness answered:

> "Well, my capital is my labor and I have a family to support, and I have got to work whether I suffer or not."

Appellant moved to strike out the answer as not responsive to the question and for all of the reasons stated in the objection to the question. The motion was denied. It is clear that the question is one that called for an affirmative or negative answer and that the answer was not at all responsive, and the motion should have been granted. The facts, however, given in the answer otherwise appeared, at least inferentially, during the examination of the witness, and it can hardly be said that the error was of sufficient gravity to justify a reversal of the judgment.

[5] Witness Curran, called for plaintiff, was asked, on cross-examination, the following question:

> "Now, Mr. Curran, if you or any man of any experience in the construction of trestles should approach a section of the trestle which has been built, consisting of one or more bents, and they were not braced in any way, would that be a sign that it would be unsafe?"

And the answer was, "Yes, sir." And again:

> "Would that be discernible and appreciable to any man of any experience in that work the moment he went to the trestle to work? If they were not braced would he necessarily see that and notice that? A. Yes, sir."

And again:

> "So, then, the fact that a piece of trestle may have been constructed, or practically constructed, we will say, four or five, and not in any way braced, the dangerous character of that is not a hidden or secret one, is it? It is open to the inspection of the eye? A. Yes, sir; it would be, of course."

On redirect examination, in response to a question by plaintiff, the witness stated: "A man in the business of trestle building would observe whether or not a bent was braced," whereupon, plaintiff moved to "strike out the answers of the witness to Mr. Carlin's questions as to whether or not that it would be, where he answers that it would be observable," and the motion was granted. No objection was made to the questions asked upon cross-examination. Of course, a party cannot lie by and take a chance upon an answer being favorable, and, when disappointed, have a motion to strike out take the place of an objection. Besides, it will be observed that the questions on cross-examination related to a person of experience in trestle building, and the further interrogatory on redirect examination did not change, in that particular, the aspect and significance of the inquiry. It is believed, though, that if any error was committed in this behalf the error was without prejudice as the answers to the questions were substantially the same as the simple inferences that would be drawn by the jury from facts in reference to the construction of said contrivance previously detailed by the witness.

[6-8] Plaintiff was asked the question by his counsel: "To get down back to where the accident happened or injury occurred, I will ask you how, in what manner, were the orders being given down there, and the men of which you were one, being worked—just state it." Appellant objected on the ground that it is "incompetent, immaterial, and irrelevant and calling for his opinion and conclusion." The court said:

> "He calls for a fact—how were they given and who gave them. The objection will be overruled."

The witness answered as follows:

> "His orders were all in a hurry-up style. It was a rush from the time we went out until we left the works at noon or night; you can guess the language, and most of the time it was language, forcible language. He did not pick the language."

Counsel for appellant:

> "We will move to strike out the answer for all of the reasons stated in the objection to the question."

The motion was denied, and thereupon counsel for appellant said:

> "And in particular we will move to strike out that part of the answer in which he says, 'Most of the time, pretty forcible language.' That is what I understood him to say—'You can guess the language.' It can be given for one purpose only and that is to create a prejudice. The court said: 'No, sir; I don't look at it in that way, not for the purpose of prejudicing the defendant. It is given—it was given to hurry the men along and cause them to work all the faster and thereby giving them a less opportunity of seeing any danger if there was any danger in the vicinity. For that reason I will let the answer stand.'"

We are of the opinion that it was competent for the plaintiff to show that the work was being "rushed" by the foreman; that his orders along that line were given in such a manner as to impel the workmen to great speed, as bearing upon the action of the plaintiff in obeying implicitly, without examination as to the probable effect of such obedience. Such evidence was material upon the questions of assumption of risk and contributory negligence. The subject-matter of the inquiry was such that the witness was entitled to give his conclusions, for the same reasons that a witness may testify as to the appearance of another, whether rational, morose, etc. See People v. Manoogian, 141 Cal. 595 et seq., 75 Pac. 177, and cases there cited. As said in the case just cited:

> "Certain questions are of such a nature that it is impossible for a witness to convey to a jury an adequate conception of the ultimate fact except by announcing the result of his observation."

And in stating such result, the witness is really testifying to a fact.

It is claimed on this appeal that the statement of the court in denying the motion to strike out this testimony was an invasion of the exclusive province of the jury to determine the credibility and good faith of the witness and the weight of his testimony, and that the same was prejudicially erroneous. It is clear enough to us that the judge did not intend to go further than to state the reason why the testimony was, in his mind, admissible, and that he had no idea of expressing any opinion as to the credibility or good faith of the witness; and, while the words of the court were not happily chosen, we are not strongly impressed with the argument that the jury may have been in any way influenced to the detriment of the defendant thereby. Counsel for defendant apparently did not regard the remark as injurious at the time it was made, for they made no complaint. As is stated in the opinion prepared by Justice Hart in the District Court of Appeal, no exception or objection to the remark was made in the lower court, objection being made on this appeal for the first time. It seems clear that counsel should have called the attention of the trial judge to anything deemed prejudicial, thus giving him an opportunity to withdraw anything objectionable and state his real intent and meaning. Of course, the matter was of such a nature that all possible prejudicial effect would have been obviated by proper instruction and admonition to the jury.

[9-12] We have examined the record with reference to the other rulings complained of, and find nothing warranting a reversal. The testimony of Mr. Curran, to the effect that he would not consider the bent safe unless secured with bracing, if it was above five or six feet in height, even if improperly admitted, we consider to have been without prejudice. It appears to have been conceded by all the witnesses that bracing of some kind was essential, and the evidence was such that if the jury was satisfied that there was no bracing, it could not conclude otherwise than that the scaffolding could not be safely removed unless the bent was first braced in some way. Instruction No. 2, given at the request of plaintiff, reasonably construed, was not erroneous as applied to the facts of the case. So construed, we do not see how it could have been understood by the jury as imposing upon the defendant any liability due to failure to furnish plaintiff a safe place in which to work, unless it had been guilty of a want of reasonable care in the matter. Instruction 11, given at the request of plaintiff, was an attempt to state an abstract proposition of law which was not applicable under the facts of this case. We are satisfied, however, that defendant could not have been prejudiced thereby. Instruction 8 on the subject of damages, given at the request of plaintiff, appears to have been in a form approved by prior decisions. It did not authorize the jury to award any future damage except that if they believed from the evidence that the injury had impaired the plaintiff's power to earn money in the future, they might award him "such sums of money as will compensate him for such loss of power." Instructions 1 and 3 requested by defendant were covered, as far as proper and necessary, by other instructions. We are of the opinion that we cannot hold that a reversal should be had on the ground that the verdict was for an excessive amount. As has often been said, we can disturb a verdict on this ground only when it appears that the damages are so excessive that the award can be sustained on no other theory than that it was the result of passion or prejudice on the part of the jury.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

STOVEL v. NORTH LOS ANGELES DEVELOPMENT CO. (Civ. 1491.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. June 6, 1914.)

PLEADING (§ 336*)—AMENDED COMPLAINT—AFFIDAVIT OF SERVICE—SUFFICIENCY.

In view of Code Civ. Proc. § 410, providing that a copy of the complaint must be served and returned with an affidavit showing where such copy was served, and section 465 providing that copies of all pleadings subsequent to the complaint must be served on the adverse party or his attorney, an affidavit stating that plaintiff's attorney "served a copy of the amended complaint herein on * * * attorneys for the defendant herein by delivering to and leaving with said attorneys * * * a true copy thereof" was not insufficient because it stated that affiant served a copy of the amended complaint instead of saying that he served the amended complaint by delivering a true copy thereof.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 1017–1021, 1024; Dec. Dig. § 336.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County.

Action by H. Roy Stovel against the North Los Angeles Development Company, a corporation. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Hammack & Hammack, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Elliott L. Perkins, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. This is an appeal from a judgment entered by the clerk of the superior court after entry of defendant's default for failure to answer the amended complaint. The defendant had appeared by its attorneys, who filed a demurrer to the original complaint. With respect to the amended complaint, the affidavit of service is by plaintiff's attorney and states that he "served a copy of the amended complaint herein on Hammack & Hammack, attorneys for the defendant herein, by delivering to and leaving with said attorneys in the city of Los Angeles a true copy thereof."

This affidavit is sufficient, unless it is deficient in saying that the affiant served a copy of the amended complaint instead of saying that he served the amended complaint, by delivering the true copy thereof. The briefs do not refer us to any decisions bearing upon this question. We find that section 410, Code of Civil Procedure, says that:

> "A copy of the complaint must be served, with the summons, upon each of the defendants. When the summons is served, * * * it must be returned * * * with an affidavit * * * of its service, and of the service of a copy of the complaint, where such copy is served."

Under this wording of the statute there seems to be no doubt that an affidavit showing that the process server served "a copy of the complaint," etc., would be sufficient. No good reason appears for holding that the same form of statement may not be made in proving service of an amended complaint.

> "All pleadings subsequent to the complaint, must be filed with the clerk, and copies thereof served upon the adverse party or his attorney." Code Civ. Proc. § 465.

The judgment is affirmed.

TOMPKINS v. SUPERIOR COURT OF SAN BERNARDINO COUNTY. (Civ. 1588.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. June 1, 1914. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court July 30, 1914.)

1. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 159*)—APPEAL—UNDERTAKING—JURISDICTION.

The undertaking required by Code Civ. Proc. § 978, to perfect an appeal from a justice to the superior court not having been filed, the filing of a demurrer to the complaint in such court and the overruling thereof gave it no jurisdiction.

2. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 159*)—APPEAL—UNAUTHORIZED TRANSMISSION OF RECORD—SECOND APPEAL.

Though, notwithstanding appeal from a justice was not perfected by giving the undertaking required by Code Civ. Proc. § 978, the justice transmitted the record to the superior court, it is to be considered as still in the office of the justice, as regards the necessity of his again transmitting it, on another notice of appeal and an undertaking being giving.

Prohibition by Henry Tompkins against the Superior Court of San Bernardino County. Peremptory writ denied, and alternative writ dismissed.

A. Boyer, of San Bernardino, for petitioner. Allison & Dickson, of San Bernardino, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Prohibition. Upon application therefor, an alternative writ was issued herein, directed to the superior court of San Bernardino county, commanding it to appear and show cause why it should not be prohibited from proceeding with the trial of a certain cause pending therein, wherein the petitioner, as plaintiff, had, in the justice's court, obtained a judgment against one Charles C. Smithson, from which judgment said Smithson had appealed to said superior court.

In response to the writ a return was made, from which and the petition it appears that the judgment of the justice was rendered on March 28, 1914; that, on April 1st following, Smithson appealed therefrom to the superior court, but neglected to perfect the appeal by giving the undertaking required by section 978, Code of Civil Procedure. Notwithstanding such neglect, the justice duly certified and transmitted to the superior court the record in the cause. A demurrer to the complaint was on April 3d interposed by Smithson and by the court overruled on April 13th, and the case set for trial on May 15th. Thereafter, on April 15th, within the time allowed him for appealing in said cause, Smithson filed another notice of appeal and gave the required undertaking therein, whereupon the justice on May 11th transmitted to the superior court a copy of his docket, but did not send up the papers and pleadings in the case for the apparent reason that he had theretofore transmitted them at the time when defendant purported to appeal on April 1st. On May 4th, pursuant to notice, petitioner moved the court to dismiss the purported appeal had and taken on April 1st, upon the ground that no sufficient undertaking had been given, and likewise pursuant to notice at the same time moved to dismiss the appeal had and taken on April 15th, upon the ground that two appeals had been taken from the same judgment, and the further ground that said last appeal was unaccompanied by any record, papers, and pleadings, or any certified copy of the justice's docket from which the appeal could be identified. At the hearing of these motions the purported appeal of April 1st was withdrawn, and, as to the motion to dismiss the appeal of April 15th, the motion was denied without prejudice.

[1, 2] Clearly the first appeal was, and is conceded to be, a nullity by reason of the fact that no sufficient undertaking was filed as required by section 978, Code of Civil Procedure. Hence the transmission of the record to the clerk made at this time by the justice was unwarranted, as the same is deemed to be in the office of the justice. The court having no jurisdiction to entertain it, the overruling of the demurrer interposed could not give it jurisdiction. Estate of Brewer, 156 Cal. 89, 103 Pac. 486. Hence on April 15th the case stood as though no appeal had been attempted.

[3] The appeal had on April 15th was, in so far as concerned the steps required to be taken by Smithson as appellant, duly taken and perfected within the time allowed by law therefor. Section 977, Code of Civil Procedure, provides that the justice must transmit to the clerk of the superior court the record and papers therein designated, "and the justice or judge may be compelled by the superior court, by an order entered upon motion, to transmit such papers, and may be fined for neglect or refusal to transmit the same." It appears that, following the taking of this last appeal, the justice neglected to transmit to the clerk of the superior court the papers and record required by the provisions of this section. His omission so to do, however, cannot be attributed to appellant. For obvious reasons the court would be unable to try the case in the absence of the pleadings and record; but, since section 977, supra, makes provision for compelling the justice to perform his duty and file same with the clerk, we must assume that prior to the time when the court will try the case the record will be transmitted to the clerk. Otherwise, in the absence of any steps taken by appellant to compel the performance of duty on the part of the justice, the court might refuse to try the case, or dismiss the same. The court evidently made the order denying the motion without prejudice, so that, if the defect in the record was not cured at the time of the trial, petitioner might at that time renew his motion upon such ground. Being improperly transmitted before an appeal was taken, the record should be refiled as accompanying the appeal had and taken April 15th.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; William P. Lawlor, Judge.

Rose Marks was convicted of an attempt to commit pandering, and she appeals. Affirmed.

James R. Kelly and Herbert Choynski, both of San Francisco, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

KERRIGAN, J. The defendant was charged by information with procuring for one Camille Meining a place as an inmate of a house of prostitution, one of the offenses designated by section 1 of the act of February 8, 1911 (Stats. 1911, p. 9), as pandering. She was tried for such offense upon the theory that she aided and abetted one Samuel Grubb in its commission. The jury found her "guilty of the crime of an attempt to commit the crime of pandering." From the judgment of imprisonment in the state prison for a period of two years, she has appealed, as also from an order denying her motion for a new trial.

The points relied upon for a reversal of the judgment and order are: Errors of the trial court in the admission of evidence; that the evidence is not sufficient to support the verdict; and that there can be no such thing as an attempt to commit pandering of which the defendant was found guilty.

[1] On the first point it is sufficient to say that the specific evidence pointed out in appellant's brief, the admission of which is claimed to be error, was received without objection. The statement of appellant's counsel that "objection was made to the entire line of testimony dealing with statements made by Sam Grubb in Los Angeles and conversations had with him there, upon the ground that the same is incompetent, irrelevant, immaterial, hearsay," is not borne out by the record. This objection was made to the specific question: "What did he say, if anything, with respect to the business you were to go into with Rose Marks?" This question was permitted to be answered; and the answer, so far from being prejudicial to the defendant, tended rather to exculpate her from the offense charged. We hardly think counsel is serious in urging this contention, and that it should be classed with another statement in his brief to the effect that: "We also assign as error the admission of each and every part of the evidence introduced at the trial."

[2] The next contention of appellant is that the evidence is insufficient to support the judgment, or, as the matter is put by counsel, there is no evidence to support a judgment of conviction.

The evidence shows that Camille Meining, the prosecuting witness, a woman almost blind, was residing in a rooming house in Los Angeles, and there met one Samuel Grubb. They became friendly owing to little acts of kindness rendered by Grubb to her, necessitated by her defective vision. Desiring, for the benefit of her health and other reasons, to leave Los Angeles, and having been informed that the climate of San Francisco was more salubrious, she mentioned the matter to Grubb, who then told her that he had a friend in San Francisco and would write to her, suggesting that Camille Meining go and stay with her. He stated that this friend was the keeper of houses of prostitution, but had a nice room in a flat where she herself lived. As the matter was talked over, it developed that Camille was expecting to receive a sum of money, and expressed the desire to go into business with this friend. Grubb thereupon undertook to write to Rose Marks (the defendant and the friend in question) proposing the matter to her; and a few days afterwards came to Camille and said: "I got an answer from the old girl, and she tells me to send the girl at once." The prosecuting witness stated, when testifying to this matter, that Grubb "swept the telegram across my face and says, 'Here is your answer: "Send girl at once. Everything is O. K."'—and that the telegram was signed 'Rose Marks.'" The language of this telegram seems to have created some suspicion in her mind as to the precise nature of Grubb's communication to his San Francisco friend, and she then said to Grubb: "I would rather she write. I don't believe you wrote her so she understood exactly." Grubb then wrote a letter, to which he received an answer from Rose Marks; also a telegram, the latter reading, "Send party," and the letter urging haste. Camille then agreed to go to Rose Marks; accordingly she came to San Francisco, being met by her at the railroad depot, and escorted by her to a house of prostitution at 620 Jackson street. Arriving there, Rose Marks took off Camille's veil and coat, conducted her to a bedroom, set her suitcase and things on the bed, and said, "Now here, this will be your room." The house was crowded with male visitors, some of whom approached the prosecuting witness with the proposal that they engage in sexual intercourse, offering her money, all of which offers she declined, and requested to be taken from the house. There was testimony of other witnesses that No. 620 Jackson street was conducted by Rose Marks as a house of prostitution. The defendant offered herself as a witness, and, referring to Camille, said: "She told me she was staying in a hotel there (Los Angeles), and of course she did not exactly come out and tell me what she was doing, but I understood she was there just as well as anybody else; they make money in any hotel." When arrested she stated to the officer: "I received a letter from Mr. Grubb saying he had a girl, and asked me if I needed another in 620 Jackson street. I answered by letter and told him I did. After getting her I took her to 620 Jackson street that night." The defendant took the witness stand, and testified that she was acquainted with Grubb, had known him for 2½ years; had met him a number of times in her house of prostitution; that she had never asked him to interest himself in getting a partner for her, and did not know where he got the idea that she wanted one.

We think the evidence, of which the foregoing covers the salient points, justified the jury in bringing in its verdict of an attempt to commit the crime charged.

[3] Finally, the defendant contends that the verdict is invalid, for the reason that there is no such crime under our statutes as an attempt to commit pandering, and that, if there be such a crime, provision is made by law for its punishment as a substantive offense, and not as an attempt.

In support of this position defendant cites section 664 of the Penal Code. That section reads as follows:

> "Every person who attempts to commit any crime, but fails, or is prevented or intercepted in the perpetration thereof, is punishable, where no provision is made by law for the punishment of such attempts, as follows. * * *"

It will be observed that this section is not concerned with defining crimes or attempts to commit crimes, but merely with the punishment of attempts to commit them. The argument of counsel is that the defendant, not having, according to the verdict of the jury, succeeded in committing the crime charged, and the acts of which she was found guilty constituting, as he claims, a substantive crime punishable as such, no punishment can be meted out to her under the verdict of the jury, which designates her offense as an "attempt." It is pointed out that the statute defining pandering enumerates a series of a dozen or more acts any one of which may constitute the crime; and he asserts that it is impossible to fail in the attempt to commit one of those acts without succeeding in committing another of them; that consequently, if the jury returns a verdict of attempting to commit one of them, the defendant cannot be punished under such verdict because the acts performed by the defendant in the abortive attempt themselves constitute a substantive crime for which a punishment is specifically provided by law.

[4, 5] This contention of counsel rests upon two assumptions, with neither of which can we agree: First, that an act performed in the attempt to commit the crime of pandering in one of the methods described in the statute is exactly covered by another of such methods, and can be prosecuted and punished by charging such act alone; and, second, that even if an act done in an attempt to commit a given crime should incidentally elsewhere in the Penal Code be made itself a substantive offense, it cannot be punished as an attempt to commit the given crime.

We think that the language of section 664, "where no provision is made by law for the punishment of such attempts," applies exclusively, and must be confined to "attempts" designated by the statute as such, and does not refer generally to acts done in the attempt to commit one crime, and which, if done without relation to the offense, might be separately punished. For instance, in an attempt to commit burglary a door or window is fractured. Such damage to property might, separately considered, come within the definition of malicious mischief; but the offender convicted of an attempt to commit burglary where burglary was charged would not be heard to say that he could not be punished for such attempt because his fracture of the door or window was itself an offense punishable by law. And so in the present case, though the acts committed by the defendant might possibly bring her within another description of the offense of pandering, yet, being done in an attempt to commit the particular act charged in the information, she cannot object to having her offense punished as an attempt.

What we have said on this question disposes also of the defendant's objection to the court's charge to the jury on that subject.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John W. Shenk, Judge.

Action by Henry N. Vaughan against Fred H. Bixby and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

E. W. Freeman, of Los Angeles (A. D. Laughlin, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellants. W. H. Dehm and Constan Jensen, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Action to recover damages on account of negligence of defendants, resulting in the loss of certain horses placed in defendants' pasture. The case was tried before a jury, which rendered a verdict for plaintiff. Judgment followed, from which, and an order denying their motion for a new trial, defendants appeal.

It appears that defendants were the owners of some 5,000 acres of inclosed, mountainous land, cut by deep canyons and gulches, which they used in the business of receiving stock for pasture thereon for hire; that plaintiff and his assignor, about the 1st of May, 1912, delivered to defendants four horses to be pastured upon said lands. It is alleged that, by reason of defendants' negligence during the time when said horses were in their possession and being pastured, they died for want of water.

The chief assignment of error is insufficiency of evidence to justify the verdict.

[1] One who takes in horses to pasture, having charge and control of them, is termed an agister. Howard v. Throckmorton, 59 Cal. 79; Williams v. Miller, 6 Pac. 14. While he is not an insurer against injury to or loss of the stock intrusted to his keeping, he is bound to take reasonable care thereof, and injury or loss resulting from ordinary casualties that could have been averted by the exercise of such reasonable care constitutes negligence for which he is responsible. Williams v. Miller, supra; Rey v. Toney, 24 Mo. 600, 69 Am. Dec. 444; Halty v. Markel, 44 Ill. 225, 92 Am. Dec. 182. In this case reasonable care is that degree of care which it is presumed an ordinarily careful and prudent man would have exercised under the same circumstances with reference to his own stock.

[2] Unless it can be said the facts and circumstances established were such that reasonable men could reach but one conclusion therefrom, the question as to whether or not defendants exercised the required degree of car in looking after the welfare of the horses while in charge of them was a question for the determination of the jury. Even if there be no conflict in the evidence, nevertheless, if the inferences fairly deducible therefrom are such that different conclusions might rationally be drawn therefrom by men equally sensible and impartial, the conclusion reached by the jury should be deemed final and not disturbed on appeal for want of sufficient evidence to justify the verdict. Herbert v. Southern Pacific Co., 121 Cal. 227, 53 Pac. 651; Hoff v. Los Angeles Pacific Co., 158 Cal. 596, 112 Pac. 53.

Applying this rule to the evidence disclosed by the record, we are clearly of the opinion that the evidence fully justified the verdict reached by the jury.

[3] While not free from conflict, the evidence fairly tends to show that plaintiff and his assignor, who had never seen the pasture, delivered the stock to one of the defendants, who, when he received the same, said:

> "We will look after them, and put them where (there) is feed and water, and in the event the pasture becomes run down, and the stock is not holding up, we will notify you and have you take them out."

At that time said defendant requested plaintiff to notify them in advance before calling for the horses, in accordance with which request plaintiff some time in June, upon learning that the pasture was poor, wrote defendants and expressed his intention to remove the horses, and, not hearing from them, went there about July 1st, when he found three of the horses dead, two of them lying in a gulch at a point about 50 or 100 feet from a pool of water therein, and the other upon a narrow, level plat of ground adjoining the gulch. At the place where the horses were found, the gulch was eight or ten feet in depth, with perpendicular walls, by reason of which the horses were prevented from reaching the water otherwise than by climbing an abrupt hill or mountain and traveling a distance of some four miles and coming in on the other side of the gulch. By reason of the gulch and mountain, as well as other topography of the country, the place where the horses were found was something of a box canyon, out of which it appears they were unable to find their way. There was also evidence tending to show that the horses had been dead some ten days or two weeks, though there was evidence given on the part of defendants that they were seen, at the point where their carcasses were found, on June 15th, when they appeared to be gaunt and in want of water, at which time one of the defendants drove them some distance to another spring, but afterwards, on June 19th, he from a distance, but not going near, saw them at or near the same place from which he had taken them on June 15th when he thought they were in need of water, and where they had gone probably seeking the inaccessible water in the ditch. There was also testimony to the effect that defendants knew of the existence of the condition of this part of the pasture and had on occasions rescued stock which had been imprisoned in gulches therein; that it was the custom of those engaged in conducting like business to ride the range twice a week and, if they missed seeing any of the stock contained in the pasture on one of these trips, to look them up on the second ride. While plaintiff stated that he could not tell what the cause of death was, it is apparent that the jury concluded from the testimony that the horses had become imprisoned in this box canyon where their carcasses were found, and whence, it was reasonably apparent from the fact that all vestige of vegetation and brush had been eaten off, they had been unable to find their way out, and, while there was water in the gulch some eight or ten feet in depth, they could not reach it; that two of them, in an effort to do so, had struggled or fallen into the gulch when too weak to regain their feet and remained there until death relieved their suffering.

[4] In response to certain issues, the jury rendered a special verdict wherein, among other things, they found there was sufficient water in the pasture for the horses. Appellants insist that the general verdict should be set aside and a new trial granted for the reason that the general verdict is predicated upon the fact that the horses died for want of sufficient water, and, since the jury found specially there was a sufficient supply of water in the pasture for the horses, such finding must control the general verdict. This finding as to the sufficiency of water in the pasture, however, is limited by a finding made in response to the question, "Was the water in the pasture accessible to the horses described in the complaint as having died for want of water?" to which they replied, "No." The finding, therefore, as to the sufficiency of water in the pasture is qualified by the further finding that the water so found to be in the pasture was inaccessible to the horses, and hence is entirely consistent with the general verdict.

[5] Some of the testimony given by witness Copeland, called on behalf of plaintiff, was incompetent. No objection, however, was made thereto, and he was fully cross-examined thereon. After plaintiff rested his case, defendants moved the court, without stating the ground therefor, to strike out all of his testimony, which motion was denied. The ruling was not error for the reason, among others, that, since some of the evidence was proper, the motion should have been directed to those parts of the testimony to which doubtless an objection would have been sustained had it been interposed.

We find no error in the record. The judgment and order are affirmed.

The complaint alleges that at the time of the alleged wrongful acts defendant Thomas was constable of Los Angeles township, and his codefendants were his official bondsmen; that W. H. and Sarah A. Stager were husband and wife; that on January 29, 1913, plaintiffs Ross and Sarah A. Stager were the owners of certain personal property situated at No. 253 South Main street, in the city of Los Angeles, consisting, among other things, of a printing press and outfit, a camera and outfit, and a cash register; that Ross was the owner of the title to the property, and that Sarah A. Stager was in possession thereof under a certain written contract made between said Ross of the one part and Sarah A. Stager and W. H. Stager of the other part, whereby the former agreed to sell, and the latter agreed to buy, the property, including that herein specified, for the sum of $6,500, of which amount Stager and his wife had paid the sum of $3,250; that on January 22, 1913, W. H. Stager, in consideration of $300, sold and transferred all his interest in the property to his wife, who is now the lawful owner thereof; that on January 29, 1913, defendant Thomas, as constable, pursuant to a writ of attachment issued out of the justice's court of Los Angeles township in a certain case wherein W. H. Stager was made defendant, levied upon, took possession of, and removed from 253 South Main street the printing press, camera, and cash register; that Thomas refused to comply with a demand for its release from attachment; that the value of the property is the sum of $425, in addition to which plaintiffs suffered loss to their business by reason of the taking and detention of same in the sum of $1,000. The answer, among other things, denied the allegation as to ownership of the property; denied that Sarah A. Stager was the owner or holder of a contract for the purchase of the property from Ross, or that she was in possession of the property; denied the sale and transfer thereof as alleged to have been made to Sarah A. Stager by her husband; and, as a separate defense, alleged that on January 15, 1913, W. H. Stager, who was then the owner of all the personal property located at 253 South Main street, including that so levied upon, was indebted in the sum of $125 to the Los Angeles Gas & Electric Corporation, which demanded payment of said indebtedness, and, upon refusal of said Stager to pay the same, instituted suit for the recovery thereof, and on January 29, 1913, procured the levy of an attachment upon the property as alleged in the complaint; that between the 15th and 29th of January W. H. Stager made a pretended sale and transfer of the property for the purpose of defrauding the attaching creditor; "that said property was at the time of said pretended sale and transfer, and continued thereafter, in the possession and under the control of the said W. H. Stager at the time of said levy and attachment so made by" defendant Thomas, and that it never has been in the possession, control or custody of Sarah A. Stager.

The court found all the allegations of the complaint to be true, and the allegations of the separate defense, other than as to the levy of the attachment, untrue.

Waiving all question as to the competency thereof, it appears from the evidence that on October 25, 1911, plaintiff Ross was the owner of certain personal property in what was known as a penny arcade, conducted at 253 South Main street, Los Angeles. On said date he executed a conditional contract of sale, whereby he sold to W. H. Stager and one F. D. Saffell all of said personal property for the sum of $6,500, payable $400 cash and $50 per week, it being provided in said contract that the title to all of the property should remain in Ross until such time as Stager and Saffell had made full payment of the purchase price, and upon the making of which it was agreed that Ross should by bill of sale convey and transfer to them title to the property. Pursuant to this contract Stager and Saffell entered into possession, and for some time conducted the business, when Saffell sold his interest therein to Stager. Sarah A. Stager was not a party to this contract; neither was any assignment thereof ever at any time made to her. She did advance $285 of the $400 cash payment made to Ross, which sum was evidenced by a promissory note of her husband, due one day after date, to secure which he, on February 24, 1912, executed to her a chattel mortgage on the property. From the time of the purchase she was engaged as an employé in in the business of which her husband was the head and manager. On January 22, 1913, Stager gave to his wife a bill of sale transferring to her all his interest in the property and business so acquired by him under the contract from Ross and the purchase made from Saffell, in payment of the chattel mortgage and interest thereon, the total of which, as stated in the bill of sale, was $300, and upon the contract so made with Ross he had received the sum of $3,250 on account of the purchase price of the property. Included in the contract of purchase from Ross was the property upon which the attachment was levied.

[1] Where one having control and possession of personal property transfers the same, such transfer is conclusively presumed to be fraudulent and void as against his creditors, unless accompanied by an immediate delivery and followed by actual and continued change of possession of the thing transferred. Section 3440, Civ. Code. It has been repeatedly held that the change contemplated by the statute must be actual, visible, and apparent and such as to give to the public evidence of the claim of the new owner. A mere writing, the execution of which is unknown except as between the parties thereto, in the absence of an actual and visible change, will not satisfy the statute. George v. Pierce, 123 Cal. 172, 55 Pac. 775, 56 Pac. 53; McKee, etc., Co. v. Martin, 126 Cal. 557, 58 Pac. 1044; Guthrie v. Carney, 19 Cal. App. 144, 124 Pac. 1045.

[2] There is nothing in the record which in the slightest degree tends to show that anything was done by either Stager or his wife to acquaint the public with the fact that he had transferred the property to her. On the contrary, she testifies that after the execution of the bill of sale each, in so far as concerned the outward apparent relation to the property, occupied the same relative position thereto as they did prior to the transfer. As between themselves, the prior relation, wherein Stager was owner and his wife employé, was reversed, but nothing was done to disclose such change; each continued to perform the same duties and apparently occupied the same relation to the business. There was no actual change of possession, by reason of which fact Sarah A. Stager, as against the attaching creditor of Stager, acquired no interest in, or title to, the property, the purported transfer thereof being void. The finding that the transfer to her was not fraudulent and that she was the owner and entitled to possession of the property is not supported by the evidence.

[3] Conditional contracts of sale of personal property whereby possession thereof is delivered to the purchaser while the title remains in the vendor have received full recognition in this state. Van Allen v. Francis, 123 Cal. 474, 56 Pac. 339; Houser, etc., Co. v. Hargrove, 129 Cal. 90, 61 Pac. 660; Lundy, etc., Co. v. White, 128 Cal. 170, 60 Pac. 759, 79 Am. St. Rep. 41.

[4] By the express terms of the contract the title to the property levied upon, possession of which was delivered to Stager, was retained by Ross, and as to his interest therein, although he had no interest in the business conducted as a penny arcade, the taking of the articles levied upon was as to him a conversion of the property. Section 3336, Civil Code, provides:

> "The detriment caused by the wrongful conversion of personal property is presumed to be:
> "1. The value of the property at the time of the conversion, with the interest from that time, or, where the action has been prosecuted with reasonable diligence, the highest market value of the property at any time between the conversion and the verdict, without interest, at the option of the injured party; and
> "2. A fair compensation for the time and money properly expended in pursuit of the property."

Since Ross had no interest in the profits of the penny arcade conducted by Stager and wife, he could not have suffered any damage by reason of loss of the business due to the taking and detention of the property levied upon. Hence, the finding that he was damaged in the sum of $300, due to loss to the business on account of the detention of the property, is not supported by the evidence. As to the interest of Ross, the taking of the property was wrongful, and he alone is entitled to damages, the measure of which is fixed by section 3336, Civil Code.

The judgment is reversed.

SWANK & LETTON v. ROBERTS. (Civ. 1449.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. June 6, 1914.)

1. Evidence (§ 461*) — Understanding of Witness — Meaning of Written Contracts.

Where a broker's written contract provided that if he succeeded in consummating a deal with a purchaser he should be paid $500, an objection to an interrogatory, asking the broker what was meant by that clause, to which he replied that "his very clear understanding" was that when he obtained $1,500 for his client's lease he was to receive $500 for it, was improperly overruled.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 2129–2133; Dec. Dig. § 461.*]

2. Appeal and Error (§ 1050*)—Rulings on Evidence—Prejudice.

Error in permitting a party to testify as to what was meant by a clause in his written contract of employment was without prejudice, where the court sustained his interpretation.

3. Judgment (§ 708*)—Evidence—Relevancy—Res Inter Alios Acta.

In an action for a broker's services for selling defendant's lease for $1,500, the judgment roll, in an action by the purchaser against the defendant, wherein the purchaser unsuccessfully sought to recover the $1,500, which was the first payment on the assignment contract, was inadmissible as res inter alios acta.

4. Brokers (§ 64*) — Contract — Construction—Services—Performance—Action for Commissions.

Defendant employed a broker to obtain a purchaser for a lease of a building for $1,500, agreeing that, should the broker succeed in consummating a deal with a purchaser at that sum, he should be paid $500. The broker produced a purchaser, who entered into a written contract with defendant and paid $1,500 for an assignment of the lease, but it was also agreed between defendant and the purchaser that he should also pay $1,833.33 on or before the 15th of the succeeding month to reimburse defendant for money deposited with the landlord to secure the rent of the last two months of the term. The purchaser not having been able to comply with this agreement, the lease was not transferred. Held, that the broker succeeded in "consummating" the deal when he obtained the purchaser who paid $1,500 for the transfer of the lease, and that the broker was therefore entitled to commission.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Chas. Monroe, Judge.

Action by Swank & Letton against C. I. Roberts. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals from an order denying her motion for a new trial. Affirmed.

John D. Pope and Hartley Shaw, both of Los Angeles, for appellant. M. J. Finkenstein and Minor Moore, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. The defendant presents this appeal from an order denying her motion for a new trial. On June 22, 1911, the defendant agreed in writing with Walter J. Sherwood, plaintiff's assignor, for services to be rendered in the sale of defendant's lease of certain apartments in the city of Los Angeles. Said writing contained the following agreement:

> "It being understood that Walter J. Sherwood has now a prospective purchaser from whom he expects to secure a sum of fifteen hundred dollars for the lease on the above mentioned apartments, and should he succeed in consummating a deal with this purchaser shall be paid the sum of five hundred dollars."

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

On June 23, 1911, Sherwood brought to plaintiff the prospective purchaser, one Sumner Cummings, who then and there entered into a written contract with the defendant and paid the sum of $1,500, of which $100 went directly to the agent and $1,400 to the defendant. By the terms of said writing with Cummings the defendant acknowledged receipt of $1,500, "part payment for lease on Navarro Apartments, * * * and upon receipt of the further payment of $1,833.32 on or before the 15th day of July, 1911, I agree to transfer the said lease and deliver possession to said Sumner Cummings. * * *" The evidence shows that at the meeting of Sherwood, Cummings and Roberts, Mrs. Roberts explained that the landlord held $1,833.32 of her money as security for the rent of the last two months of the term of the lease, and that the purchaser would have to pay that before she could transfer the lease to him. To this Cummings consented, and the time stated in the contract was allowed him to obtain and pay that amount. Cummings failed to make the additional payment, and no transfer of the lease was ever made. The court having entered judgment in favor of plaintiff for $400, with interest, the defendant moved for a new trial. This appeal is from the court's order denying said motion.

[1, 2] Appellant claims that the court erred in overruling her objection to the fourth direct interrogatory in the deposition of Sherwood, which ruling is assigned as an error of law occurring at the trial. Referring to the agency contract, the witness was asked to state what was meant by that clause in the contract reading as follows: "And should he succeed in consummating a deal with this purchaser shall be paid the sum of five hundred dollars," to which the witness answered: "My very clear understanding was that when I obtained $1,500 for her lease, I was to receive $500 for it." The objection should have been sustained. But in view of our interpretation of the contract as hereinafter stated, the error was without prejudice.

[3] The defendant offered in evidence the judgment roll in a certain action between Cummings as plaintiff and Roberts as defendant, wherein Cummings sought to recover said sum of $1,500, and the judgment was in favor of the defendant. The objection was that the record was not binding on the plaintiff or its assignor, and that it was res inter alios acta. Appellant contends that the record in question should have been admitted as showing the inability or refusal of Cummings to perform his contract of purchase of the lease. We think that the objection was correctly sustained on the ground stated. Besides, it was later made to appear as an undisputed fact that Cummings never did receive the money which he had expected to use in making the final payment, and never did offer to make that payment. The clear inference is that he was not able to do so.

[4] The principal contention of appellant is that the contract between Sherwood and Mrs. Roberts was more than an ordinary broker's contract because under its provisions he was not to be entitled to a commission unless he should "consummate a deal" with a purchaser. The decision of this court in Connor v. Riggins, 21 Cal. App. 756, 132 Pac. 849, is relied upon, where the court said:

> "Moreover, since the word 'consummate' means to bring to completion, and the court found that the oral agreement was to consummate an exchange of both the real and personal property of defendant, and 'that said trade or exchange of the properties between J. W. Riggins and John T. Sweatt has never been consummated,' it would seem clear that plaintiff is not entitled to recover commissions."

In that case the evidence was that the defendant had authorized the plaintiff's assignor to effect an exchange of property between defendant and one John T. Sweatt, and that by reason of failure of title of Sweatt with respect to some of the property which he was to transfer to defendant, no exchange had ever taken place. The thing which the agent had been authorized to do never was done.

In the case at bar the agreement was that the agent Sherwood should "succeed in consummating a deal" with the proposed purchaser whereby the purchaser would pay the sum of $1,500 for the lease. So far as this agency contract is concerned, the agent not only performed all that he could perform in such a transaction, but he actually secured the payment to the defendant of the full sum of $1,500, which was all that he agreed to procure for her. The fact that in dealing with the purchaser she obtained from him an agreement to pay an additional sum of money, and that because of failure to obtain such additional sum she has refused to transfer the lease, cannot defeat the agent's right to the commission, unless we are authorized to read into the agency contract an additional obligation concerning the $1,833.32. This we cannot do. Looking at the agency contract alone, and by which alone the rights of the principal and agent are to be determined, we find that the agent did succeed in consummating the deal to the extent that he procured to be transferred to his principal everything that he agreed to obtain for her. Under such circumstances we hold that the agent is entitled to his commission.

The order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial is affirmed.

SIMS v. FREW. (Civ. 1382.)

1. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT (§ 3*)—CONTRACT—CONSTRUCTION — AGENCY OR INDEPENDENT CONTRACTOR.

Defendant, desiring the services of F. in an aeronautical exhibition, agreed with him to furnish an exhibition park and advance money up to $10,000 for expenses, for which sum he was to be reimbursed from the first proceeds of the sale of admissions. The contract then provided that in the disbursement of the total income the first $10,000 should be subject to the expenses incurred by defendant, and the balance should be paid out in percentages to various persons or classes of persons, including 10 per cent. to F. for his services; it being further stipulated that defendant should not be responsible for any obligations incurred by F., unless approved by defendant. Held, that such last provision implied a recognition of the agency of F. to act for defendant and his responsibility, subject only to the condition of obtaining defendant's approval, and hence the contract was one of agency, and did not create F. an independent contractor.

2. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT (§ 169*)—ACTS OF AGENT — PRINCIPAL'S LIABILITY — OBLIGATIONS INCURRED—APPROVAL—WAIVER.

Where a contract by which defendant employed F. to act as his agent in exploiting an aeronautical exhibition provided that defendant should not be responsible for obligations incurred by F., unless approved by defendant, such provision was for defendant's exclusive benefit, and could be waived by parol, and was waived by defendant accepting and paying many bills for expenses incurred by F. without defendant's approval.

3. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT (§ 133*)—AGENCY CONTRACT—OBLIGATIONS OF AGENT—PRINCIPAL'S LIABILITY — SETTLEMENT WITH AGENT—STATUTES.

Defendant employed F. as his agent in exploiting an aeronautical exhibition, defendant to furnish an exhibition field and $10,000 for expenses; it being agreed that in the disbursement of the total income the first $10,000 should be subject to the expenses so incurred by defendant, and the balance paid out in certain percentages to various persons, including 10 per cent. to F. Held that, defendant not having exhausted the $10,000 fund by expenses properly chargeable to it at the conclusion of the enterprise, and the amount remaining being more than sufficient to satisfy plaintiff's claims for debts incurred by F., defendant's settlement with him was no defense to such claims under Civ. Code, § 2335, providing that, if exclusive credit is given to an agent by the person dealing with him, his principal is exonerated by any settlement by him with his agent in good faith, before receiving notice of the creditor's election to hold the principal responsible.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Franklin J. Cole, Judge.

Action by J. H. Sims, Jr., against Will L. Frew. From a judgment for plaintiff and from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

Andrew M. Strong, of Los Angeles, for appellant. H. S. Clewett and Davis, Kemp & Post, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. In this action the plaintiff recovered judgment for sums found to be due on accounts for merchandise sold and delivered to the defendant by plaintiff's assignors. From the judgment and an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial, the defendant appeals.

There is no controversy over the correctness of the charges or the amount of the judgment. The goods were furnished on the order of one Dick Ferris, and were charged to him, and the defendant's contention is that he occupied no relation to Ferris that would make him responsible for this indebtedness.

On the 6th day of December, 1911, the defendant, Will L. Frew, as party of the first part, and Dick Ferris, as party of the second part, entered into a written contract concerning a proposed aeronautical exhibition to be held on Dominguez Field in Los Angeles county during the following January. Frew was in possession of said premises as lessee thereof, and desired to obtain the services of Ferris "to promote said meet and to act as and to bear the title of general manager, to secure publicity for said meet through the daily papers and magazines, to arrange for the services of competent press agents and to devote his entire time and energy toward the devising and carrying out of a plan for producing an important, attractive, and entertaining exhibition, and to aid in causing the public to patronize the same." For this purpose the contract was written wherein Frew agreed to furnish for said meet the Dominguez Field with certain equipment and to police the grounds and furnish the necessary ticket sellers, ushers, and other attaches necessary to the enterprise. It was further agreed that "all other expenses incurred in conducting said meet, not to exceed the sum of ten thousand dollars, shall be advanced by said first party, and said first party shall be reimbursed by retaining from the first proceeds of the sale of admissions to said meet of every kind and nature, a sufficient amount to pay the same, not to exceed, however, the sum of $10,000." It was then provided that in the disbursement of the total income the first $10,000 should be subject to "the expenses incurred by said party of the first part as above set forth," and the balance was to be paid out in percentages to various persons or classes of persons. This included 10 per cent. to Ferris "for his services as hereinafter set forth in this agreement," and the last remaining 19 per cent. thereof, together with all concessions of every kind and nature, was to be retained by

Frew in compensation for the use of Dominguez Field and for his personal services in conducting the exhibition. It was further stipulated that "said first party shall not be responsible in any way for any obligations, bills, or contracts incurred or entered into by said second party, unless the same have been sanctioned and approved by said first party in writing."

Said exhibition was held from January 20 to 28, 1912, and the gross income slightly exceeded $40,000. A few days later there was a settlement between Frew and Ferris resulting in the payment to Ferris of his percentage under the contract; the amount being based upon an assumption that the expenditures made or incurred under the $10,000 clause of the contract had amounted to $10,000. There was a controversy over the accounts, and it was known to both parties that there remained some outstanding bills. The defendant contends that he made that settlement in reliance upon the assurance of Ferris that the bills would not bring the total amount to above $10,000. It remains true, however, that at the time of making said settlement the defendant knew that there were outstanding and unpaid accounts pertaining to the business.

With possibly one small exception, the defendant knew that these goods were being ordered, and he had this knowledge, before they were delivered, but plaintiff's assignors were without knowledge of any agency relation between Frew and Ferris, and were without knowledge that Frew had anything to do with the business in question.

[1] It is contended by appellant that Ferris was an independent contractor, and not his agent; that therefore the acts and contracts of Ferris were his own, and that for them he alone is responsible. It appears to us, however, that the relation established between the parties to that contract was that of principal and agent. Frew was to secure the services of Ferris for certain defined purposes, and was to pay Ferris therefor in the manner described in the contract. The special provision made that Frew would not be responsible for obligations incurred by Ferris in connection with the services thus to be performed, "unless the same have been sanctioned and approved by said first party in writing," implies a recognition of the agency and the responsibility, subject only to the condition stated.

[2] The condition that bills must be sanctioned and approved in writing was a condition made exclusively for the benefit of the defendant, and could be waived by parol. Knarston v. Manhattan Life Ins. Co., 140 Cal. 58, 62, 73 Pac. 740; Wyman v. Hooker, 2 Cal. App. 36, 41, 83 Pac. 79; Ellsworth v. Knowles, 8 Cal. App. 630, 633, 97 Pac. 690. That this waiver took place is fully shown by the record. The defendant accepted and paid for many items of expense incurred by Ferris without having sanctioned or approved the same in writing. This condition of the contract was diregarded from the beginning to the end of the business connected with this enterprise.

[3] Finally it is contended that by reason of the settlement between defendant and Ferris and the payment to the latter of $2,286.30, the percentage above mentioned, the defendant is exonerated from liability on these claims. Section 2335 of the Civil Code reads as follows:

> "If exclusive credit is given to an agent by the person dealing with him, his principal is exonerated by payment or other satisfaction made by him to his agent in good faith, before receiving notice of the creditor's election to hold him responsible."

Assuming that, if the moneys paid out by Frew, together with the then unpaid bills incurred by Ferris, had more than exhausted the $10,000 fund, this defense would be sustained, we find that the total amount thus chargeable under the contract was less than $10,000, and that the balance remaining was sufficient to satisfy plaintiff's claims.

The sum of $10,179.86, paid out by the defendant and charged against this fund by the defendant, included $1,159.30 of items which under the contract were not so chargeable. It is true that in the settlement between Frew and Ferris when said percentage was paid to Ferris these items were allowed by Ferris. But at the time when plaintiff's assignors furnished the supplies included in their accounts this modification of the contract was not in force. This being so, their rights are to be determined by the written contract, and they cannot be affected by a subsequent diminution of the amount reserved for the payment of such demands. The total amount of the accounts included in the judgment, exclusive of interest and costs, is only $939.65.

The judgment and the order denying a new trial are affirmed.

Plummer. From judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Appeal dismissed.

J. Lapique, of Orange, in pro. per. Shirley E. Meserve and W. A. Sumner, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. The appeal in this case is from an order vacating and setting aside the default of the defendant entered by the clerk—an order made before the entry of any judgment in the action. Appellant's contention that such order entered by the clerk is to be regarded as a judgment, proceeds upon an entirely erroneous assumption.

> "Certainly it is not true that an order setting aside a default in an action where no judgment has been entered upon the default is the subject of a separate appeal. It is in no sense an order after judgment, and it is not one of the interlocutory orders enumerated in section 963 of the Code of Civil Procedure." Savage v. Smith, 154 Cal. 325, 97 Pac. 821.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank G. Finlayson, Judge.

Action by Maybelle Oliver against Emma Stoltenberg. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

H. A. Massey, of Los Angeles (Peyton H. Moore, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellant. D. Z. Gardner, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

JAMES, J. Appeal was taken in this cause from the judgment entered against defendant, and also from an order denying her motion for a new trial. The cause of action was one for damages for personal injuries alleged to have been suffered by the plaintiff as a result of the negligent acts of defendant.

Appellant was the owner of an apartment house in the city of Los Angeles, and respondent was a tenant therein. Being desirous of having the house raised to a greater height above the surface of the ground, appellant employed one Young, a contractor, to do the work, and he commenced the task on Saturday, the last day of September, 1911. On Sunday morning at about 10 o'clock the building had been raised at the front about 5 inches. As it had stood theretofore there were two cement steps leading from the porch at the front to the sidewalk, and the top step was about 1½ inches below the level of the porch. When the house was raised to the height of about 5 inches there was then created another step from the porch surface to the top of the first cement step, and a space was left where the riser is ordinarily placed. When the steps were in that condition plaintiff came out of the building and proceeded as she ordinarily did to reach the sidewalk, without noticing that the building had been raised. Not expecting to find the first cement step lower than it had previously been, her foot slipped, and she fell, sustaining injuries for which the trial court awarded her damages in the sum of $1,500. As to the facts just stated there was no dispute between the parties, and it was also agreed that the contractor, Young, was an independent contractor in his connection with the work, but that he had no duty to perform under his agreement with appellant as to the steps; these latter he was not to molest or change. The court determined by its findings all of the facts as they have been narrated, and further found that the change in the position of the porch at the time of the accident to respondent "was not apparent to any one passing from said porch to said steps."

[1] Upon such a state of the record it is contended on the part of appellant that there was not sufficient evidence to show that appellant had committed any negligent act which caused respondent's injuries; and, second, that it appeared that respondent was guilty of negligence which contributed to cause the accident. It is first claimed that, upon the facts as presented to the trial court and shown in the statement on motion for a new trial, it became a question of law as to whether or not appellant had been guilty of negligence, and that, such a question is here presented for review. It is an unusual case, indeed, where the facts and circumstances surrounding the happening of an event involving a question of negligence present a case where it can be said without any qualification that all men, considering the matter in a rational and reasonable light, would agree as to whether ordinary care had been used by the person charged with negligence.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

> "The question of negligence must be submitted to the jury as one of fact, not only where there is room for difference of opinion between reasonable men as to the existence of the facts from which it is proposed to infer negligence, but also where there is room for such a difference as to the inferences which might fairly be drawn from conceded facts. Where this is the case, the issue must go to the jury, no matter what may be the opinion of the court as to the value of the evidence or the credibility of the witnesses. So, if the issue narrows itself to a distinction between what is reasonably safe and what is not so, the question is emphatically one for the jury. It is for the court to say whether there is any evidence in the case from which negligence might reasonably be inferred; and then it is for the jury to say whether, from the facts thus proved, negligence ought to be inferred." Shearman and Redfield on Negligence, vol. 1, par. 54.

As illustrating the application of the rules declared in the text-book referred to, the case of Humphrey v. Leonard, 151 Cal. 375, 90 Pac. 705, may be cited, wherein it is said:

> "Appellant's proposition is that the facts being undisputed, it was a question of law as to whether or not defendants were negligent, and that the finding and determination of the court is against the law and against the evidence. This, however, may not be said. It was for the court, as it would have been for a jury, considering all of the circumstances and facts shown by the evidence, to declare whether the defendants were or were not negligent. * * * The defendants were called upon to exercise the care which the circumstances required in the construction and maintenance of the temporary driveway, and what was ordinary care it was peculiarly the province of the court below, sitting as a trier of the facts, to determine."

There is, then, on this branch of the case, but one query to answer: Was there any substantial evidence from which the trial court might draw its conclusion that in leaving the steps in their changed condition, without warning to her tenants, appellant acted in a manner other than ordinary prudence would suggest she should act, having reasonable regard for the safety of the occupants of her building.

[2] There can be no doubt at all that appellant would have been negligent had she raised the house without the knowledge of, or notice to, her tenants and one of them had gone upon the steps in the dark and been injured. The same case is presented here, with the exception that the respondent was injured in the daytime. And the same conclusion must follow, unless it can be said that the conditions were such as to apprise those who had occasion to go from the building that the steps had been lowered through the raising of the building; and these conditions would need to be so plain as to give notice to the tenant as effectually as would a barrier, a sign, or other familiar form of warning appliance. There was no such plain notification shown to have been given here. It was a fair inference for the court to draw from all of the testimony that persons emerging from the building, unless their eyes were kept ahead of their feet, would not have noticed the fact that the edge of the porch had been raised above the cement step four or five inches. The court did find that the change was not apparent to any one passing from the porch to the steps. Hence this court cannot say, as a matter of law that the conclusion of the trial judge was erroneous. For precisely the same reasons it must be concluded that the finding that respondent was not guilty of any act of negligence which contributed to cause her injuries is not the subject of review; there was some evidence of a substantial nature upon which to found the finding.

The case of Smith v. Buttner, 90 Cal. 95, 27 Pac. 29, is cited in support of appellant's contention that the complaint in this action did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. In this case the particular defect which caused the injuries to plaintiff is described, and it is then alleged that respondent, while passing out of the house, fell upon the steps, by reason of the negligence of the appellant "as aforesaid." It seems that the complaint made a sufficiently clear statement of the facts illustrating the conditions out of which appellant's negligence arose, and sufficiently showed that it was due to these conditions that respondent fell upon the steps.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

We concur: CONREY, P. J.; SHAW, J.

YAHACHI SHIMODA v. BUNDY et al.
(Civ. 1528.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. June 3, 1914. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court July 31, 1914.)

1. Evidence (§ 474*)—Opinion of Witness—Competency—Speed of Automobile.

Any person of ordinary intelligence and opportunity for observation is competent to testify as to the speed of an automobile.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 2196–2219; Dec. Dig. § 474.*]

2. Evidence (§ 474*)—Opinion Evidence—Speed of Automobile—Knowledge.

In an action for injuries from a collision between a motorcycle and an automobile, plaintiff's testimony relative to the speed at which the automobile was traveling when it struck him was improperly excluded on an objection that he did not have sufficient opportunity to form an opinion thereon, where he testified that he not only saw the automobile before it struck him, and had time to change the course of his motorcycle, but saw and estimated its speed while it was running a distance of half a block after it struck him.

3. Municipal Corporations (§ 706*) — Streets — Collision with Automobile — Negligent Speed—Direction of Verdict.

Where, in an action for injuries from a collision between a motorcycle and an automobile on a city street, the evidence was conflicting on whether defendants' automobile was being negligently operated at an excessive rate of speed and raised inferences relative thereto from which reasonable and impartial men might draw different conclusions, and it appeared that, though the trial judge might set aside a verdict for plaintiff, he would not be compelled to do so, it was error to direct a verdict for defendants.

4. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 705*) — STREETS — COLLISION WITH AUTOMOBILE — DEFENSE—VIOLATION OF ORDINANCE.

In an action for injuries from a collision between an automobile and a motorcycle on a city street, it was no defense that plaintiff had not registered his motorcycle as required by city ordinance, where the accident was due to the negligent operation of defendants' automobile at an excessive speed, and plaintiff's violation of the ordinance neither bore any causal relation nor contributed to the injury sustained.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walter Bordwell, Judge.

Action by Yahachi Shimoda against John Bundy and another, for personal injuries. From a judgment for defendants on directed verdict and a denial of a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Flint, Gray & Barker and Gray, Barker & Bowen, all of Los Angeles, for appellant. George P. Adams and Stephens & Stephens, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

SHAW, J. This is an action to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been sustained as a result of the negligence of defendants in operating an automobile which collided with a motorcycle upon which plaintiff was riding on Ninth street in the city of Los Angeles. At the close of the evidence the jury, under direction of the trial court, returned a verdict for defendants. The appeal is from the judgment and an order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial.

The collision occurred at a point where Ninth street, which extends east and west, intersects an alley 19 feet and 7 inches wide, extending north and south. According to plaintiff's testimony, he was engaged as a gardener, and about 9 o'clock a. m. on January 19th, having completed his work, he mounted his motorcycle at a point on the west side of the alley distant 150 feet north of its intersection with Ninth street, and, without using the power, but pedaling the machine, started towards Ninth street, traveling at a speed of less than five miles per hour. He was on the west side of the alley, and as he neared Ninth street kept within two or three feet of the west line thereof. As he approached Ninth street he looked on both sides of the alley where it opened into Ninth street and saw a gravel wagon on Ninth street approaching from the east towards the alley; the heads of the horses drawing the wagon being distant six or seven feet from the east line thereof, and another wagon which had passed the alley going west. Although he looked, he saw no automobile and, though he listened, heard no horn or other warning of its approach. He passed out of the alley in front of the gravel wagon, immediately after which defendants' automobile, traveling west on Ninth street, struck the left side of the front wheel of plaintiff's motorcycle, throwing him down, as a result of which he was seriously injured. When thrown down he immediately jumped up to see the automobile, and saw it pass over Burlington avenue. He did not lose consciousness and had full possession of his faculties from the time of the collision until removed in the ambulance; he saw the automobile the instant before it struck him and turned the handle-bars of his motorcycle to the right, thus changing his course, in an effort to avoid the collision; after being struck he got up, but fell down again; he watched the speeding automobile until it reached Burlington avenue, the street next west of the alley; he had attended automobile school, qualified as a driver, and knew and had estimated their speed within one-half mile per hour. A city ordinance was introduced which limited the speed of and made it unlawful for any one to operate an automobile at the point where the collision occurred at a speed in excess of 20 miles per hour. Thereupon he was asked the question, "Can you estimate the speed at which that automobile was traveling at the time that it struck you?" to which an objection, upon the ground that it was incompetent and immaterial and no foundation laid as to the estimate, was by the court sustained on the ground, as stated, "that from the testimony of the witness already given it is impossible for him to make the estimate." He was further asked, "Now, Shimoda, what was the speed of the automobile at the time that you first saw it?" to which the court sustained an objection. He was again asked, "What speed was the automobile going in miles per hour at the time it struck you?" to which defendants' objection, upon the ground that it was incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial and no proper foundation laid, was sustained. Thereafter plaintiff offered to prove by the witness that from seeing the automobile at the time it struck him and immediately prior thereto and thereafter, and as he saw it afterwards while being run to Burlington avenue, he could and did form an estimate of the speed in miles per hour at which it was running, and that, at the time it collided with his motorcycle, it was running at a speed of from 30 to 40 miles per hour. The court refused to permit him to so testify. This ruling of the court is assigned as error. Counsel for respondents attempt to justify the same upon the well-recognized rule that whether or not one be qualified to testify as an expert is a question of fact to be determined by the trial court, whose decision will not be disturbed unless error clearly appears; in reply to which it may be said that the witness was not called as an expert.

[1] No question other than the speed of a moving object was involved, as to which any intelligent person accustomed to observing moving objects would be able to express an opinion of some value. The rule, as to which there is little conflict and applicable alike not only to automobiles, but to all moving objects, is that a person of ordinary intelligence having opportunity for observation is competent to testify as to the speed at which an automobile is being operated at a given time. Wolfe v. Ives, 83 Conn. 174, 76 Atl. 526, 19 Ann. Cas. 752; Matla v. Rapid Motor Vehicle Co., 160 Mich. 639, 125 N. W. 708; State v. Watson, 216 Mo. 420, 115 S. W. 1011; Detroit & M. R. R. Co. v. Van Steinburg, 17 Mich. 104; Johnsen v. Oakland, etc., Ry. Co., 127 Cal. 608, 60 Pac. 170.

[2] The ruling, however, appears not to have been based upon the grounds stated in the objection to the question, but by reason of the fact that, in the opinion of the learned trial judge, plaintiff did not have sufficient opportunity to form an opinion upon the question as to the rate of speed at which the automobile was running. This by reason of the fact that, as shown by his testimony, plaintiff was knocked down immediately after emerging to a point from which he could see the automobile. This conclusion finds some support in Wright v. Crane, 142 Mich. 508, 106 N. W. 71, where it appeared that the witness, who testified that an automobile when he first discovered it was but 20 feet from his horse's head, based his opinion upon the ground that, while he did not see it, an automobile running at a high rate of speed makes little noise and makes much more noise when running at a low rate of speed. It appears here that not only did plaintiff see the automobile before it struck him and had time to turn the handle-bars so as to change his course, but saw and estimated its speed while running a distance of half a block to Burlington avenue. In the case of Himmelwright v. Baker, 82 Kan. 569, 109 Pac. 178, the plaintiff testified that the car was 10 or 15 feet from him when he first saw it and was running so fast that, although he made an effort, he had no time to get away from it. He was then asked at what rate of speed it was running, and answered that it was 15 miles an hour. This answer was stricken out on the ground that it appeared he did not have sufficient opportunity to form an opinion on the question of speed. The court held the ruling to be error. A mathematical calculation shows that, if the automobile was running 20 miles an hour, it would have required one-half second to cover 15 feet. If running at 40 miles per hour, as claimed by plaintiff, it would have covered 30 feet in the same length of time. The opinion or estimate of the witness as to the rate of speed at which the automobile was being propelled at the time of the collision might, by reason of his lack of opportunity to judge thereof, be entitled to little value, but this merely goes to the weight to be given the testimony, which was a question for the jury. The court erred in excluding the testimony.

[3] Max Spaeny, called as a witness on behalf of plaintiff, testified that he saw the collision when the automobile struck the front of the motorcycle, knocking plaintiff off and down, and watched the automobile until it went up to Burlington avenue; that plaintiff, after being knocked down, tried to get up, but, being unable to do so, raised his head and looked steadily after the automobile; that he was in the alley as plaintiff passed him going out. This witness testified that he was unable to determine or estimate the speed at which the automobile was running, but, for the purpose of showing the speed at which it was operated at the time of the collision, the witness was permitted, without objection being interposed thereto, to testify that at the time of the collision the automobile was running at about the same speed as a car operated over the same street and at the same place, the speed of which he had witnessed a few days before the trial, and testimony was then offered to show that this car, with which the witness had compared the speed of defendants' automobile, was at the time operated at an actual speed of 27½ miles per hour. It is conceded the testimony given by the chauffeur in charge of the car contradicted the evidence adduced on behalf of plaintiff as to every material issue. He testified that he knew of and was familiar with the location of this alley and knew that it was used as a thoroughfare by people using wagons, motorcycles, and other vehicles; that, as he approached the point on Ninth street intersecting the alley, his view thereof was obstructed by a wagon loaded with hay, over the top of which he could not see, and which with the team drawing the same, extended across seven-eighths of the mouth thereof; that he was looking at his speedometer and was running at a speed of only 15 miles per hour and did not see plaintiff or know that he had struck him until, feeling a jar from the collision, he stopped his car within eight feet of the point where the collision occurred, and looking back saw plaintiff lying in the street.

The question presented is whether or not under this evidence the court was warranted in taking the case from the jury and directing a verdict for defendants. In the late case of Estate of Baldwin, 162 Cal. 471, 123 Pac. 267, it is said:

> "A directed verdict is proper whenever, upon the whole evidence, the judge would be compelled to set a contrary verdict aside as unsupported by the evidence."

And further as touching the question it is said:

> "It is not necessary that there should be an absence of conflict in the evidence, but to deprive the court of the right to exercise this power, if there be a conflict, it must be a substantial one."

In support of which proposition a number of California cases are cited. Accepting as the law this latest expression of the Supreme Court, announced in the Baldwin Case, can it be said the rule applies to a case where, as here, it is sought to recover for the alleged negligence of defendants, the existence of which depends upon inferences to be drawn from the facts and circumstances shown by the evidence, and as to which reasonable and impartial men may differ in the conclusions drawn? Negligence is not absolute, but relative, depending upon some circumstance of time, place, or person, or combination thereof. If the jury had been satisfied that defendant Bundy, as he stated, was operating his car at a speed of only 15 miles per hour and had it under such control that enabled him to stop it within a distance of 8 feet from the point of collision, and this notwithstanding the fact that he did not see plaintiff before striking the motorcycle, or, on the other hand, that he was running at 30 miles per hour and was familiar, as he stated, with the fact that the alley was used as a thoroughfare by parties operating vehicles in coming therefrom into the street, and that in either case the mouth of the alley was not obstructed by any wagon, whether loaded with hay or gravel, by reason of which fact Bundy could have seen plaintiff had he looked, or looking did see him and made no effort to avoid the collision, and that plaintiff, as stated by him, did look and listen, but neither saw nor heard anything indicating the approach of an automobile, they might have concluded plaintiff's injuries were due to a want of reasonable care on the part of the defendants, in which case, had the trial court denied a motion for a new trial, this court on appeal could hardly be expected to reverse same for want of evidence to support the verdict. Other fairly debatable theories based upon evidence adduced might be constructed which, if accepted by the jury, might entitle plaintiff to recover. While the case presented is one where the trial judge might have set aside a verdict rendered for plaintiff, nevertheless it is not one in which the court would be compelled to do so.

[4] There was introduced in evidence a city ordinance requiring all motorcycles to be registered and numbered. This ordinance provided that every owner of a motorcycle should file in the office of the city clerk a statement in writing showing the name and address of such person, description of the motorcycle, name and maker thereof, and factory number, and that the city clerk should issue to him a metal seal, approximately two inches in diameter, upon which should be stamped, "Registered Motorcycle No. ———, City of Los Angeles," with the registration number inserted therein, which seal was required to be conspicuously displayed upon the motorcycle to which it was assigned. Section 4 of the ordinance made it unlawful for any person to operate a motorcycle upon the streets unless the registration seal and number belonging thereto was displayed thereon as required by the ordinance. Section 5 provided that:

> "It shall be unlawful for any person * * * to use or operate * * * any motorcycle * * * upon or in any public street or thoroughfare, unless the owner thereof shall have complied in all respects with this ordinance."

For violation of the provisions of the ordinance, the offender was made subject to punishment by fine or imprisonment, or both. It is conceded that plaintiff did not file a statement with the city clerk, nor procure the registration of his motorcycle, as required by the provisions of the ordinance. Respondents insist that by reason of such neglect and failure on the part of plaintiff to comply with the ordinance, and even though it be conceded that the negligence of defendants was the direct and proximate cause of the damage sustained by him, he is not entitled to recover therefor. This contention is based upon the theory that, since the ordinance made it unlawful for him to operate the motorcycle, he was, as to defendants and the city, a trespasser upon the street, to whom defendants owed no duty other than to refrain from willfully or wantonly injuring him or his property. This view finds support in the case of Dudley v. Northampton Street R. Co., 202 Mass. 443, 89 N. E. 25, 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) 561, which involved an act of the Legislature containing a provision not unlike those contained in the ordinance before us. It is there held, quoting from the syllabus:

> "One operating an automobile on a public highway, in violation of a statute forbidding the operation thereon of unregistered machines, has no right of action against one who injures it merely by want of ordinary care."
> "The Legislature," says the court, "in the opinion of a majority of the court, intended to outlaw unregistered machines, and to give them as to persons lawfully using the highways, no other right than that of being exempt from * * * wanton or willful injury."

The general rule appears to be that the violation of an ordinance which directly contributes to the injury caused by the negligence of another bars the right to recover, but, where such violation bears no causal relation to nor contributes to the injuries sustained, the rule has no application. Newcomb v. Boston Protective Dept., 146 Mass. 596, 16 N. E. 555, 4 Am. St. Rep. 354; Frontier Steam Laundry Co. v. Connolly, 68 L. R. A. 425, 72 Neb. 767, 101 N. W. 995; Needham v. San Francisco & S. J. R. Co., 37 Cal. 409; Schierhold v. N. B. & M. R. R. Co., 40 Cal. 447; Monroe v. Hartford St. Ry. Co., 76 Conn. 201, 56 Atl. 498; Broschart v. Tuttle, 59 Conn. 1, 21 Atl. 925, 11 L. R. A. 33; Shaw v. Thielbahr, 82 N. J. Law, 23, 81 Atl. 497. Indeed, the Massachusetts court, in a later case entitled Bourne v. Whitman, 209 Mass. 155, 95 N. E. 404, 35 L. R. A. (N. S.) 701, refused to extend the doctrine of the Dudley

Case to one where the plaintiff was in default in that he had not complied with an act requiring the issuance of a license as a condition of lawfully operating a vehicle. Even where the violation of an ordinance constitutes negligence per se, there must be, in order for plaintiff to recover, a causal relation between the violation of the ordinance and the injury complained of. Lindsay v. Cecchi (Del.) 80 Atl. 523, 35 L. R. A. (N. S.) 699. The conclusion of the Massachusetts Supreme Court, divided, however, as it was, appears to have been based upon the theory that the Legislature of that state intended by the act to create a duty to other travelers upon highways, and not merely to declare a public duty to be enforced by the imposition of the penalties therein prescribed in the ordinary administration of the criminal law. We are unable to appreciate the distinctions sought to be drawn, and unwilling to accept its decision as the law of this state when applied to the ordinance in question. Moreover, if the automobile was operated at a rate of speed in excess of that prescribed by the ordinance, it was not lawfully traveling upon the street, as was defendant in the Dudley Case which fact is given particular emphasis. While the courts, invoking the maxim, "Ex pacto illicito non oritur actio," in a certain class of cases close their doors in the face of one guilty of moral turpitude in attempting to enforce an illicit contract, thus leaving the parties as they found them, such principle is wholly inapplicable to the facts here involved. Our conclusion is that one who violates an ordinance wherein a penalty is fixed for noncompliance with its provisions may be subjected to the penalties therein prescribed, but he cannot, in addition thereto, be deprived of his civil right to recover damages, perhaps in many thousands of dollars, sustained by reason of the negligence or wrong of another, when such violation bore no relation to the injury and did not contribute in the remotest degree thereto. In our opinion, such was not the intent of the legislative body of the city of Los Angeles in adopting the ordinance.

The judgment and order are reversed.

We concur: CONREY, P. J.; JAMES, J.

PEOPLE v. LUSINCHI. (Cr. 494.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. May 29, 1914. Rehearing Denied June 27, 1914; Denied by Supreme Court July 28, 1914.)

1. LIBEL AND SLANDER (§ 145*)—"LIBEL"—WHAT CONSTITUTES.

The complaining witness was chairman of an entertainment committee, and funds collected by the committee were lost. Defendant, the editor of a newspaper, published an article calling on the complaining witness by name, and demanding that he make a clean breast of the mysterious disappearance of the funds and tell into which pocket the money strayed. Held, that the article was libelous within Pen. Code, § 248, defining a libel as a malicious defamation in writing tending to impeach the honesty or reputation of the one libeled and expose him to public hatred or contempt.

2. LIBEL AND SLANDER (§ 159*) — CRIMINAL LIBEL—INSTRUCTIONS.

In a prosecution for criminal libel by a newspaper, instructions on the right of the newspaper to criticize the acts of persons not holding public office are properly refused; the word "criticize" having no well-defined meaning in law.

3. LIBEL AND SLANDER (§ 146*) — "CRIMINAL LIBEL"—DEFENSES.

Under Pen. Code, § 248, defining a criminal libel as a malicious defamation tending to impeach the honesty of the one libeled and expose him to public hatred, contempt, or ridicule, a newspaper has no right to print a defamatory article, unless it comes within the statutory definition of privileged communications; there being no special exemption in favor of newspapers.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; William P. Lawlor, Judge.

August Lusinchi was convicted of criminal libel, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Costello & Costello and P. A. Bergerot, all of San Francisco, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Dep. Atty. Gen., for the People.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment of conviction of criminal libel.

The facts leading up to the publication complained of are briefly these: The defendant and one Leon L. Rey were publishers of rival French newspapers in the city of San Francisco, and were at swords' points in journalism. Leon L. Rey had been the chairman of a committee which had in charge the finances of a celebration of the fall of the Bastille, during the course of which the sum of $600 of the funds provided for the celebration and passing through the hands of the committee disappeared. The whereabouts of this money not having been explained by the chairman of the committee to the satisfaction of the defendant, as editor of "Le Franco-Californien," he published in his said newspaper the article complained of in this case. Thereupon he was arrested, tried, and convicted of criminal libel, and fined the sum of $500, from which judgment he prosecutes this appeal.

The first contention of the appellant is that the article complained of does not in itself contain matter which was sufficient to bring its writer and publisher within the terms of the section of the Penal Code defining criminal libel, and that the general demurrer to the information ought therefore to have been sustained. In this connection the appellant contends that the prosecution, in drawing the information, and realizing the insufficiency of the article to support a charge of criminal libel, undertook by innuendoes to eke out the infirmities of the article by imputing to its phrases a criminal meaning which their words do not warrant, and that for this additional reason the demurrer to the information should have been sustained.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

[1] It will be conceded that an article alleged to be defamatory and to have been published of and concerning another cannot have its words and phrases enlarged beyond their natural import and plain and ordinary meaning by innuendo, and that in case this is attempted in the information the remedy is by way of demurrer. With this in mind we have given to the article in question a most careful reading, after eliminating from it the innuendoes of the information, and also the excursions into editorial flippancies with which it is replete. Thus stripped down to its real intendment and naked import, we are satisfied that the article does quite clearly impute to the subject of it a course of acts, concealment, and conduct which, if not actually criminal, do strongly tend to impeach the honesty, integrity, virtue and reputation of Leon L. Rey, and thereby expose him to public hatred, contempt, and ridicule. The article is headed "Make a Clean Breast of It." It is directed to Leon L. Rey, as its subject, by name; it refers to "the mysterious disappearance of $600 of the money received by and tabulated in the report of the finance committee of the 14th of July celebration," of which Leon L. Rey was the chairman; it urges him to tell "into which pocket or pockets have strayed the $600"; it avers that "mistakes, irregularities, forgeries, and even embezzlements of money have been ascertained in the published statements of account of this committee"; it demands an explanation of Leon L. Rey; and in doing so asserts that "an honest man never hesitates to justify himself when he is accused of committing offenses such as these with which he has been charged"; it states that Leon L. Rey is "obstinately resolved to be mum on this subject," and finally closes, as it began, with the insistence that Leon L. Rey should "make a clean breast of it."

We think that a newspaper article couched in the foregoing phrases and aimed at the complaining witness comes clearly within the provisions of section 248 of the Penal Code, relating to criminal libel, and that such article does not require the use of innuendoes to render it actionable; and hence that the fact that the drawer of the information made use of innuendoes in aid of the actual intent and meaning of the article complained of neither strengthens nor weakens the information as a pleading, and that both the general and special demurrers thereto were therefore properly overruled. Tonini v. Cavasco, 114 Cal. 266, 46 Pac. 103, and cases cited.

[2, 3] The next contention of the appellant is that the court erred in refusing to give certain instructions to the jury at the defendant's request. These instructions, of which there are several, refer to the asserted right of a newspaper to fairly and justly "criticize" the actions of those committees or members of committees having in charge the celebration of holidays and anniversaries, and that the defendant, as the editor of such paper, had the right to direct public attention to the actions and conduct of the committee of which Leon L. Rey was chairman, in relation to the alleged disappearance of a portion of the funds with which he was intrusted, and to call upon him and his committee for an explanation, and to comment upon his refusal to give such explanation for the enlightenment of the readers of the newspaper and of the public generally, in response to the duty which the newspaper owes to its subscribers and the public in that regard, and that such a publication is a privileged communication. The twofold vice of the series of instructions of which the foregoing is a brief synopsis consists: First, in the use of a term which in law has no defined meaning—that is, the word "criticize"; and, secondly, consists in the suggestion that the criticisms and comments of the press upon the acts and conduct of persons in charge of public celebrations are privileged communications. The law defines criminal libel to be "a malicious defamation, * * * tending * * * to impeach the honesty, integrity, virtue, or reputation, * * * of one who is alive, and thereby to expose him to public hatred, contempt, or ridicule." Pen. Code, § 248. The comprehensive terms of this section of the Code permit no exception in favor of those who may be publishers of newspapers as distinguished from the disseminators of written or printed matter in any other form. The thing, by whomever published and in whatever form, must be such, in point of truth and of intent, that it will pass through the meshes of this section of the Penal Code, or it will be criminal libel, unless it shall also be found to come within the terms of those sections of the Code which define privileged publications. The article in question does not purport nor pretend to be a report of any judicial, legislative, or other public official proceeding; and it has never yet been held, so far as the industry of counsel discloses, that a mere newspaper publication of the kind in question is such a communication to a person or persons interested therein as would come within the provisions of section 256 of the Penal Code. The proffered instructions of the defendant dealing with this branch of the case were therefore properly refused.

As to the other proposed instructions of the defendant which were also refused by the trial court, we find their essential subject-matter to have been quite fully covered by the instructions which the court gave to the jury upon its own motion.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

BORGER v. CONNECTICUT FIRE INS. CO.

(Civ. 1404.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. June 4, 1914. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court, Aug. 3, 1914.)

1. Insurance (§ 634*)—Fire Policy—Action—Complaint.

A fire policy provided that the insurer within 20 days after receipt of proofs of loss must notify the insured of its partial or total disagreement with the amount of the loss, and if the insurer failed to give such notice, it should be deemed to have assented to the amount of the loss claimed, but that if notice should have been given within 10 days thereafter the parties might agree on the amount of the loss, and in the event of disagreement, an appraisement should be made on the insurer's demand. A further provision declared that the loss, if any, was payable 30 days after the amount had been ascertained, but if such ascertainment were not made within 60 days after receipt of proofs of loss, then the loss should be payable 90 days after such receipt. Held, that, such policy having been made a part of plaintiff's complaint in an action thereon, an allegation that the sum claimed was long since due was insufficient to show compliance by plaintiff with the condition required of plaintiff after presentation of proofs, and, the complaint failing to allege that the loss had been ascertained, and that the time specified for payment had expired under the terms of the policy, before suit brought, it was demurrable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. §§ 1593, 1596, 1598, 1603–1606, 1608; Dec. Dig. § 634.*]

2. Pleading (§ 34*)—Complaint—Construction—Presumptions.

A policy provided that loss should be payable 30 days after the amount had been ascertained by agreement or appraisement, but if no appraisement was had within 60 days after receipt of proofs of loss, then the loss should be payable within 90 days after such receipt. A complaint on the policy averred that on the "—— day of May, 1912," plaintiff furnished defendant with the proofs of loss, while the transcript showed that the action was begun June 15, 1912. Held, that in determining the sufficiency of the complaint on demurrer, no presumption could be indulged in to fill the blank with a date earlier than 30 days before the date on which suit was begun, nor could plaintiff rely on a presumption to supply a failure to allege the ascertainment of the amount of loss as provided for by the policy, or whether, if so ascertained, that the date of such ascertainment was at least 30 days before suit brought.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 5½, 66–74; Dec. Dig. § 34.*]

3. Appeal and Error (§ 233*)—Presentation of Questions in Trial Court.

Where, in an action on a policy, defendant demurred to the complaint and urged that the suit was prematurely brought, and again presented such question by denial in its answer and in a motion for a new trial, it was sufficiently raised in the trial court to entitle defendant to a review of the question on appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 594, 596, 599–635; Dec. Dig. § 233.*]

4. Insurance (§ 621*)—Fire Policy—Action—Time.

A policy provided that after furnishing proofs of loss, the insurer must within 20 days after receipt, notify the insured in writing of any disagreement with the amount claimed, and if the insurer failed to give such notice, it should be deemed an assent to the amount claimed; that the loss should be payable 30 days after ascertainment of the amount, but if such ascertainment was not had within 60 days after receipt of proofs of loss, it should be payable in 90 days after such receipt. Proofs of loss were furnished May 12, 1912, and no objection was made by the insurer within the 20 days. An action was brought June 15, 1912. Held, that the insurer had the whole of the 20 days within which to assent or object to the proofs of loss, as made, and 30 days thereafter within which to pay the claim, and hence the action was premature.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; H. Z. Austin, Judge.

Action by Alex. Borger against the Connecticut Fire Insurance Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial, it appeals. Reversed.

Coogan & O'Conner, of San Francisco, and Drew & Drew, of Fresno, for appellant. W. P. Thompson, of Fresno, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This is an action brought to recover the sum of $1,000 with interest, alleged to be due upon a fire insurance policy as the result of the destruction by fire of the premises insured. A copy of the policy was attached to and expressly made a part of the complaint. There was a general demurrer, which was overruled. Thereupon an answer was filed, admitting the issuance of the policy but denying liability thereon upon numerous alleged grounds, and also denying that the loss, if any, was due or payable or unpaid, according to the terms of the policy, at the time of the commencement of the action. Upon the trial of the cause judgment was rendered and entered in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $801.98, with interest and costs. A motion for a new trial was denied, and from such judgment and order denying a new trial the defendant appeals.

[1] The first point made by the appellant is that the general demurrer should have been sustained. We think the point is well taken. It is a cardinal rule of pleading that a complaint must show upon its face an existing and ripened cause of action. The complaint in this case, after setting forth the facts regarding the issuance of the policy covering the property, and its transfer by several assignments from the original parties, insured to the plaintiff with the assent of the insurer, and after averring the occurrence of the fire and the destruction of the property at some unspecified time during the year 1912, proceeds to allege:

"That on the ——— day of May, 1912, plaintiff furnished the defendant with proof of his said loss and interest, and otherwise performed all the conditions of said policy on his part, that said defendant has not paid said loss or any part thereof, and that the same is long since due, owing, and unpaid according to the terms of said policy of insurance."

Then follows the prayer.

The difficulty with the plaintiff's pleading arises out of the fact that while he has made the policy in question a part of his complaint as an exhibit and by reference, he has not alleged the things which the policy requires to have been done subsequent to the presentation of his proof of loss, nor has he averred any facts with respect to the passage of the time which the policy requires must have elapsed before the loss became payable and his cause of action arose. The policy provides that after the insured has furnished the insurer with the proofs of his loss, the insurer must, within 20 days after the receipt thereof notify the insured in writing of its partial or total disagreement with the amount of loss claimed by him; and, in case the insurer fails to give such notice within the specified time, it shall be deemed to have assented to the amount of the loss claimed by the insured, but that if such notice shall have been given then within 10 days thereafter, the parties may agree upon the amount of the loss, and in the event they do not agree, an appraisment shall be made, upon the demand of the insurer, as to the loss or part of the loss about which the parties disagree. The policy also contains the following provision:

"Loss when payable: A loss hereunder shall be payable within thirty days after the amount thereof has been ascertained either by agreement or by appraisement; but if such ascertainment is not had or made within sixty days after the receipt by the company of the preliminary proof of loss then the loss shall be payable in ninety days after such receipt."

The foregoing conditions and provisions of the insurance policy upon which the plaintiff seeks to recover, having been expressly made a part of his complaint, it was incumbent upon the pleader to show upon the face of his complaint that the loss had ripened into a chose in action at the time the suit was begun. Gillon v. Northern Ins. Co., 127 Cal. 480, 483, 59 Pac. 901; McCormack v. Ins. Co., 78 Cal. 468, 21 Pac. 14; Cowan v. Ins. Co., 78 Cal. 181, 20 Pac. 408; Doyle v. Ins. Co., 44 Cal. 264; California Sav. Bank v. American Surety Co. (C. C.) 82 Fed. 866.

[2] The complaint avers that on the ——— day of May, 1912, plaintiff furnished defendant with the proofs of his loss. The transcript shows that the action was begun on the 15th day of June, 1912. For the purpose of testing the correctness of the ruling of the trial court upon the demurrer no presumption can be indulged in to fill the blank in the complaint as to the exact date of presentation of the proof of loss with a date earlier than 30 days before the date on which the suit was begun; nor can the pleader appeal to any presumption by which to supply the answer to the logical inquiry as to when, how, and whether the amount of the loss for which he sues was ever ascertained by any of the modes provided by the foregoing requirement of the policy, or whether, if so ascertained, the date of such ascertainment was at least 30 days before the date upon which the action was begun.

We are of the opinion that these were essential matters of averment in the plaintiff's complaint, and that they are not supplied by the allegation that the sum claimed "is long since due," for that is a mere conclusion of law. It follows that the general demurrer to the complaint herein should have been sustained, and that the order overruling it was error. Irwin v. Ins. Co. of North America, 16 Cal. App. 143, 116 Pac. 294.

[3] It is further contended by the appellant that the undisputed evidence in this case shows that the action was prematurely brought. In answer to this contention the respondent insists that the appellant cannot be heard to urge this point for the first time in this court. This might be a good objection if it were borne out by the record in the case; but, as we have already seen, this point was first presented by the general demurrer, which being overruled, the defendant again presented it in the denials of his answer, and also in the notice of motion for a new trial and in the specifications of error embraced in the bill of exceptions. How insistently the point may have been urged or how fully argued in the trial court we are not advised by the record; but we think there is enough in the record to warrant the appellant in insisting upon it here.

[4] The question thus presented is this: The evidence showed that the insured presented to the insurer his proofs of loss on the 12th day of May, 1912; that no objection to the amount of loss therein claimed was made by the insurer within the 20 days allowed to it by the terms of the policy, and that therefore, by its terms, the insurer must be held to have "assented to the amount of the loss" claimed by the insured in his proofs of loss. The action was commenced on June 15, 1912. The policy provides that the loss shall be payable in 30 days after the amount thereof has been ascertained, either by agreement or appraisement. The problem here presented is as to which date the assent of the insurer to the amount of loss claimed by the insured is referable, whether to the date of presentation of proofs of loss, or to a date 20 days thereafter, during which intervening time the insurer might have made its objection to the amount of loss claimed by the insured. If to the former date, then the loss was payable on and after the 12th of June, 1912; but if to the latter, it was not payable until July 1, 1912, in which case the action would have been prematurely brought. The court has not been furnished by either side with any authority bearing upon the construction to be given to the foregoing terms of this policy, and it assumes, therefore, that no such authority exists, and that it must rely solely upon reason to determine as to the date when the time within which this policy should be payable began to run.

The purpose of the policy in allowing the insurer 20 days after the presentation of the proofs of loss within which to signify its assent or objection to the amount claimed by the insured was doubtless that of allowing that time within which the insurer might make an investigation as to the propriety of assenting or objecting to the amount of the asserted claim of the insured; and, this being so, the insurer had the whole of the 20 days within which to manifest its assent or objection thereto; and if, as the result of such investigation and at the end of its allotted time the insurer had expressly assented to the plaintiff's asserted amount of loss, it could not be seriously disputed that, according to the terms of the policy, it would have had 30 days thereafter within which to pay the claim. Must not the same conclusion result from its implied assent? We think this logical deduction is irresistible, and hence that in the case before us the time within which the loss was to become payable began to run 20 days after the proven date of the presentation of the plaintiff's proof of loss. It follows necessarily that the present action was prematurely brought.

There are certain other points presented upon this appeal, but the two questions already disposed of, standing as they do upon the threshold of the case, render unnecessary any further discussion of alleged errors committed in the course of the trial.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are reversed.

PEOPLE v. IDEN. (Cr. 328.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. May 29, 1914. Rehearing Denied June 26, 1914; Denied by Supreme Court, July 28, 1914.)

1. Chattel Mortgages (§ 232*)—Offenses—Information.

The information charged that accused was the mortgagor of certain dairy cows, and that, after the giving of the mortgage in July, which was duly recorded, accused, in September, while the mortgage was in full force, sold the cattle to third persons, informing neither the purchaser of the mortgage nor the mortgagee of the sale. Pen. Code, § 538, makes the sale of mortgaged property without notice to the purchaser and service of written notice on the mortgagee an offense punishable as larceny. Held, that the information was sufficient under section 952, requiring an indictment to be direct and certain as to the offense charged and the particular circumstances charged the mortgage being referred to in such a manner that accused could tell which one was meant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Chattel Mortgages, Cent. Dig. §§ 484–487; Dec. Dig. § 232.*]

2. Chattel Mortgages (§ 233*)—Offenses—Evidence.

In a prosecution for the unlawful disposition of mortgaged cattle, evidence of the means other than the brand mark by which the mortgagee identified the cattle held admissible.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Chattel Mortgages, Cent. Dig. § 494; Dec. Dig. § 233.*]

3. Criminal Law (§ 1130*)—Appeal—Presentation of Grounds of Review.

Accused's brief should point out that part of the transcript in which an assigned error may be found.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 2956, 2965–2970, 3205; Dec. Dig. § 1130.*]

4. Chattel Mortgages (§ 233*)—Disposition of Mortgaged Property—Evidence—Admissibility.

In a prosecution for the unlawful disposition of mortgaged cattle, the exclusion of a question to the mortgagee as to whether he had not attempted to dispose of the same cattle was not error.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Chattel Mortgages, Cent. Dig. § 494; Dec. Dig. § 233.*]

5. Chattel Mortgages (§ 230*)—Disposition of Mortgaged Property—Defenses.

It is no defense to a prosecution for the unlawful sale of mortgaged property to show that the mortgagor afterwards discharged the mortgage.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Chattel Mortgages, Cent. Dig. §§ 489–493; Dec. Dig. § 230.*]

6. Chattel Mortgages (§ 233*)—Disposition of Mortgaged Property—Defenses.

In a prosecution for selling mortgaged cattle in violation of Pen. Code, § 538, requiring the mortgagor to give written notice to the mortgagee of his intention to sell, evidence that the mortgagee told the mortgagor to sell the cattle, and that he was his agent, was properly excluded; no question of agency being applicable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Chattel Mortgages, Cent. Dig. § 494; Dec. Dig. § 233.*]

7. Witnesses (§ 277*)—Cross-Examination—Rebuttal.

In a prosecution for the unlawful disposition of mortgaged cattle, where accused testified to facts in effect showing that the mortgage was not intended to be operative, and that the mortgagee was really indebted to him, the state could cross-examine accused as to matters tending to show the validity of the mortgage.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. §§ 925, 979–983; Dec. Dig. § 277.*]

8. Chattel Mortgages (§ 230*)—Disposition of Mortgaged Property—Defenses.

In a prosecution for the unlawful disposition of mortgaged cattle, it is no defense that the mortgage was intended to be used as an accommodation mortgage; for, as such use contemplated a transfer by the mortgagee to a third person, the mortgagor was not relieved of the duty of giving the notice required by Pen. Code, § 538.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Chattel Mortgages, Cent. Dig. §§ 489–493; Dec. Dig. § 230.*]

9. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 829*)—APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR.

Where the court charged that the jury was the judge of the credibility of the witnesses, and that accused was a competent witness in his own behalf, the refusal of a requested instruction that a witness is presumed to speak the truth, that the presumption extends to accused, and that the jury is the exclusive judge of the credibility of the witnesses was not prejudicial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 2011; Dec. Dig. § 829.*]

10. CHATTEL MORTGAGES (§ 232*)—DISPOSITION OF MORTGAGED CHATTELS—PROSECUTION—INFORMATION.

Though the information charging an unlawful sale of mortgaged chattels averred that it was made with intent to defraud the mortgagee, the jury need not find that fact, for Pen. Code, § 538, declaring the sale of mortgaged chattels without notice to the mortgagee to be larceny, does not make intent a part of the offense; and hence the averment in the information was surplusage.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; J. A. Allen, Judge.

W. A. Iden was convicted of the disposition of mortgaged property without notice to the purchaser or mortgagee, and he appeals. Affirmed.

J. S. Clack, of Visalia, J. C. Thomas and E. G. Soule, both of Sacramento, Edwards & Smith, of Dinuba, and E. J. Fleming and B. F. Woodard, both of Los Angeles, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., George Beebe, Deputy Atty. Gen., Frank Lamberson, Dist. Atty., and James M. Burke, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of Visalia, for the People.

CONREY, P. J. [1] On information filed by the district attorney of Tulare county the defendant was accused of the crime of felony committed as follows: It was charged that the defendant, on or about the 26th day of September, 1912, at said county, was the mortgagor of the following described personal property, to wit: 25 head of dairy cows, 21 head of which said cows were branded "I" on the left hip, and which said personal property was then and there located on certain real property described in the information, all of which said personal property had been theretofore mortgaged by said W. A. Iden and his wife to one E. A. Stellar by a mortgage dated July 18, 1912, to secure the payment of the sum of $3,500 by the mortgagors to the mortgagee, and which said mortgage had been, on August 16, 1912, duly recorded, and was on said 26th day of September, 1912, in full force and effect; that on said last-named date the defendant at said county did willfully, etc., and with intent to defraud said Stellar, sell and transfer all of said mortgaged personal property to M. P. Costa and Lucy Seimas, "and the said W. A. Iden did not then or there, or at any other time, or at all, inform said M. P. Costa and Lucy Seimas, or either of them of the existence of said prior mortgage, and the said W. A. Iden did not then or there, or at any other time or at all, inform said E. A. Stellar, mortgagee as aforesaid, of said personal property, in writing, of said intended sale and transfer by giving the name and place of residence, or either of them, of the party to whom said sale and transfer was to be made"; and at the time of said sale the said personal property, to wit, said cows, were of the value of $47.50 per head, etc. The defendant, having been convicted after trial on this information and his plea of not guilty, appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The first proposition urged in behalf of defendant is that the information does not charge a public offense in that "it fails to charge the offense alleged to have been committed under section 538" of the Penal Code, and that it does not meet the requirements of section 952 of the Penal Code by directly and certainly alleging the particular circumstances of the offense charged. The demurrer to the information stated these objections, and especially set forth that "the information nowhere alleges that these were all the cows in the said mortgage, and, if not all, it nowhere alleges in said information which cows, nor does it give the description therein alleged to have been made."

The information was sufficient, and set forth the particular facts of the offense charged with all necessary certainty. The mortgage was referred to in such terms that the defendant could not be at any disadvantage in knowing whether it was the mortgage which had been made by him. If he had not made it, that fact alone would be his complete defense. If he had made the mortgage, then he would know whether 25 cows were all or less than all of the mortgaged cows. If the mortgage described more than 25 cows, then under this information he was not told which ones of the total number mortgaged he was charged with having unlawfully sold. But this was an item of evidence, and not an essential element in description of the offense charged. The case is appropriate for application of the rule stated in People v. Platt, 67 Cal. 21, 7 Pac. 1, where the court said:

> "We think the defendant is sufficiently apprised by the information of the charge which he must be prepared to meet on the trial. If innocent, there is no more danger of his being convicted than there would be if the property had been described with the greatest minuteness, although his chance of escape, if guilty, might have been much better if it had been so described."

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

The first and principal witness for the prosecution was the mortgagee, E. A. Stellar. The mortgage was received in evidence, and in it the cows and heifers are separately described, and are consecutively listed by numbers from 1 to 116. There appear to have been 73 cows and 43 heifers. The note and mortgage are dated July 18, 1912, and the note by its terms was to mature July 18, 1913. The affidavit to the mortgage was subscribed and sworn to by all the parties on July 19th, and was acknowledged by the mortgagors before a notary on July 19, 1912. There was also a form of acknowledgment before the notary by E. A. Stellar on August 10, 1912, and the mortgage was recorded in Tulare county on August 16, 1912.

The witness Stellar testified that on August 3, 1912, he went with the defendant to a place known as the Sherman ranch, and an adjacent 80 acres which had been leased by Stellar to the defendant, there being a road between the two places; he took the mortgage and compared the stock that were described in the mortgage with the stock that he viewed; that about 100 of the animals were in one field, and the others were on the leased land above mentioned; that he saw the cattle there, and that he and the defendant both saw them and discussed them there together. Stellar further testified that afterwards, on the 10th of August, 1913, he saw, on the ranch of Mrs. Lucy Seimas in Kings county, 28 of the cattle that were placed under that mortgage; that he identified them by the description contained in a certified copy of the mortgage which he had with him. The witness then gave the numbers as given in the mortgage, of 22 of these cattle, and gave testimony in detail concerning the marks thereon. He further stated that he did not, on the 26th day of September, 1912, or at any time, receive any notice in writing or otherwise from the defendant, or any other person, of any intended sale of any cattle named in that mortgage, or of the name and place of residence of any person to whom they were to be sold.

It was admitted by the defendant that on September, 26, 1912, he sold 30 cows to M. P. Costa and Lucy Seimas, but denied that any of them were cows that had been included in the mortgage. It was proved by the testimony of Costa that the defendant did not give to Costa or Seimas any information of the existence of a prior mortgage on the cattle sold to them. In addition to the defendant's denial that those cattle were covered by the Stellar mortgage, the defendant claims that he had a right to make sales of the mortgaged cattle without giving the notices required by the Penal Code, first, because at the time of the sale defendant did not owe Stellar anything on the mortgage, and also because Stellar gave him an oral permission to do so. The numerous specifications of error set forth in the briefs for appellant relate almost entirely to rulings by which the court limited the cross-examination of Stellar and the direct examination of the defendant by his counsel upon matters which they claimed were relevant to these lines of defense.

[2] The defendant objected to the introduction of testimony by which Stellar described the cattle that he saw on the Seimas place and identified them by other marks in addition to the "I" on the left hip. Defendant claims that the overruling of this objection was a flagrant error, but we are unable to perceive any reason why the court should have refused to receive any testimony descriptive of the property, by which the witness was enabled to say that it was the same which he had previously identified in connection with the making of the mortgage. The objection is without merit.

[3] It is contended by appellant that the court erred in refusing to permit him to introduce evidence showing that the mortgage debt had been paid, but the pages of the transcript cited in the brief contain nothing that relates to the point suggested. We are not under obligation to search through 750 pages of transcript to find something which might prove the alleged error. We do find, however, that the court did several times assure defendant's counsel that if they had any evidence showing that the mortgage was paid, or that the defendant was authorized to sell the property, they might present such evidence. The difficulty experienced by the defendant in the introduction of his testimony along this line arose out of the fact that his counsel persistently offered questions designed to show that the mortgage was paid by transactions subsequent to September 26, 1912, and that ultimately the mortgagee did not lose anything by reason of defendant's acts in diminishing the security.

[4, 5] On defendant's cross-examination of the mortgagee (the witness Stellar) the court sustained the objection made to a question in which the witness was asked to state what cattle those were which in answer to the next preceding question he had said that he was preparing to sell in August, 1913. The ruling was correct. The charge against the defendant was that on September 26, 1912, the defendant had sold a part of the mortgaged cattle without giving the information required by the statute. Even if in August, 1913, the mortgagee undertook to sell the same cows which the defendant was charged with selling wrongfully in 1912, such proceeding by the mortgagee would have no bearing upon the truth of the facts charged against the defendant, or the guilt or innocence of the defendant. And if the object was to show that ultimately the mortgagee obtained full payment of the debt, that also was immaterial. The case against the defendant was to be determined by two facts, both relating to September 26, 1912, namely, whether the mortgage debt was unpaid and whether the defendant sold some of the mortgaged cows in the manner and under the circumstances charged in the information.

The record does not sustain appellant's claim that the court erred in refusing to hear evidence about partnership transactions between Stellar and defendant, Iden. Counsel for defendant say they would have shown that the mortgage was only an "accommodation mortgage." The court, while declining to allow "extended examination or hearing of evidence as to partnership deals," further said:

> "If you have any special transaction which shows that the mortgage was paid, or that the defendant was authorized to sell the property, you can do so."

This gave the defendant ample liberty to develop this line of defense. The defendant was allowed to testify on this subject, and stated that at the time this mortgage was made Stellar was indebted to him in the sum of $7,600; that the mortgage was made as an accommodation mortgage; that Stellar was to care for it; that the defendant never received from Stellar any money on the mortgage, except the sum of $2,000.

The court did not err in sustaining the objections made on cross-examination of Mr. Stellar to questions asking the witness whether he had not stated, in August, 1913, that, owing to certain deals which he had made with Mr. Iden, he had not lost anything on him, and would not lose anything on him. The court held that:

> "The payment of the mortgage after the offense is committed, if it was committed, does not constitute any defense to the action."

It would scarcely need authorities to support this ruling, but the rule has been affirmed under a similar statute in Alabama. Steed v. Knowles, 79 Ala. 446; Nixon v. State, 55 Ala. 120.

[6] The court was justified in striking from the record testimony of the defendant that in the first week of August, 1912, the defendant said to Stellar that defendant would have to sell some cows to care for the rest of his cattle, and that Mr. Stellar replied:

> "Sell the cows. You are my agent up here and I am your agent down there. Whatever you do is all right. I will take care of that mortgage."

The only reason given by defendant's counsel in response to the motion to strike was, "We are relying on agency." The Penal Code, § 538, defining the offense charged herein, requires that in making a sale of mortgaged chattels the mortgagor must, at or before making the sale, inform the prior mortgagee in writing by giving the name and place of residence of the party to whom the sale is to be made, and must also inform the purchaser of the existence of the prior mortgage. Defendant had a right to sell his cattle without permission of the mortgagee, by giving the information as required by law. No question of agency was applicable to the transaction.

[7, 8] On cross-examination of the defendant by the prosecuting attorney, the court did not err in admitting questions designed to meet the direct testimony of the defendant that at the time when defendant made this mortgage to Stellar there was an indebtedness then existing of $7,600, owing from Stellar to Iden. Counsel for defendant in their brief say that this statement had been stricken from the record, but the record shows the contrary. The fact thus asserted by defendant was connected with his claim that the mortgage was made for accommodation and did not represent a real debt. The prosecution was therefore entitled to inquire of defendant concerning other transactions preceding the execution of this mortgage, and apparently inconsistent with his testimony about the $7,600. Moreover, the claim of defendant that this mortgage was given "for accommodation" implies that the note and mortgage were made to be pledged or otherwise used in some business transaction, and the maker of such a mortgage is no more excused from observing the provisions of the Penal Code than is the maker of any other chattel mortgage. Further, it should be noted that during an argument to the court (the jury having been excused in order that such argument might be freely made) the defendant's attorneys were endeavoring to establish their claim of right to show transactions between Stellar and Iden subsequent to the date of the alleged crime, and their claim then was that certain of those transactions resulted in "paying off the Iden mortgage down to within something like $200 and $300." The court, while ruling out these subsequent transactions, stated to defendant's counsel:

> "If you can show that Mr. Iden ever received any money on this mortgage—that it was paid at the time it was made, or before it was made—you may show it."

The court very correctly held to the fact that this case was a prosecution by the state for a public offense, and not a settlement of accounts between Stellar and the defendant.

The instruction given to the jury on the subject of reasonable doubt is the standard instruction given and approved innumerable times. It does not contradict the instruction offered by defendant on the same subject, but substantially agrees with it, and the court's action, both with respect to the instruction given and the instruction refused, is approved.

[9] The following instruction was offered on behalf of defendant and refused by the court:

> "A witness is presumed to speak the truth. This presumption applies to the defendant when he becomes a witness in his own behalf. But this presumption applying to any witness in the case, whether he or she be the defendant or not, or whether the witness is interested or not interested in the case or the result, may be repelled by the manner in which he or she testifies, by the character of his or her testimony, or by his or her motives, or by contradictory evidence, when such contradictory evidence is on > a material issue of the case. You are instructed that your power of judging of the effect of evidence is not arbitrary, but to be exercised with legal discretion and in subordination to rules of evidence. The jury are the exclusive judges of the credibility of the witnesses and the weight to be given their testimony."

The principal part of the foregoing instruction follows the language of section 1847 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and no reason has been suggested showing why it should not have been given. We observe, however, in the instructions given by the court, that the jury was told that to the jury exclusively belongs the duty of weighing the evidence and determining the credibility of the witnesses, that the defendant was a competent witness in his own behalf, and a very full statement was made of the matters to be considered by the jury in determining the weight to be given to the testimony of a witness. In view of all these instructions given, the omission to give the requested instruction was without prejudice to any substantial right of the defendant.

[10] Finally, it is claimed on behalf of the defendant that the court erred in refusing to instruct the jury that in order to convict the defendant, they must be morally certain, not only that the defendant sold to the persons mentioned in the information, and at the time and place therein stated, one or more of the cows described therein, but that they must be satisfied to a moral certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant sold and delivered such cow or cows "with the intent in him to defraud the mortgagee named in said mortgage." In People v. Wolfrom, 15 Cal. App. 732, 115 Pac. 1088, the language of section 538 of the Penal Code is construed with reference to the phrase "intent to defraud," as contained therein. We agree with the opinion there expressed that that part of section 538 which refers to the selling of mortgaged property does not make the intent with which the act is done an indispensable element of the offense, and that:

> "When the intent is not made an affirmative element of the crime, the law imputes that the act knowingly done was with criminal intent, and it need not be alleged nor proven."

As was said in People v. O'Brien, 96 Cal. 171, 31 Pac. 45:

> "When an act, in general terms, is made indictable, a criminal intent need not be shown, unless from the language or effects of the law a purpose to require the existence of such intent can be discovered."

So in the information in the case at bar, although it was therein set forth that the acts and omissions of the defendant were "with intent to defraud E. A. Stellar," this was a superfluous clause in the allegation, and the proof made of the said acts and omissions of the defendant carried with it a necessary implication of intent to defraud both the mortgagee and the purchasers of the mortgaged property.

The judgment and the order denying a new trial are affirmed.

We concur: JAMES, J.; SHAW, J.

JACKS v. TAYLOR, County Treasurer.

(Civ. 1343.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. June 2, 1914. Rehearing Denied July 2, 1914; Denied by Supreme Court July 31, 1914.)

1. Counties (§ 206*)—Allowance of Claim—Conclusiveness—Jurisdiction.

The allowance of a claim against a county by the board of supervisors is not conclusive on the right to enforce payment, where the board was without jurisdiction to consider the claim.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Counties, Cent. Dig. §§ 322, 323, 325–330; Dec. Dig. § 206.*]

2. Counties (§ 206*)—Refusal to Pay Approved Claim—Mandamus—Defense.

In mandamus to compel the county treasurer to pay a claim allowed by the board of supervisors, the board's want of jurisdiction to consider the claim may be pleaded as a defense.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Counties, Cent. Dig. §§ 322, 323, 325–330; Dec. Dig. § 206.*]

3. Counties (§ 200*)—Allowance of Claim—Jurisdiction of Board—Prerequisites.

Compliance with Pol. Code, § 4076, providing that no account shall be passed on by the county board of supervisors unless filed three days prior to the meeting at which it is to be allowed, is a prerequisite to the board's jurisdiction to allow claims; the purpose being to permit examination of claims that intelligent opposition may be made under section 4074, allowing any person to oppose allowance of any claim.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Counties, Cent. Dig. § 315; Dec. Dig. § 200.*]

4. Mandamus (§ 165*) — Proceedings — Answer—Demurrer.

In mandamus to compel a county treasurer to pay a claim allowed by the board of supervisors, an answer stating that it appeared from the indorsements on the claim "that it was not filed with a clerk * * * or with said board for three days prior to the * * * regular session at which it was to be allowed, but that said claim was presented * * * on said 6th day of January, 1913, and was * * * approved and ordered paid * * * on said 6th day of January 1913," was not subject to a general demurrer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mandamus, Cent. Dig. §§ 360½–364; Dec. Dig. § 165.*]

5. Counties (§ 168*) — Approved Claim — Payment—Duty of Treasurer.

Since Pol. Code, § 4041, authorizes the county board of supervisors to approve only such accounts as are "legally" chargeable against the county, the county treasurer may refuse to pay warrants known to him to have been drawn for claims not authorized by law, though such claims have been approved by the board.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Counties, Cent. Dig. §§ 250–254; Dec. Dig. § 168.*]

6. Counties (§ 111*)—Contracts by Grand Jury—Validity—Examination of Books.

Under Civ. Code, § 1667, providing that "that is not lawful which is contrary to an express provision of the law," a contract by the grand jury employing an expert to examine the books of county officers is illegal, where it is in direct disregard of Pen. Code, § 928, providing that such expert shall be employed "at an agreed compensation not to exceed ten dollars a day, to be first approved by the court."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Counties, Cent. Dig. §§ 174, 181; Dec. Dig. § 111.*]

7. Counties (§ 206*)—Approved Claim—Legality.

A claim against a county for services performed under an illegal contract with the grand jury in examining the books of county officers is illegal, though it has been allowed by the board of supervisors.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Counties, Cent. Dig. §§ 322, 323, 325–330; Dec. Dig. § 206.*]

8. Mandamus (§ 187*)—Appeal—Objection to Pleading—Presentation Below.

An objection that the answer of defendant in mandamus contained uncertainties, ambiguities, and conclusions of law could not be considered on appeal, where no special demurrer or motion to strike out was presented below.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mandamus, Cent. Dig. §§ 427–437; Dec. Dig. § 187.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Monterey County; B. V. Sargent, Judge.

Mandamus by Will Jacks against James Taylor, as County Treasurer of Monterey County. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed, with directions.

Chas. B. Rosendale, of Salinas, for appellant. Daugherty & Lacey, of Salinas, for respondent.

LENNON, P. J. This is a proceeding in mandamus. The petitioner in the court below will hereinafter be referred to as the plaintiff, and the respondent in that court as the defendant.

The plaintiff prayed for and procured a judgment, commanding the defendant, James Taylor, as the treasurer of Monterey county, to pay to the plaintiff, as the assignee of one Anson Herrick, the sum of $3,500, which the petition for the writ alleged had been previously allowed and ordered paid by the board of supervisors of said county to said Herrick, as the assignee of Lester, Herrick & Herrick, for services rendered between August 11, 1912, and November 19, 1912, in "experting the official books and records of the various county and district officers of Monterey county." The petition further alleged that the claim in controversy was indorsed, countersigned, certified, and attested in the usual and ordinary form by the clerk, and chairman of the board of supervisors, and then presented to the county auditor, who, in turn, indorsed thereon his warrant to the defendant, as treasurer, duly signed, and attested, and then delivered the same to plaintiff's assignor; that thereafter said claim, with the warrant indorsed thereon, was for a valuable consideration assigned to plaintiff, who presented the same for payment to the defendant as treasurer, but the latter refused payment, notwithstanding the fact that there was at all times sufficient unappropriated money in the fund out of which the claim was allowed and ordered paid.

The defendant in his answer admitted all of the allegations of the petition, save and except the alleged assignment of the claim in controversy to plaintiff. Defendant, however, further answering, averred, among other things, in substance, that the claim in controversy was based upon a contract between the grand jury of Monterey county and the firm of Lester, Herrick & Herrick for the experting of the county books; that said contract was illegal and void in the particulars that it "was not first approved by the court as prescribed by section 928 of the Penal Code of the state of California, and that said contract was for a sum in excess of ten dollars per day for an expert, and that said contract was in excess of $5 per day for each assistant of said expert, as provided by section 928 of said Penal Code"; that said claim did not contain an itemized statement of the services rendered; that said claim was allowed at a regular meeting of the board commencing upon the 4th day of January, and ending on the 6th day of January, 1913; that it appeared from the indorsements on said claim "that it was not filed with the clerk of said board of supervisors or with said board of supervisors for three days prior to the commencement of said regular session at which it was to be allowed; but that said claim was presented to said board of supervisors on said 6th day of January, 1913, and was acted upon and allowed and approved and ordered paid * * * on the said 6th day of January, 1913."

The plaintiff demurred to the defendant's answer solely upon the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a defense. The lower court sustained the demurrer without leave to amend, and thereupon rendered and entered judgment for the plaintiff, from which an appeal has been taken upon the judgment roll.

[1] We are of the opinion that the demurrer was wrongfully sustained. It is not disputed that when passing upon the correctness of the claim in controversy the board of supervisors was sitting and acting as a quasi judicial body, and that therefore its conclusion that such claim should be allowed and paid was an adjudication which, when supplemented by the warrant of the auditor, would ordinarily be final and conclusive upon the defendant as treasurer. Admittedly this is the settled and general rule in this state; but the rule presupposes jurisdiction in the board to consider the claim at all. The mere presentation of the claim was not sufficient to clothe the board with jurisdictional power to consider and allow the same; nor did the order for its allowance ipso facto operate to forever foreclose consideration of the question as to whether or not the board did, in fact, have the requisite jurisdiction. Walton v. McPhetridge, 120 Cal. 440, 52 Pac. 731.

[2] It was the duty of the defendant as county treasurer to refuse payment if, upon the face of the claim, it appeared that the board did not have jurisdiction to consider the same; and therefore such apparent lack of jurisdiction might be properly pleaded as a defense to the writ. Carroll v. Siebenthaler, 37 Cal. 193; Von Schmidt v. Widber, 105 Cal. 151, 38 Pac. 682; Ventura County v. Clay, 114 Cal. 242, 46 Pac. 9; Power v. May, 114 Cal. 207, 46 Pac. 6.

Section 4041 of the Political Code declares that "boards of supervisors, * * * shall have jurisdiction and power, under such limitations and restrictions as are prescribed by law, * * * to examine, settle and allow all accounts legally chargeable against the county." Section 4075 of the same Code provides that the board "must not hear or consider any claim in favor of any * * * person, * * * or allow any claim or bill against the county * * * unless the same be itemized, giving names, dates and particular services rendered, * * * character of work done, number of days engaged, etc. * * * If, in case of any claim which requires itemizing, the board do not hear or consider the same because it is not itemized, they shall cause notice to be given to the claimant or his attorney of that fact, and give time to have the claim itemized and reverified." The following section provides that "no account shall be passed upon by the board, unless * * * filed with the clerk three days prior to the time of the meeting * * * at which it is * * * to be allowed."

While the language of section 4075 of the Political Code, requiring an itemization of claims against the county, is at the outset apparently mandatory in making compliance with such requirement essential to the jurisdiction of the board to even consider such a claim, nevertheless the proviso in the concluding clause of the same section would indicate that compliance with the requirement is directory, and therefore not essential to the board's jurisdiction to pass upon and allow claims against the county. County of Colusa v. Welch, 122 Cal. 428, 55 Pac. 243.

If this be so, then, with reference to the allegation that the claim in controversy was not itemized, the lower court was correct in holding that the answer of the defendant did not state facts sufficient to constitute a defense.

[3] The same reasoning, however, cannot be applied to section 4076, which provides that "no account shall be passed upon by the board, unless * * * filed with the clerk three days prior to the time of the meeting of the board at which it is * * * to be allowed." This language is mandatory in character; and nothing to the contrary elsewhere appearing, must be held to mean that compliance with its terms is a prerequisite to the jurisdiction of the board to consider and allow claims against the county. "Any person may appear before the board and oppose the allowance of any claim or demand made against the county." Section 4074, Pol. Code.

Plainly the primary purpose of the statute in this particular is to permit a public and timely examination of all claims which may have been presented to the board for allowance, in order that subsequent opposition to their payment may, if necessary, be intelligently and effectively made. The provisions of the statute immediately under consideration are analogous in their essential features to a statute of the state of Nevada which required boards of supervisors, upon the filing of a protest by any citizen, to suspend for a period of ten days the consideration of a claim against the county, when, unless in the meantime court proceedings had been instituted to test its validity, the board might proceed to consider such claim. The Supreme Court of the state of Nevada, when construing this statute, said, in effect, that the filing of objections to a claim or demand against the county operated to suspend the jurisdiction of the board for at least ten days, and declared that this was so because the board of supervisors was "a tribunal with limited jurisdiction, and possessed only of quasi judicial powers, and cannot proceed except in strict accordance with the mode provided by statute. It has no right or authority to adopt any other mode than that provided for and pointed out by the statute. It possesses no common-law jurisdiction or powers. The statute is its guide, and a strict adherence to it is essential. All the authorities are to this effect, and there can be no safety in any other rule." State v. Gallagher, 22 Nev. 80, 35 Pac. 485.

This language may be pertinently applied to the statute before us; and a parity of reasoning, we think, compels the conclusion that the requirement relative to the time within which a claim must be filed before it can be considered by the board is a condition precedent to the jurisdiction of the board to hear and determine such claim.

[4] In the present case it was the apparent purpose of the answer of the defendant to plead as a defense to the writ that the claim in controversy showed upon its face that it had been prematurely considered, and that, as a consequence, the board was without jurisdiction to order its payment. As against a general demurrer, we think this defense was sufficiently well pleaded to require a hearing upon the merits.

[5] This brings us to a consideration of that portion of the defendant's answer which purports to plead, in effect, that the board was without jurisdiction in the premises because the claim in controversy was founded upon a contract which was, in effect, illegal. "The board shall have jurisdiction * * * to examine, settle and allow accounts legally chargeable against the county" (section 4041, Pol. Code); and the defendant, as county treasurer, is by law required to pay only such warrants as are founded upon orders of the board of supervisors for the payment of claims legally chargeable against the county. He may and should refuse to pay warrants known by him to have been drawn for claims not authorized by law (Perry v. Ames, 26 Cal. 372; Kelly v. Seranous, 114 Cal. xvi, 46 Pac. 299; Linden v. Case, 46 Cal. 171; Von Schmidt v. Widber, supra; L. A. County v. Lankershim, 100 Cal. 525, 35 Pac. 153, 556).

[6] Section 928 of the Penal Code makes it the duty of the grand jury annually to make a complete examination of the books, records and accounts of all county officers, "and if, in their judgment, the services of an expert are necessary, they shall have power to employ one, at an agreed compensation, not to exceed ten dollars a day, to be first approved by the court; and if, in their judgment, the services of assistants to such expert are required, they shall have power to employ such, at a compensation to be agreed upon and approved by the court, not to exceed, however, five dollars a day for each assistant." It will thus be seen that the power of a grand jury to make a contract for the services of an expert and such assistants as may be necessary, is not only limited in price to a designated per diem, but that the approval of the court is expressly made a condition precedent to the execution of such contract.

"That is not lawful which is contrary to an express provision of the law" (Civ. Code, § 1667); and the general principle is well established that a contract is illegal which is made in direct disregard of the provisions of a statute which provides for and regulates the making of such contract. (1 Dillon's Municipal Corp., § 457 [3d Ed.]; Wiegel v. Pulaski County, 61 Ark. 74, 32 S. W. 116; King v. Mahaska County, 75 Iowa, 329, 39 N. W. 636; Jefferson County v. Arrighi, 54 Miss. 668; Maupin v. Franklin County, 67 Mo. 327; Tullock v. Webster County, 46 Neb. 211, 64 N. W. 705; Brady v. New York, 20 N. Y. 312; Tomlinson v. Hopkins County, 57 Tex. 572; Murphy v. Napa County, 20 Cal. 497).

Applying this general principle to the contract upon which the claim in controversy is alleged to have been founded, there is no escape from the conclusion, it seems to us, that such contract was illegal.

[7] Being so, it follows as a necessary consequence that the claim based thereon was also illegal (Perry v. Ames, 26 Cal. 372), and that therefore the board of supervisors had no jurisdiction to allow it (Keller v. Hyde, 20 Cal. 593). The mere fact that the claim was allowed by the board did not invest it with a validity which it did not theretofore possess. Phelan v. San Francisco, 6 Cal. 531; Gardner v. Tatum, 81 Cal. 370, 22 Pac. 880; Santa Cruz, etc., v. Broderick, 113 Cal. 628, 45 Pac. 863; Berka v. Woodward, 125 Cal. 119, 57 Pac. 777, 45 L. R. A. 420, 73 Am. St. Rep. 31; Wiegel v. Pulaski County, supra. The original illegality of the claim in controversy constituted a good defense to the writ (Keller v. Hyde, supra; Power v. May, 114 Cal. 207, 46 Pac. 6); and if such claim was upon its face and in fact illegal, "then indubitably the treasurer was authorized to refuse payment and to show this in his answer." (Power v. May, supra).

[8] In the absence of a special demurrer and a motion to strike out, the plaintiff will not be heard to complain of the uncertainties, ambiguities, and conclusions of law which run throughout the answer of the defendant. Despite these manifest defects in pleading, we are satisfied that, upon the whole, the answer of the defendant, as against a general demurrer, states facts sufficient to constitute a defense to the writ. Power v. May, supra.

The judgment appealed from is reversed, with instructions to the lower court to overrule the demurrer.

We concur: RICHARDS, J.; KERRIGAN, J.

PEOPLE v. WILLIAMS. (Cr. 243.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 29, 1914.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 759*)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS.

In a prosecution for rape, the refusal of an instruction that certain facts raised a presumption that no rape was committed, was proper; for, under Code Civ. Proc. § 2061, subd. 2, a presumption is evidence, and Const. art. 6, § 19, forbids the court to charge the jury with respect to matters of fact.

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 829*)—INSTRUCTIONS—REQUESTS—REFUSAL.

The refusal of an instruction that the jury, in considering the weight of the testimony of the prosecutrix, in a rape case, should consider the circumstances is not error, where the court charged that the prosecutrix's testimony should be carefully scanned, and that, while corroboration was not necessary, the jury must find, beyond a reasonable doubt, that accused had sexual connection with the prosecutrix; this being particularly true as the surrounding circumstances tended to support prosecutrix's testimony.

3. RAPE (§ 2*)—STATUTORY RAPE—STATUTES—REPEAL.

At the time of a statutory rape on a girl below the age of 16, Pen. Code, § 261, made it rape to have sexual intercourse with a female under the age of 16 years not the wife of the perpetrator, but before trial the age of consent was raised to 18 by St. 1913, p. 212, and by St. 1913, p. 213, section 264, Pen. Code, prescribing the punishment, was materially changed. Held that, as Pol. Code, § 329, provides that the repeal of any law creating a criminal offense shall not be a bar to the punishment of an act already committed, unless such intention is expressed in the repealing act, accused might be convicted under the prior statute, though it was repealed by the act of 1913.

Appeal from Superior Court, Siskiyou County; James F. Lodge, Judge.

John Williams was convicted of rape upon a girl under the age of 16 years, and he appeals from the judgment and from an order denying new trial. Affirmed.

B. K. Collier, of Yreka, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Defendant was convicted of the crime of rape upon a girl under the age of 16 years, and was sentenced to imprisonment for the term of 5 years. He appeals from the judgment and from the order denying his motion for a new trial.

It is not contended that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict. Briefly, the evidence was that defendant, with numerous other persons, including the prosecuting witness and her mother, attended a ball on New Year's eve, 1913; that the party broke up about 3 o'clock January 1st, and defendant walked part of the way from the place where the ball was conducted with the prosecuting witness and her mother towards her home; that the mother left the daughter and defendant at the gate of a neighbor's premises and went on to her residence; that defendant and the prosecuting witness were at this neighbor's house alone some little time, during which they sat on the porch of the premises where the alleged crime was committed. A family was living in this house, but whether any of its members were awake at that early hour of the morning does not appear.

[1] 1. The following instruction offered by defendant was refused, and the ruling is alleged as error, especially, as is claimed, in view of the testimony of the prosecuting witness that defendant used some physical force in accomplishing his object. She testified also that he overcame her by having first aroused her passions, which deprived her of the power of resistance. She also testified that she made no outcry, and did not until some time later inform her mother of the assault. The instruction is as follows:

"If the jury believe from the evidence that at the time of the alleged rape other people were at the same time in the same house, who might easily have heard her had she made any outcry, and that she, in fact, made no outcry at the time the defendant was attempting to have connection with her, these facts will tend to raise a presumption that no rape was committed upon her at the time."

Defendant cites People v. Howard, 143 Cal. 316, 76 Pac. 1116, where it is claimed a somewhat similar instruction was refused. The decision was in bank. The instruction was not commented upon in the main opinion but, in a concurring opinion by the Chief Justice, speaking of one part, he said: The "instruction contains a proposition that might very properly have been given to the jury if it had been clearly stated by itself." That is, the failure to made outcry might be considered "with all the other evidence in determining the credibility of such witness and whether a rape was, in fact, committed or not." The instruction refused in the present case was addressed to the fact that she made no outcry when there were persons in the house "who might easily have heard her had she made an outcry," which, it is claimed, would "tend to raise a presumption that no rape was committed upon her at the time." The difference between the two instructions is obvious. A presumption is evidence, and may outweigh the positive evidence of witnesses against it. Code Civ. Proc. § 2061, subd. 2; People v. Milner, 122 Cal. 171, 179, 54 Pac. 833; Estes v. Ballard, 22 Cal. App. 344, 349, 134 Pac. 361. To say that certain facts raise a presumption that no rape was committed is equivalent to saying that the facts constitute evidence that no rape was committed. But the court is forbidden to charge the jury "with respect to matters of fact." Const. art. 6, § 19.

The law is well settled that it is immaterial whether the prosecuting witness consented or was forced to submit. Her failure to make any outcry furnished no presumption that a rape was not committed.

[2] 2. The following instruction asked by defendant was refused:

"In this case the prosecution relies for a conviction upon the testimony of Belle Dollarhide, the prosecuting witness, and no other witnesses were called by the prosecution to testify directly to the time and place or circumstances of the alleged offense; and you are instructed, in cases where the prosecution relies upon the uncorroborated testimony of the prosecutrix, unsustained by other evidence, or by facts and circumstances corroborating it, that you should view such testimony with great caution. You are further instructed that in considering her testimony you may take into consideration the facts and circumstances surrounding the place where the alleged offense is charged to have been committed. All the facts and circumstances at the time and immediately after the alleged offense was committed, in determining the weight of her testimony, and the reasonableness thereof, as tending to show to your minds the credit to be given to the same."

---

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

The court gave an instruction as follows:

> "It is not essential to a conviction in this case that the prosecutrix, Isabelle Dollarhide, should be corroborated by the testimony of other witnesses as to the particular acts constituting the offense. It is sufficient if you believe from her evidence and all the other testimony and circumstances in proof in the case beyond a reasonable doubt that the crime charged has been committed. While it is the law that the testimony of the prosecuting witness should be carefully scanned, still this does not mean that such evidence is never sufficient to convict; by the law of this state, a female child under the age of 16 years is incapable of giving legal consent to an act of sexual intercourse, so that every act of carnal connection with such a child by one not her husband will constitute the crime of rape, whether with or without the consent of such child, and in this case, if you believe from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant had sexual connection with the prosecuting witness on or about the 1st day of January, 1913, as alleged in the information, and that at the time she was under the age of 16 years, and not the wife of the defendant, then the defendant is guilty of rape, and the jury should so find."

By this latter instruction the defendant had the benefit substantially of all he asked in the refused instruction. The circumstances immediately after the alleged offense tended, we think, to corroborate the testimony of the prosecuting witness, rather than to discredit it. It appeared, by the testimony of defendant, as well as by others of the parties present, that the prosecuting witness and defendant and a young man and another girl went into the unoccupied front room of the house referred to, after the alleged intercourse had taken place, and the prosecuting witness spent most of the time until daylight in defendant's lap, hugging and kissing each other, and the other girl and her companion were similarly engaged.

3. Instruction numbered 5, asked by defendant, was fully covered elsewhere in the instructions.

[3] 4. At the time of the commission of the crime sections 261 and 264 of the Penal Code, as they read in 1912, were in force. By section 261 rape was there defined as:

> "An act of sexual intercourse, accomplished with a female, not the wife of the perpetrator, under the following circumstances: 1. When the female is under the age of sixteen years."

Then follow five other subdivisions covering other circumstances. By an amendment in 1913 (Stats. 1913, p. 212) section 261 reads: "1. Where the female is under the age of eighteen years." In all other respects the section is unchanged. Section 264, prescribing the punishment for rape, was materially changed. St. 1913, p. 213. It is now contended that the statute of 1912 was repealed by the act of 1913 and there was therefore no law under which defendant could be tried or convicted.

Section 329 of the Political Code is as follows:

> "The repeal of any law creating a criminal offense does not constitute a bar to the indictment or information and punishment of an act already committed in violation of the law so repealed, unless the intention to bar such indictment or information and punishment is expressly declared in the repealing act."

There is no such express intention shown in the repealing act of 1913. The sentence imposed was authorized by the earlier act. People v. McNulty, 93 Cal. 427, 26 Pac. 597, 29 Pac. 61; 12 Cyc. Crim. Law, p. 770; monographic note, 94 Am. Dec. 217, 219.

[4] 5. Misconduct of the district attorney is complained of on the ground that he asked a question of a witness called by the people in rebuttal which properly should have been asked as part of the people's case in the examination of the witness in chief. It appears from the record that a further objection was made on the ground that it called for a confidential communication and the court sustained the objection apparently on this latter ground. Whether the question involved might properly be put to a witness in rebuttal was largely a matter of discretion with the court. We cannot see that defendant was prejudiced by the mere asking of the question which was not answered.

[5] 6. It is urged that a new trial should be ordered because two of the jurymen were in an advanced state of intoxication both during the trial of the case and during the recess of the court. On the motion for a new trial affidavits were read in its support. These affidavits related to Juryman Rantz and Juryman Mugler. As to the evidence concerning the conduct of Juryman Rantz, the affidavits were concededly in substantial conflict, which removes the matter from consideration on appeal.

Hazel Vaughan deposed that she was present at the trial and "carefully watched said jurors who were impaneled to try said case; that Albert Mugler, one of said jurors, was drunk and in an intoxicated condition on the 10th, 11th, and 12th, both on the streets of Yreka, Cal., and on the 12th in the courthouse at Yreka, while he was on the jury in said case, and was utterly unfit to serve as such juror." C. W. Kaler attended the trial on the 10th, 11th, 12th, and 13th of November, 1913; he deposed "that he had special chance to observe the conduct of said jurors; that Albert Mugler, who was a juror in said case, was drunk while on the jury; and that, in the opinion of affiant, said Mugler was not in a condition to serve as such juror, and was incapacitated by reason of his intoxicated condition." Callie Jones deposed that she was present at the trial during the four days mentioned; "that she knows Juror Albert Mugler; that said Juror Albert Mugler was drunk on each and every day that he sat at said courthouse as a juror; that he was drunk when said court opened on Monday morning; that he was drunk on that day while on the jury; that he was drunk on Tuesday all day; that he was very drunk on Wednesday; that he was utterly unfit to serve as a juror, owing to said intoxication; that the court did fine the said juror for being drunk; that said case was continued for 12 hours owing to his intoxicated condition." John C. Naves deposed that during an intermission of said trial (the day not stated) Juryman Wilkins "spoke to this affiant on the streets of Yreka and said as follows: 'John (meaning affiant), where is Collier (defendant's attorney)? For God's sake put him on to this man Mugler. He has been drinking all day, and if he keeps in that condition, I, for one, will refuse to sit on the jury with him. We never will be able to agree on a verdict with a man like that.' This affiant further states that he knows Juror Albert Mugler, and that on Tuesday evening after court had adjourned, said Albert Mugler was very drunk and utterly incapable of attending to any business," and that during the day of Wednesday "the said Juror Albert Mugler was again so intoxicated that he was unable to serve as a juror in said cause." Juror Wilkins made affidavit that in the jury room when the jury were deliberating upon their verdict Mugler was in a condition to and did fully, fairly, and intelligently consider the evidence and discuss the same. Several other jurymen made like affidavit. But Wilkins did not deny making the statement to affiant Naves; neither did he nor any other juryman depose that Mugler was in a sober condition at other times during the trial. Mugler may have been duly sober when the jury retired to consider their verdict, but it by no means follows that while evidence was being submitted to the jury he was in a condition to receive correct impressions as to the weight and significance of such evidence. Defendant was entitled to have the judgment of each juror uninfluenced by the stimulating and disturbed condition of mind which drunkenness produces. If one juror was by his drunkenness while acting as a juror incapacitated fairly and intelligently to hear and pass upon the evidence, it would be a reproach to the law should a verdict of guilty in which his vote was necessary be allowed to stand. It appears from the record of the trial that on Wednesday afternoon at 2 o'clock, when the trial was resumed, Mugler was in such an intoxicated condition as to compel the court to adjourn the further hearing, and the juror was fined $20 for contempt of court. Deponent Hugo V. Miller deposed that "during the trial of said cause he saw the said Albert Mugler many times and particularly before the verdict in said cause, and knows that the said Albert Mugler was drunk and utterly incapable of serving as a juror in said case; that prior to the verdict in said cause the said Mugler expressed his opinion freely and openly about said case, and about the testimony in said case, and stated freely and openly how he would vote, and that he had made up his mind and nothing could change him; that affiant frequently requested said Mugler not to discuss said case, and when he refused to desist and continued to express his opinion publicly about said case and about the merits thereof, this affiant notified the attorney for the defendant, and, with the assistance of John C. Naves, from the office of the attorney for the defendant, they tried to get said juror to bed, but he still continued to talk and express his opinion about said case, and to say how he would vote thereon and that nothing could change him." Deponents Linton and Hutchens deposed to Mugler's drunken condition on Wednesday, the 12th of November, and that in that condition he "publicly expressed his opinion as to what he would do in the case."

Juror Starr deposed that, on Thursday morning, the day after he was fined for contempt, Mugler "came into court in a sober condition, remained in that state and went into the jury room duly sober, and was in a condition to discuss, and did discuss, the evidence in the case intelligently." Deponent did not speak of Mugler's condition during the other days of the trial, and there was no evidence submitted on Thursday. Juror Mugler deposed that, "on Wednesday, November 12th, affiant became intoxicated and on convening the court on the afternoon of that day (there was no session in the forenoon) the court, at the request of both the district attorney and counsel for defendant, granted a continuance of the case until Thursday morning at 10 a. m., and at that time affiant was duly sober; that the case was given to the jury on the afternoon of Thursday, November 13, 1913, and at that time, and all times while hearing the evidence, affiant fully and intelligently considered the evidence; * * * that he never to his knowledge ever formed or expressed an opinion as to the guilt or innocence of the defendant until he had retired to the jury room to deliberate on the verdict, and in this regard affiant admits that on one or two occasions during the times herein mentioned he was quite intoxicated outside the courtroom and during the adjournment of court and at the convening of court on Wednesday afternoon, November 12th, but that he never was in a condition of intoxication while evidence was being taken or rulings of the court being made or arguments of counsel were had not to fully and intelligently hear and consider all that was going on in said trial." District Attorney Hooper deposed to the intoxication of Mugler on the 12th and the contempt proceedings and that on the following morning Mugler came into court "apparently sober."

It appeared that deponent Hazel Vaughan is defendant's sister, and deponent Callie Jones is his mother, and that deponent Naves was a clerk in the office of defendant's attorney, Mr. Collier. It also appeared that defendant's attorney was told of the facts stated in the depositions of Miller and Linton that Mugler had, while in an intoxicated condition, declared that his mind was made up, and nothing could change it.

In the case of People v. Romero, 12 Cal. App. 466, 470, 107 Pac. 709, 711, the alleged intoxication of the juryman occurred during recess of the court and, as was stated in the opinion:

> "Several jurymen deposed that at no time during the proceedings while evidence was being taken or when the jury retired to consider their verdict was Hayes intoxicated, but, on the contrary, he was 'sober during the trial, and in all ways perfectly able to consider the evidence introduced at the trial of said cause and to intelligently exercise his judgment thereon.'"

It was further said in the opinion:

> "The fact that a juror drank intoxicating liquor during recess of the court will not vitiate the verdict if it appears from the affidavits of his fellow jurymen, as here, 'that the juror, while sitting or deliberating as a juror, was sober intelligent and in a fit condition to understand and deliberate upon the evidence and determine the verdict'"—citing People v. Deegan, 88 Cal. 602, 26 Pac. 500.

In People v. Boyd, 16 Cal. App. 130, 135, 116 Pac. 323, the question of excessive indulgence in liquors by jurymen during recess of the court was under consideration, but there was a substantial conflict of evidence on the subject which, under the rule, removed the question from consideration here. Besides, there was no evidence showing that the juror complained of was not sober while he was actually engaged in performing his duties as a juror.

In the present case there is some evidence that Juryman Mugler was intoxicated while in the jury box, during the progress of the trial, to an extent which incapacitated him from intelligently considering the evidence. There is no conflict in the affidavits, unless it can be said that Mugler's affidavit creates it. Two of the affiants, who deposed to his condition while evidence was being taken, were closely related to defendant—one his mother and one his sister—to which fact the court must have attached sufficient importance to justify it in disregarding their opinion. The only other affiant deposing to Mugler's condition while evidence was being taken was affiant Kaler. His statement was that Mugler was drunk every day of the trial, and particularly on the first three days, and while "he was on the jury," but he does not state that he was in that condition while evidence was being taken. On the fourth day the affidavits show clearly that Mugler was duly sober. The court doubtless concluded that, as between the sweeping statement made by Kaler and the specific statement made by the juror, the latter was the more dependable. To say that there was no substantial conflict we must hold that the court was not justified in accepting Mulger's statement as true. We cannot see our way clear to do this. Besides, we are influenced in some degree in our conclusion by the fact that defendant's counsel knew of the condition of Mugler during the recess of court, and that he had made statements while intoxicated as to how he would vote when considering the verdict. Where misconduct of a juror is known to the complaining party and is of such a character as to disqualify the juror, it is the duty of the party complaining promptly to call the attention of the court to such misconduct. In Ipswitch v. Fernandez, 84 Cal. 639, 641, 24 Pac. 298, the court said:

> "If, then, the intoxication, which plaintiff avers to have commenced at the beginning of the trial, and continued to its close, was apparent to him, he could not keep quiet on the subject, take the chances of a favorable verdict, and then avail himself of it for the first time after defeat."

See 1 Hayne on New Trial, § 27; Monaghan v. Rolling Mill Co., 81 Cal. 190, 194, 22 Pac. 590; Doolin v. Omnibus Cable Co., 140 Cal. 369, 375, 73 Pac. 1060. But for this feature of the matter we should be disposed to hold that defendant did not have such a trial as the Constitution entitled him to. Had the conduct of Mugler been called to the attention of the court and satisfactory proof made of it, and a demand made that he be discharged, it would have been the duty of the court, in the interest of justice and of orderly procedure, to grant the demand. As defendant seems to have knowingly taken the chance with this juror, he must be deemed to have waived the objection now urged, and should not be heard to complain of the verdict.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

YELLOW JACKET GOLD & SILVER MINING CO. v. HOLBROOK. (Civ. 1218.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 3, 1914.)

1. CONTRACTS (§ 218*) — CONSTRUCTION — AGREEMENT TO PAY MONEY.

Where a written order by H. on L. to pay a certain sum of money to Y. was accepted by L., provided any money should be received by him for H.'s account, H.'s subsequent written agreement to pay the money on a certain date, "in case said sum shall not have been paid at said time by said L. in accordance with the terms of the foregoing order," was not conditional on L. having, at such date, collected any money for H.'s account.

2. BILLS AND NOTES (§ 44*)—PROMISSORY NOTE—WHAT CONSTITUTES.

A written promise, reciting a consideration, to pay to the order of a certain person a specified sum of money, was a promissory note as defined by Civ. Code, § 3244, though the promise to pay was conditioned on payment not being made by another.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bills and Notes, Cent. Dig. § 52; Dec. Dig. § 44.*]

3. BILLS AND NOTES (§ 459*)—ACTION ON NOTE—NECESSARY PARTIES.

In an action on a note binding H., the sole maker, to pay a specified sum on a certain date "in case said sum shall not have been paid at said time by said L. in accordance with the terms of the foregoing order," the order referred to having been accepted by L., provided any money should be received by him to the maker's account, L. was not a necessary party.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John E. Richards, Judge.

Action by the Yellow Jacket Gold & Silver Mining Company against C. H. Holbrook, Jr. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

A. A. Sanderson, of San Francisco, for appellant. Charles H. Sooy and David Levy, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. The action was to recover upon the following instrument, designated in the complaint as "a contract and promissory note":

"San Francisco, California, March 23, 1911.

"Mr. F. R. Lewis, San Francisco, California—Dear Sir: Please pay to the Yellow Jacket Gold & Silver Mining Company, or order, the sum of $1,227.86, with interest at seven per cent. per annum from April 1, 1908, out of the first money you shall receive on my account from the estate of F. W. Sisson, deceased.

"C. H. Holbrook, Jr.

"The foregoing order is herewith accepted this 30th day of March, 1911, provided any money is ever received by me for account of C. H. Holbrook, Jr., from estate of F. W. Sisson, deceased. F. R. Lewis.

"In consideration of forbearance on the part of the Yellow Jacket Gold & Silver Mining Company, and for other valuable consideration, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, I agree to pay to said company, or order, the sum of $1,227.86 (with interest thereon from April 1, 1908, at seven per cent. per annum), on April 1, 1912, in case said sum shall not have been paid at said time by said F. R. Lewis, in accordance with the terms of the foregoing order. C. H. Holbrook, Jr."

It is alleged that, on April 1, 1912, and frequently since said date, plaintiff demanded of F. R. Lewis, one of the parties to said contract, that he pay to plaintiff the sum of $1,227.86, with interest at 7 per centum per annum from April 1, 1908, to date of demand, but that the said Lewis has refused and does now refuse to pay the same; that prior to the commencement of the action and on May 6, 1912, "and at several other times," plaintiff demanded of defendant, Holbrook, that he pay to plaintiff said sum, with interest according to said contract and promissory note, but that the said Holbrook "has not paid said sum or any portion thereof, except the sum of $343.76 on account of interest to April 1, 1912"; that "ever since said 23d day of March, 1911, plaintiff has been and now is the owner and holder of said promissory note and contract"; "that no part of said note, or the amount due under the terms of said contract * * * has been paid, except said sum of $———, interest, but that the whole amount specified in said note and contract, together with interest thereon from April 1, 1912, to date is now due, owing and unpaid."

Defendant demurred to the complaint on general grounds and specially on the grounds: (1) That it does not appear from the complaint that said Lewis has received from said Sisson estate any money; (2) that it does not appear that any demand of payment was made upon said Lewis after April 1, 1912, and prior to the commencement of the action; (3) that there is a misjoinder of parties defendant, and that said Lewis should be made a party defendant; (4) that the complaint is ambiguous in that it does not appear therefrom "what was the 'forbearance' on the part of said plaintiff toward said defendant, Holbrook, as a consideration received by said defendant, Holbrook, for the making of the promise to pay said plaintiff the money named in the complaint." The demurrer was overruled, and defendant answered, denying that he executed and delivered to plaintiff "his certain promissory note or any promissory note," but does not deny executing the instrument set out in the complaint; that defendant has no information whether or not plaintiff demanded payment of said Lewis as alleged, and therefore denies that said or any demand was made on him as alleged; that having no information whether or not plaintiff is the owner and holder of said instrument, he denies the alleged ownership, further answering, alleges that the said contract "is without any consideration," and denies that there is any sum due plaintiff thereunder.

The cause was tried without a jury, and the court made findings as follows: That defendant executed the promissory note and contract alleged in the complaint; that plaintiff made demand of payment on said Lewis, and his refusal to pay, as alleged in the complaint; that, since March 23, 1911, plaintiff has been the owner of said instrument, and that the whole amount specified therein, together with interest from April 21, 1912, is due and unpaid; that it is not true that said contract was without consideration. Conclusions of law followed, that there is due plaintiff from defendant the amount claimed and interest from April 1, 1912, and that plaintiff is entitled to judgment therefor. At the trial it was admitted by defendant that the demand was made on said Lewis as set forth in the complaint, also due execution and delivery of the instrument by defendant Holbrook, therein set forth.

> "Mr. Sanderson (attorney for defendant): I have no testimony to advance in the case. It is merely a legal defense, as shown by the demurrer."

The day following the submission of the case the court rendered the following decision:

> "In the case of the Yellow Jacket Gold & Silver Mining Company v. C. H. Holbrook, Jr., submitted to the court yesterday, the court has examined the only question which was raised by the defendant in the action by demurrer, and is satisfied that the complaint sets forth a cause of action. As to the facts in the case, they were substantially agreed to by stipulation of the parties. It results that judgment must be rendered for the plaintiff for the amount prayed for in the complaint. Let findings and judgment be prepared and entered."

Defendant appeals from the judgment.

Appellant presents the following in support of his demurrer: That Lewis was a necessary party, and that there is no allegation that Lewis has received any money from the Sisson estate. The argument seems to be that Lewis is equally bound with Holbrook, and, in order to end all litigation in the matter, he should have been joined as a defendant; that:

> "There being no allegation that Lewis had not collected the money from the Sisson estate, the presumption prevails that he has collected it and was therefore equally liable under the contract with defendant, Holbrook."

Counsel further states:

> "It is true that the defendant, Holbrook, agreed to pay the money sued for on April 1, 1912, in case Lewis had not paid the same by that time, but that in no wise canceled or lessened the obligation of Lewis to pay same to plaintiff if any money was received by Lewis prior thereto for the account of Holbrook from the Sisson estate, and there is no allegation that such money was not received by Lewis."

[1, 2] We agree with counsel that defendant promised to pay the money sued for on April 1, 1912, in case Lewis had not paid it, but we think this promise was in no wise conditional upon Lewis having at that time collected the or any money from the Sisson estate. Holbrook entered into two obligations, first by giving an order on Lewis for any money the latter might receive on Holbrook's account from the Sisson estate, which order was accepted by Lewis, and Holbrook then executed what is a promise negotiable in form to pay to the order of plaintiff a specified sum of money. This meets the definition of a promissory note. Civ. Code, § 3244. The character of the instrument signed by Holbrook as a note was not affected by the provisions of the agreement. Joergenson v. Joergenson, 28 Wash. 477, 68 Pac. 913, 92 Am. St. Rep. 888.

[3, 4] Lewis did not sign the promissory note, and was not bound by it, and was therefore not a necessary party to its enforcement in the action. His liability was on the order, and if as is true Holbrook would have been liable on the order had any money been received by Lewis from the Sisson estate, still it was a joint and several liability, and either or both could have been sued on the obligation. Code Civ. Proc. § 383. In this view it was immaterial whether or not Lewis had received any money from the Sisson estate. Besides, we do not think there was, as claimed, any presumption that he had received any of said money, and if such presumption could be indulged, it would only follow, as counsel says, that Lewis "was equally liable under the contract with defendant Holbrook," and plaintiff would still have his action against one or both. The demurrer was properly overruled.

[5, 6] It is further contended that the findings are not supported by the evidence. It may be suggested as hardly fair to raise this question, in view of the position of counsel as taken at the trial, which was that he presented "merely a legal defense, as shown by the demurrer." However, we will examine the objections now made: First. That there is no support of the finding that plaintiff is the owner and holder of the obligation. It was denied in the answer for lack of information. It was held, in Bank of Shasta v. Boyd, 99 Cal. 604, 606, 34 Pac. 337, that where the obligation is made to the plaintiff, an allegation that the plaintiff is the owner is unnecessary and surplusage. Locke v. Klunker, 123 Cal. 231, 238, 55 Pac. 993. Second. The answer alleged want of consideration. This was made an affirmative defense, and it was incumbent on defendant to prove it. He offered no evidence whatever at the trial. The court, therefore, properly found the issue for plaintiff. "If there was no consideration the defendant should have filed an answer setting up a want of it as a defense to the action," and when alleged should have proved it. Winters v. Rush, 34 Cal. 136; Pastene v. Pardini, 135 Cal. 431, 434, 67 Pac. 681. "A written instrument is presumptive evidence of a consideration." Civ. Code, § 1614; Henke v. Eureka Endowment Ass'n, 100 Cal. 429, 34 Pac. 1089.

We discover no error in the record and the judgment is therefore affirmed.

CARR et al. v. KING et al. (Civ. 1240.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 5, 1914. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 4, 1914.)

1. Evidence (§ 461*) — Parol Evidence — Lease.

Extrinsic evidence was inadmissible to show that the intention of the parties to a lease was different from that fairly expressed therein.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 2129–2133; Dec. Dig. § 461.*]

2. Landlord and Tenant (§ 44*) — Lease — Restriction—Covenant—Construction.

Where the owner of a large tract of land leased a portion thereof to be used by the lessees for conducting a hotel business and summer resort thereon, the subsequent sale of another portion of the tract to a person who used it for hotel and summer resort purposes was not a breach of a covenant of the lease providing that the lessors would "not demise or let any other part of their said premises to be used for like purposes as those herein let * * * and that they will not grant similar rights and privileges upon their said premises to any other persons as those granted * * * herein," though the lessors knew at the time of the sale what use the vendees would make of the property.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Landlord and Tenant, Cent. Dig. §§ 108–110, 732; Dec. Dig. § 44.*]

3. Landlord and Tenant (§ 37*)—Lease—Construction.

Where both parties to a lease voluntarily make their own terms and use their own words and phrases, they are bound by the ordinary meaning of the language used.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Landlord and Tenant, Cent. Dig. § 98; Dec. Dig. § 37.*]

4. Landlord and Tenant (§ 37*) — Lease — "Demise."

The word "demise," used as a noun, means a lease for a term of years; a conveyance in fee, for life or years; the conveyance of an estate, either in fee, or for life, or for years, most commonly the latter. As a verb, it means to lease for a term of years. In its primitive meaning, it was always used in reference to a lease, and, while it has been held that, where the context clearly justified such construction, it meant a conveyance or transfer, this is not its usual signification. Whether the term is to be given its technical or more liberal construction must be determined from an interpretation of the particular lease. [Citing Words and Phrases, vol. 2, p. 1978.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Landlord and Tenant, § 98; Dec. Dig. § 37.*]

5. Landlord and Tenant (§ 44*) — Lease — Covenants—Construction—Alienation of Realty.

Since contracts in restraint of alienation of realty are not favored by law, no presumption will be indulged in favor of a party seeking to enforce a restrictive covenant of a lease as a restraint on the alienation of realty.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Landlord and Tenant, Cent. Dig. §§ 108–110, 732; Dec. Dig. § 44.*]

6. Reformation of Instruments (§ 36*) — Lease—Complaint—Sufficiency.

A complaint in an action for damages for breach of a restrictive covenant of a lease failed to state a case justifying revision of the lease under Civ. Code, § 3399, authorizing revision of contracts in certain cases, where it alleged merely that the words employed in the covenant were by "mutual consent" distinctly "understood" and agreed to mean that defendants should not let or demise any part of their premises to another for carrying on the same business as plaintiffs were carrying on, and that by said contract defendants "covenanted and agreed that they would not * * * grant or convey" to any other the right to maintain such business on any part of the premises, and did not allege that through mistake or fraud the real intention of the parties was not expressed in the lease.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; Emmet Seawell, Judge.

Action by C. F. Carr and another against Thomas King and another. From judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

J. A. Barham and Phil Ware, both of Santa Rosa, and J. H. S. Bartholomew, of Guerneville, for appellants. Thomas J. Geary, of Santa Rosa, for respondents.

HART, J. The object of this action is to recover, as damages, the sum of $35,000 for two alleged breaches by the defendants of a certain covenant of a written lease executed by the latter and the plaintiff M. A. Carr.

The facts are: That, on the 17th day of May, 1901, the defendants, by writing, leased to the plaintiff M. A. Carr (wife of the plaintiff C. F. Carr) about 2 acres of a tract of land embracing about 1,000 acres, situate on Russian river, in Sonoma county, for the term of one year from the 1st day of January, 1902, at the yearly rental of $350, with an option in the lessee, upon the expiration of the term of the lease as above stated, to renew said lease from year to year thereafter for the period of nine years, at the same rental and upon the same conditions as are specified in said written lease.

The property so leased was to be used by the plaintiffs, and has been so used by them during all the time since the making of said lease, for the purpose of conducting the hotel business and a summer resort thereon. By the lease the plaintiffs were granted the privilege of cutting and removing from the premises of the defendants, during the continuance of the lease, all firewood necessary to conduct and run said business. It was also covenanted that the defendants "shall, during the term of this lease, furnish to the said party of the second part 5 rowboats, with their necessary oars and rowlocks; and that the said party of the second part shall have the right and privilege, during the continuance of this lease, of placing and using such other boats as she may see fit in the waters upon said premises." The right to use all rights of way over the premises of the defendants and over all other lands owned by them was granted by the lease, as was likewise the right to permit the guests and patrons of the plaintiffs to use the premises of the defendants, where not inclosed, for pleasure walks and recreation.

The lease further provided:

"It is further agreed and fully understood that the said parties of the first part will not demise or let any other part of their said premises to be used for like purposes as those herein let to the said party of the second part, and that they will not grant similar rights and privileges upon their said premises to any other persons as those granted to the said party of the second part herein."

The complaint is in two counts, and each alleges the breach by the defendants of the foregoing covenant of the lease as follows:

"That, on the 21st day of February, 1910, and while the said lease and agreement was in full force and effect as aforesaid, and while the said plaintiff, M. A. Carr, was in the occupancy of the premises, leased as aforesaid, and thereon conducting a hotel, saloon, summer resort, and like business, the defendants, in violation of the said covenant of their said contract, made, executed and delivered to F. M. Bent, C. W. Eckstein, M. T. Plant and M. Smyth, a grant, bargain and sale deed, which said deed was and is in the words and figures following, to-wit"

—following which is the deed, set out in full; the land so conveyed being a portion of the 1,000-acre tract owned by the defendants and of which the premises leased to the plaintiff M. A. Carr is a part. 2. A similar averment mutatis mutandis that, on the 23d day of April, 1908, the defendant conveyed to one R. C. Devereaux still another part of said 1,000-acre tract, the deed thereto being likewise set out in hæc verba.

The complaint alleges that the respective grantees named in the two deeds above referred to purchased the lands therein described from the defendants, and that the latter conveyed said lands to said grantees for the purpose of allowing the latter to erect and conduct on each of the tracts so conveyed a hotel, saloon, and summer resort, that said lands were purchased for no other purpose, "all of which was known to said defendants at the time they made and executed their said deeds aforesaid."

The complaint further alleges that the grantees named in the deed of February 21, 1910, have, since said date, conducted, carried on, and maintained at all times a hotel, summer resort, and saloon on the land conveyed to them as above stated, "in opposition to plaintiff M. A. Carr, and the hotel, summer resort, saloon, and like business conducted by her as aforesaid; that said grantees have kept their said hotel, summer resort, and saloon open and running during all of the summer months, and have solicited and had the patronage of the public, which otherwise, and but for such opposition, would have patronized plaintiffs' resort, hotel, and saloon." It is then alleged that the patronage so diverted from the plaintiffs and the profits thereof would have amounted to the sum of $20,000, in which sum they were damaged.

It is likewise charged that Devereaux, grantee named in the deed of April 23, 1908, erected and has conducted a hotel, saloon, and summer resort on the land so conveyed to him, and that by reason thereof and of the fact that he solicited and received the patronage of the public, which, but for the opposition so prosecuted by him to the business of the plaintiffs, the latter would have received and which had damaged them (plaintiffs) in the sum of $15,000; the total damages alleged and prayed for amounting to the sum of $35,000.

It is further alleged—in the fourth paragraph of the complaint—that the language of the restrictive covenant in the lease, above quoted, was, by mutual consent of all the parties to the lease, distinctly understood and agreed to mean, "and do mean, that defendants should not and would not let, demise, or grant to any other person during the life and existence of said lease * * * the right or privilege to carry on, conduct, or operate a summer resort, hotel, or saloon on said leased premises, or on said larger tract of one thousand acres, or any part of either. And it was fully understood and agreed by and between the said plaintiff and defendants, at the time of the making of the said contract, that the said plaintiff should, during the life of the said contract and lease, and its continuance, enjoy the exclusive right and privilege of maintaining a hotel, summer resort, and saloon and like business upon any of the said leased lands, and by said contract the said defendants covenanted and agreed that they would not, during the life of the said lease, or during its continuance, lease, demise, grant, or convey to any person or persons the right to maintain a summer resort, hotel, or saloon or like business upon any of their said larger tract."

A demurrer to the complaint on both general and special grounds was overruled. The defendants thereupon answered. At the close of the case on behalf of the plaintiffs the court ordered a nonsuit on the motion of the defendants and dismissed the cause.

This appeal is by the plaintiffs from the judgment entered upon the order granting the nonsuit and the order dismissing the cause, and is supported by a bill of exceptions.
